When Mahomet had perused Scanderbegs Letters, and certainly vnderstood of the great preparation made against him in Italie, as also of the great spoyle of late made by Scanderbeg, he became exceeding melancholie, as a man much troubled in mind, which daily more and more

A more increased: for that he saw not the wonted cheerfulnesse in his men of warre, but all full of heauinesse and despaire, as if they had bin men alreadie vanquished. Neuertheless, he speedily tooke order for the leuying of a great armie; fortifying his cities and strong holds, leauing nothing vndone that was possible, for the assurance of his state. And to represse the furie of Scanderbeg, sent Seremet Bassa with fourteene thousand souldiers to lie vpon the borders of Epirus, with charge only to attend vpon him. Who mindfull of his charge, came into Macedonia, vnto the city Ocrida, now called Alchria, in the very confines of Macedonia towards Epirus, and there lay with his armie; some part thereof lodged in the citie, and the rest in places more conuenient neere about the same.

The comming of the Bassa, as also the manner of his lying, was not vnknowne to Scanderbeg, who desired nothing more than to be doing with him. Wherefore he secretly in the night
B marched towards Ocrida with twelue thousand soldiers, and being come within three miles of the towne, lay close in ambush, & vpon the breaking of the day sent out 500 horsemen towards the enemy, vnder the conduct of Peicus Emanuel, and Petrus Angelus, two valiant and expert captains, to draw him if they could into the field. But Scanderbeg had before commanded thē, that if the enemie did come forth to fight, they should make but smal resistance, but retire backe as if they had fled, and so to traine him on to the place where the armie lay. Which was so well performed by the two skilfull captaines, that the Bassa with all his power was according as they could haue wished, drawne into the field, and brought to the very place where Scanderbeg lay; who suddenly rising vp with all his armie, assailed the Turkes on euery side, C and slew them as Deere enclosed in a toyle. In this battell ten thousand of the Turkes were slaine, the Treasurer of the armie with twelue other of great marke were taken prisoners, and brought bound to Scanderbeg, who were presently ransomed for fortie thousand duckats. Ten thousand Turks slaine.

Scanderbeg hauing obtained the victorie, returned with triumph into Epirus, dayly expecting the comming of the great armie out of Italie: But fatal Destinie, the mightie controller of mens highest designes, had not so appointed. For when Pius the great Bishop had out of all parts of Christendome assembled a great armie (whereof the greatest part were voluntarie souldiers) & all things were now in such readines, that he had put himself vpon the way, & was come to Ancona, a city vpon the sea side (where Christopherus Maurus duke of Venice came vnto him, with ten gallies well appointed, to haue accompanied him in those warres: and all men were now in expectation of some great matter to haue bin done) suddenly he fell sicke of a feuer, D and died in the yeare 1464. Whereupon the armie was forthwith dispersed, and all that great preparation frustrated, to the exceeding griefe of many Christian Princes; and no lesse ioy of the Turks, who now reioyced to see themselues deliuered of so great a feare.

About this same time, Victor Capella chiefe perswader of this war betwixt the Venetians & the Turks, was by the Senat sent Generall of their forces at sea, in stead of Lauretanus, whose yeare was then expired. He hauing receiued the charge from Lauretanus, and sailing out of Eubœa, in short time tooke from the enemie the citie of Aulis in Peloponesus ouer against Eubœa, in short time tooke from the enemie the citie of Aulis in Peloponesus ouer against Chalcis, and also the citie of Larsum in the gulfe of Thessalonica, with the Isle of Himber. Afterwards landing his men by night at Pyræus, he suddenly surprised the citie of Athens
E (now called Sethina) sometime the mother of learning, and most noble citie of Grecia; and from thence caried away with him into Eubœa al the people he there found, as his prisoners, together with the rich spoile of that citie. Whilest he lay in Eubœa, he was perswaded that the citie of Patras in Peloponesus would be deliuered vnto him by the Christians that dwelt therein, if he did but shew himselfe before it. Wherupon he departed from Eubœa, and comming into the gulfe of Patras, landed 4000 footmen vnder the leading of Barbaricus, and 200 horsemen, of whom one Nicholaus Ragius was captaine. Barbaricus marching toward Patras, was come within a mile of the citie; when many of the horsemen, and of the vnruly mariners, disorderly scattering abroad, neglected the intended seruice, and sought after pillage all about the countrey. The Turks garrisons taking this opportunitie, set vpon them with their horse-F men, and so, easily ouerthrew them, being scattered and out of order. At the first encounter, Barbaricus himselfe was slaine; Ragius Captaine of the horsemen was taken, and aliue empaled vpon a sharpe stake. Of all them that were landed, scarce a thousand were left, who saued their liues by flying vnto the gallies. With this ouerthrow Victor the Venetian Admirall was greatly discomforted, yet hauing conceiued some hope of better successe, in few dayes The Venetians attempting to win Patras, receiue great losse daies after attempted againe to haue taken Patras, but with like hap as before: for hauing loſt a thouſand of his men about the citie, and the reſt glad to take their refuge to the fleet, he was conſtrained with great diſhonor to depart thence. And ſo full of ſorrow and heauineſſe returning into Euboea, oppreſſed with melancholy, there ſuddenly died.

The Venetians deceiued of the great hope they had conceiued of the generall preparation made againſt the Turks, and much troubled with the hard proceeding of their warres againſt ſo mightie an enemie; by their embaſſadours ſolicited Mathias, not long before choſen king of Hungarie, to ioyne in league with them, and to take vp armes againſt the common enemie, offering preſently to furniſh him with a great ſumme of money, beſide a large yearely penſion for the maintenance of thoſe warres: for which hee ſhould to his power by land defend all their territorie betwixt the Rhetian Alpes, and the Adriatique, againſt the inuaſion of the Turke.

This Mathias ſurnamed Corninus, was the younger ſonne of the moſt famous captaine Iohn Hunniades, whoſe elder brother Vladiſlaus, a gentleman of ſuch courage as might well ſhew what he was, being not able to digeſt the iniuries and diſgraces done vnto him and his by Vlricus [illegible] of Cilie, and vncle vnto Ladiſlaus the yong king of Bohemia and Hungarie, whoſe kingdomes he alwaies bare vnto their father Hunniades, ſlew the ſame Vlricus at the kings court. In which time he notably enlarged the kingdome of Hungarie, and became a terror [illegible] vnto the Turkes, than [illegible] was his father Hunniades. And therewithall (which is to be accounted in the leaſt part of his praiſes) was alwaies a great fauourer and furtherer of good letters and ingenious deuiſes.

But to returne againe vnto our purpoſe, Mathias hauing well conſidered of that the Venetians had requeſted, anſwered them, that they had many times before in like caſe refuſed to giue aid vnto the Hungarian kings his predeceſſours: yea, and that more was, thought it a thing not reaſonable, that any ſuch thing ſhould be requeſted at their hands; foraſmuch as they then receiued no harme from the Turke, but were in league and amitie with him: ſo that the Hungarian kings wanting their helpe, had many times receiued greater loſſe from the Turke, than otherwiſe they ſhould haue done, if they had beene by them aided. Yet for all that, he was content to forget all ſuch vnkindnes, & to grant them what they had requeſted: promiſing the next Spring to inuade the Turks dominion, & according to their requeſt, to take into his protection all their territorie betwixt the Rhetian Alpes, and the Adriatique: which thing hee moſt

A moſt honourably performed. For with the firſt of the Spring he paſſed ouer Danubius at Belgrade with a puiſſant armie, and raſed the forts which the Turks had built thereabouts; and ſo entring into Seruia, laid all the country waſt before him: and afterwards laden with ſpoile, returned home, carrying away with him twentie thouſand captiues. Neither ſo reſted, but with great good fortune maintained great warres againſt Mahomet during all the time of his raigne: and afterwards againſt Bayazet his ſonne alſo, wherein he moſt commonly returned with victorie: ſo that it is of him as truly as briefly written, That no Chriſtian king or chieftaine, did more often or with greater fortune fight againſt the Turkiſh nation, or had of them greater victories.

Which outrage the young king was glad for the preſent to winke at; and alſo to grant him pardon, as hauing taken away the man, whoſe immoderat power well ſtood not with the kings ſaferie: but indeed fearing the citizens of Alba, and the men of war, who exceedingly fauoured the ſons of Huniades for their fathers ſake. For all that, Ladiſlaus returning into Bohemia, cauſed both the ſons of Huniades vpon the ſudden to be apprehended, and moſt cruelly executed, Vladiſlaus being then about ſix and twentie yeres old. Mathias the yonger brother was kept in priſon, expecting nothing elſe but to be partaker of his brothers hard fortune, as vndoubtedly he had, had not Ladiſlaus the yong king, vpon the ſudden, as he was vpon the top of his marriage with Magdalaine the French kings daughter, by vntimely death bin taken away. After whoſe death the Hungarians for the loue they bare vnto the remembrance of Huniades, by a militarie election, choſe this Mathias his yongeſt ſonne, Mathias of a priſoner, choſen king of Hungarie. then in priſon at Prague, to be their king. Wherof Pogebrache (who after the death of Ladiſlaus, of an old gouernor had made himſelfe the yong king of Bohemia) hauing ſpeedy intelligence K as he was ſitting at ſupper, ſent for Mathias his priſoner, and when he was come, commanded him to ſit downe at the vpper end of the table: whereat the young gentleman, being then but about eighteene yeares of age, and ſore abaſhed, began to craue pardon. But when the King would needs haue it ſo, & that he was ſet, the king to quiet his troubled thoughts, willed him to be of good cheere, for that he had good newes to tell him. Good newes, ſaid he, if it would pleaſe your maieſtie to grant me libertie. Yea that, ſaid the king, and more too: and then ſaluting him by the name of the king of Hungarie, brake vnto him the whole matter, how that he was by the generall conſent of the Hungarians, choſen their king. And ſo in few daies after, married to him his daughter: which done, he furniſhed him with all things fit for his eſtate, and royally accompanied him into Hungarie, where he was with great ioy and triumph recei- L

ours nothing dismaied with the hastie comming and hideous clamour of the Turks, receiued them with great courage; so that there began a fierce battell, with much slaughter on both sides, which for a great while stood doubtfull. Yet such was the inuincible courage of Scanderbegs resolute souldiers, that the Turks (who as then fought in great disorder) were at last put to flight, and with much slaughter chased vnto the straits of the mountain, where Scanderbug had before commanded his men to stay. But certaine of his best and principall captaines forgetting what he had said vnto them; and led on (whether with the heat & furie of the battell, or rather with ineuitable destinie is hard to say) vnaduisedly pursued the enemie into those straits, whereof they were by Scanderbeg before warned, and charged that they should not enter: where they were on euery side belet with their enemies, arising out of ambush: and after they had a long time desperatly fought as wild beasts enclosed with hunters, at last oppressed with multitude, were together taken and brought to Balabanus, by whom they were forthwith sent to Mahomet to Constantinople. Who as soone as he heard of their taking, is reported with great reioycing to haue said, Now am I sure that the strength of Scanderbeg is broken. The names of the principall men which were there taken, was Moses Golemus of Dibra, the greatest captaine of Epirus next vnto Scanderbeg himselfe; Giuriza Vladerius, Scanderbeg his kinsman; Musachius, Scanderbeg his nephew by his sister Angelina; Ginius Musachius; Ioannes Perlatus, who valiantly defended Sfetigrade against Amurath; Nicholaus Berisius, Georgius Chucca, and Ginius Manesius: whereof euery one of them was able to haue conducted a great armie, and might worthilie haue beene accounted amongst the greatest captaines of that age. The taking of these worthie men brought such a generall sorrow and heauinesse vpon Epirus, that the victorie was nothing accounted of, euery man lamenting the losse of such notable leaders. Scanderbeg carefull of their deliuerance; presently sent an Embassadour to Mahomet, requesting that hee might redeeme his prisoners, either by exchanging of others for them, or else for such ransome as it should please him to set downe. But hee knowing them to bee Scanderbeg his best Captaines, would neither exchange them for others, nor graunt that they should bee ransomed for any Gold: But after hee had vsed them with all the dispight hee could deuise, caused them all by little and little, to bee slaine quicke: in which miserable torment they liued fifteene daies, and so died. Scanderbeg hearing thereof, was therewith rather encouraged than discouraged; and in reuenge thereof, with fire and sword entered into the Turkes dominion, sparing nothing that hee could either burne, or possibly by any other meanes destroy.

Moses & other worthie captaines cruelly executed by Mahomet.

Mahomet glad of the taking of these notable men (although they were bought with the liues of many of his people) commended Balabanus highly, as the onely man that knew how to fight against Scanderbeg: and in reward of his good seruice, sent him diuers rich gifts, with commandement to repaire againe his armie, and to proceed in his warres so happily begun. Which thing Balabanus with all diligence performed. Yet trusting more vnto his policie, than his strength, lying at Alchria, sent againe diuers rich Presents to Scanderbeg, as desirous to liue in peace by him; but seeking indeed to bring him into securitie, and so suddenly (if it were possible) to entrap him. Which thing Scanderbeg well perceiuing, reiected his faigned friendship together with his Presents, as sent from a base peisant. Wherupon Balabanus entred into a new deuise, and by secret meanes, with great rewards corrupted Scanderbeg his scouts, whereof some were Balabanus his kinsmen, though it were to Scanderbeg vnknowne. By which practise, he had vpon the sudden in the night oppressed Scanderbeg, lying encamped in Oronycheum, if Scanderbeg himselfe (who commonly spent most part of the night in carefull watch) going about the campe, had not in the silence of the night a far off perceiued the comming of the enemie by the noise of his horses: and thereupon with wonderfull celeritie putting his armie in such order as he best could, was readie to receiue him; and at last after a great fight, put him to flight: and hauing him in chase, slew most part of his armie, Balabanus himselfe with a small remnant hardly escaping.

Now when Mahomet vnderstood that Balabanus was ouerthrowne, and his armie lost, hee was in doubt, whether to send another Generall, or else againe to proue the fortune of the old. But after hee had well considered, that Balabanus was a right valiant Captaine, and one that well knew the countrey of Epirus, and withall a mortall enemie to Scanderbeg: he resolued to staie vpon him, and not to send any other. So committing to his charge foureteene thousand thousand horsmen and three thousand foot, sent him againe to inuade Epirus: and the more to encourage him, promised to make him king of that countrey, if he could subdue Scanderbeg. Balabanus with his armie comming to Alchria, and still in vaine plotting how hee might circumuent his warie enemie; after his wonted manner sent diuers presents to Scanderbeg; which he still scornefully refused. Three months he lay still at Alchria, with nothing more troubled than with his own thoughts: but finding nothing that pleased himselfe, he determined to aduenture by plaine force to subdue him. And vpon that resolution marched with all his armie into the great plaines neere vnto Sfetigrade, whither Scanderbeg came with his armie also, which then consisted of eight thousand horsemen and fifteen hundred foot: with which smal power he refused not to ioyne battell with Balabanus, being in number two to one. But after they were come to handie blowes, to haue seene Scanderbeg his men fight, a man would haue thought them rather to haue bin raging Lyons than men, they so furiously assailed their enemies, without regard of perill or danger, as men nothing afraid to die. Scanderbeg with great skill gouerned that battel, carefully prouiding for euery danger: himselfe valiantly fighting in the head of this battell, but not without care of the rest, still sending speedie releefe where most need was, and bringing in fresh supplies in sted of them that were wounded or slain, performed all the parts of a most worthy cheefetaine and valiant souldier: where most peril was, there was he straight, and at his presence danger fled, as if victory had attended vpon him. But whilest he thus fought in the midst of his enemies, his horse fortuned to be slaine vnder him, and falling downe with him, sore bruised one of his armes, whereof he complained long time after. The Turks seeing him downe, pressed on fiercely to haue slaine him: but he was quickly rescued by his owne souldiers and remounted. And forthwith encountering with one Suliman, a great commander in the Turks armie, slew him in fight hand to hand: whereupon such a terrour fell vpon the Turks, that they began to retire, and after a while to betake themselues to plaine flight. Scanderbeg pursuing them with such execution, that of that great armie few escaped with Balabanus to carrie newes home.

The battell of Sfetigrade betwixt Balabanus and Scanderbeg.

Balabanus now thrice vanquished by Scanderbeg, and in the last battell hauing lost what hee could loose, except he should haue left himselfe, returned to Mahomet at Constantinople, of whom he was sharply rebuked for the great ouerthrowes he had so often receiued. At which time Balabanus at first gaue place to the kings furie: but afterwards when the heat was ouer, he with a large discourse cunningly excused himselfe, imputing all these mishaps vnto the appointment of God, and the fortune of war: and in the end told Mahomet plainly, That it was but in vain to send such smal armies into Epirus. But if it would please him at once to send two valiant captaines with a puissant and strong armie, who diuiding the same betwixt them, and entering at one time into diuers parts of Epirus, might spoile the countrey before them, and enclose Scanderbeg betwixt them, if he should aduenture to giue either of them battell; being before resolued neither of them to offer him battel, or yet to accept of the same being by him offered, except the other were also at hand: and so by mutuall consent to vndertake him, but neuer single. By which course he promised vnto him an easie and assured victorie: for as much as it were impossible for any man so beset, and as it were on euery side coupt vp with his enemies, either to escape, or yet to make any great resistance. This perswasion of Balabanus so wel fitted the tyrants humor, that he appointed Balabanus himselfe to be the man to put his owne deuise in execution: giuing him commission to leuie such an armie as he should thinke sufficient for the performance of that seruice: and withall to associat vnto himselfe for his companion which soeuer of his captains he pleased. Balabanus according to his commission, tooke musters of the men of war, and made choice of fortie thousand good souldiers, and chose one Iacup Arnauth (otherwise called Iames the Epirot, because he was also borne in Epirus, a valiant captaine) to be his companion: whom he sent with sixteene thousand soldiers by the way of Thessalia and Grecia into Epirus, commanding him in no case to ioine battel with Scanderbeg, vntill he himselfe were also come into the country with the other part of the armie. And so setting both forward, Balabanus taking the neerer way through Thracia and Macedonia, came first into Epirus with twentie thousand horsemen and foure thousand foot, and encamped in the vally of Valchall. Scanderbeg both by his espials and letters from his secret friends in the Turks court, hauing certaine intelligence of all Balabanus his intent and purpose, had in readinesse against his comming a strong armie of eight thousand horsemen and foure thousand foot, all choise soldiers. And now hearing that he was come into Epirus, & incamped in Valchaal, sent out three espials to discouer in what order he lay: one of which spies was Balabanus his kinsman (but not so knowne to Scanderbeg) by whose persuasion the other two when they had taken full view of Balabanus his army, & should haue returned to Scanderbeg to haue giuen intelligence of that they had seene, like false traitors went ouer to Balabanus, and discouered vnto him all that they knew concerning Scanderbeg: hoping therefore to receiue some great reward, as their fellow had before borne them in hand. Scanderbeg maruelling that his espials returned not againe as they were appointed, and doubting that they had bin by the enemie intercepted, and vsing many times in matters of such importance to trust himselfe best; presently went out with fiue lustie soldiers, & rid forth to discouer the maner of the enemies lying. Balabanus like a craftie fox, mistrusting that Scanderbeg deceiued of his first spies would for like purpose send forth others, laied certain horsmen in secret ambush in diuers places, to intercept them if it were possible. These horsmen lay not so couert, but that they were in good time descried by Scanderbeg and his followers (who with Argus eies, pried into euery bush & thicket as they went) before he was altogether fallen into their danger: and yet but so that he came to handie stroks, where Scanderbeg & his followers oppressed with multitude, were glad to flie as fast they could into the next wood, the Turks horsmen following them at the heels. It fortuned that as they were flying, a great old tree was fallen crosse the way, which Scanderbeg putting spurs to his horse, leapt ouer with one of his men after him; the other foure not able to get ouer, turned back vpon the Turks, and there fighting were slaine. One of the Turks which so hardly pursued Scanderbeg being wel mounted, forced his horse to leape the tree, and still followed after Scanderbeg: who looking backe and seeing but one, turned vpon him and slew him: the other Turks hauing slaine foure of Scanderbegs men which could not get ouer the tree, returned. And Scanderbeg accompanied but with one of his followers, came backe againe to his campe; and there with all speed put his armie in readines to go against Balabanus before the comming of his companion, with the other part of his armie. Vpon which resolution, after he had with cheerfull persuasions encouraged his souldiers, and filled their mindes with hope of victorie, he set forward, and came with great speed into the valley of Valchaal where Balabanus lay: Scanderbeg had diuided his army into foure squadrons; whereof Tanusius had the leading of one, Zacharias Groppa of another, the third was committed to Peieus Emanuel, and Scanderbeg himselfe conducted the fourth. So setting forward, he sent before certaine companies of harquebusiers, and archers, to prouoke the enemie and to draw him forth vnto battel. Balabanus also shewed himself with his army in seemly order before his tents, but there stood fast & would nor stir, expecting continually the comming of his fellow. Which Scanderbeg perceiuing, and that he fought but to dallie out the time, and as one vnwilling to fight had again retired his armie into the safetie of his trenches; drew neerer and neerer vnto him, continually skirmishing with such as he sent out, daring him to the field, & brauing him vnto his trenches, in such sort, as if he would haue forced the same, & by strong hand haue fet him out thence: wherat the Turks fretted and chafed exceedingly, insomuch that they were ready to rise against their Generall, because he would not lead them forth to battel, but suffer them to be so disgraced. Balabanus mindful of that he had promised to Mahomet his great lord and master, did what he might to haue deferred time, but when hee saw that his fellow came not, and that he could no longer delay the matter, being so continually assailed & brued by Scanderbegs souldiers, that his Turks therewith prouoked, were readie oftentimes to haue issued out without his direction, and now no remedie but that he must needs fight, placed his men in good order, and so went out of his trenches to giue battell, himselfe leading the left wing thereof: where betwixt him and Scanderbeg was made a fierce fight, many falling on both sides. But Scanderbeg strengthned with the old garison of Croia, and the most expert souldiers of Dibra, preuailed vpon the Turks & forced them to giue ground, yet still keping their order. The fight was so great in this part of the battell, that in other places they stood almost still as lookers on, expecting the doubtful fortune of their Generals: which thing Scanderbeg perceiuing, drew certain troups out of the right wing, whereas he saw was least danger, which speedily fetching a compasse about, charged the side of the enemies armie; and againe withdrawing themselues, and with wonderfull celeritie wheeling about, set vpon the backe of them that fought in the left wing: so that the Turks there fiercely charged both before and behind, by the

of Scanderbeg his armie, fell in other places with a great slaughter. Balabanus with exceeding courage gainstood his enemies, so long as there was any hope left: but when he saw the fortune of Scanderbeg to preuaile, and all about him to become desperat, he made shift for himselfe, and fled out of the battell as fast as he could. The rest of the armie being in other places, before troubled and disordred, fled also, some one way, some another, euery man as his fortune led him. Some few that followed Balabanus escaped: the rest were for most part either slaine or taken prisoners.

Scanderbeg had scarcely well breathed himselfe after this victorie, and diuided the spoyle amongst his souldiers, but that newes was brought to him in Post from the ladie Mamiza his sister, then lying at Petrella, That Iacuppe Arnauth was by the way of Belgrade come into Epirus with an armie of sixteene thousand horsemen, burning and destroying the country before him, and then lay incamped in the plaines of Tyranna the lesse. When Scanderbeg to proue the minds of his souldiers, had cherefully imparted vnto them such newes, as was like to be the beginning of new labour and perill; they were therewith nothing dismayed, but readie to follow him with such cherefulnesse of countenance and mind, as if they should haue gone to some great feast or banquet; reckoning of them, but as of the remnant of a discomfited armie. This cherefulnesse of his souldiers, Scanderbeg tooke as an assured token of his good successe; and hauing all things in readinesse, presently set forward, and in short time came to the place where the enemie lay. Iacuppe hearing of his comming, remooued his campe into a corner of the plaine of Tyranna, neere vnto a little hill, as a place of more safetie for his armie to lie in. Scanderbeg hauing taken the Plaine, incamped his Armie in the same place from whence Iacuppe was but a little before departed, where he rested one whole day. The next morning, to terrifie his enemies (who as yet had not heard of the ouerthrow of Balabanus) he caused diuers of the Turks heads which were slain in the late battel (which he had brought for that purpose) to be cast before the trenches of the enemie; and withall, diuers of them which were taken prisoners, to be shewne: which Iacuppe beholding, in great despaire sayd, I see the euill hap of Mahomet. Immediatly after, Scanderbeg sent forth 500 horsemen to skirmish with the Turks, commanding them, so soone as they were charged by the enemie, to retyre, if haply they might so be drawne into battell. Which fell out accordingly: for Iacuppe now seeing his fellow was not to be looked for, and willing also without further delay to trie his fortune, came readily into the field, and began a fierce battell: which endured not long; for Scanderbeg perceiuing in what part of the armie Iacuppe was, bent his greatest force that way, and singling him out, with his owne hand slew him. Wherewith the Turks being discouraged, forthwith betooke themselues to flight, and in flying, were for most part slaine or taken. Those which escaped the present furie of the sword, straggling thorow the country by thicke woods and blind wayes, were by the country people either slaine or taken prisoners. In these two battels were slaine of the Turks 24000, and 6000 taken. And of Scanderbeg his men were lost about a thousand. Scanderbeg and his souldiers were so wearie of the slaughter of the Turks, that when it was told him the next day, That Balabanus was fled but with one cornet of horsemen, and might easily be surprised if he were well pursued; he sayd, O let some of our enemies liue to report their owne slaughter, and our victorie. After that Scanderbeg had in this sort vanquished these great captaines, he presently entred into the frontiers of the Turks dominions, and roaming vp and downe at his pleasure without resistance, made hauocke of all that came in his way: and after returning to Croia with victorie, brake vp his armie, and gaue his soldiers leaue to depart, euery man to his owne dwelling.

Whilest these things were in doing, Mahomet had with great rewards procured two Turks to vndertake to kill Scanderbeg. These traitors came vnto Scanderbeg as fugitiues, making such shew of the detestation both of Mahomet his tyrannicall gouernment, and vaine superstition, that they were both of Scanderbeg and others, reputed to be in deed the men, they desired to be accounted: and so after they had learned the principles of the Christian religion, were by their owne desire baptised. But treason against Princes whom God hath in his most mightie protection, cannot be long couered; much lesse, without his great sufferance performed. So fortuned it, that these two false dissembling traitors, expecting nothing but opportunitie to performe their diuelish deuice, vpon some occasion fell at variance betwixt themselues, and in their heat let some such words fall, as being taken vp by some there present, drew them both into into suspicion: and thereupon being straitly examined, it was at last by them confessed, That they were sent by Mahomet, of purpose to haue slaine Scanderbeg: for which their treason they were both presently executed, as they had right well deserued. When Mahomet vnderstood that Balabanus was ouercome, Iacup slaine, and both their Armies almost quite destroyed, he after his impatient manner fell into a great rage, and became as a man almost franticke: and afterwards calling together his great Bassa's, resolued by their aduice, not to send any more Generals against Scanderbeg, but to go himselfe in person, with such an armie as should at once make an end of his wars in Epirus for euer. Hereupon commissions were directed thorow all his kingdome, and an army raised of two hundred thousand men. Whereof Scanderbeg hauing certaine aduertisement, fortified all his cities and strong holds, especially the citie of Croia; vpon the fortune whereof depended the whole state of his kingdome. Into this citie he put a strong garrison of his most valiant & faithfull soldiers, & throughly furnisht the same with all things necessarie for the enduring of a long siege: and left one Balthazar Perduci (a graue and worthie captaine) gouernor thereof. With like care he prouided for the safetie of his other cities, and tooke order that the countrey people were either receiued into the strong townes, or else conueyed into other places of refuge, and left nothing abroad in the countrey for the Turks to prey vpon; as he had in like case done long before, at the comming of old Amurath to the siege of Croia, as is before in his life declared.

By that time that Scanderbeg had set all things in order, his old friend Balabanus with fourescore thousand horsemen (the forerunners of Mahomet his armie) was entred into Epirus, and ranging ouer the country two dayes, came and sate downe before Croia: vpon whom the gouernor at his first comming made many braue sallies. In few dayes after came Mahomet with his huge armie, and there incamped also: who at his first comming summoned the city, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him, vpon such vnreasonable conditions as it pleased himself, (as the manner of the Turke is:) whereunto the worthie gouernor returned him no other answer, than by continuall thundring shot into his campe. Whereupon Mahomet caused such ordnance as he had to be planted for batterie; and commanded other new to be cast, of such mettall as he had for that purpose brought in masse: all which, he did rather to strike a terrour into the minds of the defendants, than for any great hope he had of taking the citie by force: knowing by his owne experience, that it was a place almost impregnable. Whilest Mahomet was thus busied, & little or nothing preuailed, Scanderbeg lying abroad in the woods & mountaines, with a small armie of most valiant and couragious souldiers, continually cut off the forragers of Mahomets armie, and such as brought in victuall or necessaries for his campe: and manie times in the night suddenly brake into one quarter or other of the Turks great camp with great slaughter, and with continuall alarmes neuer suffered them to rest in quiet. Mahomet seeing his armie to decrease dayly, and no hope of winning the citie but by famin, which would require a long siege: and fearing also to make that same place againe famous by some notable mischance which might happen vnto himselfe vnder the walls of Croia, as had before vnto his father Amurath; determined to returne himselfe to Constantinople, and to leaue Balabanus with a great part of his armie to continue the siege. Vpon which determination, he committed the charge and ordering of the whole matter for the continuing of the siege, to Balabanus, ioyning vnto him eight of his most expert captaines; yet so, as that they should be all at Balabanus his command. And so leauing with him three and twentie thousand of his best souldiers, and with euery one of the other eight Captaines seuen thousand moe, departed himselfe with the rest of his armie from Croia, towards Constantinople. But by the way as he went he tooke from Scanderbeg certaine small forts, and with faire promises corrupting the Gouernour of a place called Chidna, wherein eight thousand of Scanderbeg his souldiers lay, had the same deliuered into his power, vpon his faith before giuen, That all the souldiers with the rest of the people should in safetie depart thence. But after the tyrant had them in his power, without regard of faith or promise, he caused them all most cruelly to be cut in pieces, sparing neither man, woman, nor child, to the great griefe and weakning of Scanderbeg, who had not at any time before receiued so great a losse. And after he had so raged, he in great melancholie returned vnto Constantinople.

Scanderbeg disdaining to haue his chiefe citie besieged by Balabanus, (sometime one of the basest of his fathers subiects) and yet finding himselfe vnable to relieue the same, for as much as

as the souldiers were with continual wars sore wasted, and his warie enemies lay so encamped, as that they were not but by a strong armie to be remoued, sent vnto the Venetians and other the confederat princes of Albania, Illyria, and Dalmatia, praying of them aid now at his need against that enemie, which preuailing against him, would forthwith set vpon them. All which princes promised forthwith to send their succours. At the same time also he passed ouer into Italie secretly, and disguised in simple attire, came to Rome, to craue aid of Paulus the second, of that name, then great Bishop: by whom he was honourably entertained, but obtained nothing of that he came for; so cold was his deuotion: onely at his departure he gaue vnto Demetrio, Scanderbeg his treasurer, a poore almes of three thousand duckats.

Scanderbeg returning into Epirus, found all such aid ready as was promised from the confederat princes, but especially from the Venetians, which was for most part drawne out of their garrisons of Scutari, Driuasto, Alyssa, and Dirrachium: so that he had in few daies in his armie thirteene thousand foure hundred choice souldiers. With this strength he marched towards Croia: but vnderstanding by the way, that Ionima was within a daies iourny, comming with a new supplie to his brother Balabanus, he drew out certaine troupes of his best horsemen, and coasting ouer the country in the night, suddenly came vpon the Turks, and put them to flight: where amongst others, Ionima himselfe, with his sonne Hedar, were taken prisoners; whom he shewed the next day in bonds to Balabanus. This exploit so happily performed, he with all speed returned to his armie: and so marching to Croia, by plaine force driue the Turks from the mountaine Cruina, their greatest strength, and neerest to the citie of Croia. Which thing when Balabanus saw, he with certaine troups of horsemen rid euen to the gates of the citie, perswading the defendants to yeeld the citie, making them in the name of his master such offers and promises as he thought might most moue them. But they nothing regarding his words, but rather incensed with his presumption, sallied out vpon him, and inforced him to retire: but he therewith enraged, and halfe mad for anger, came vpon them with a fresh charge, thinking by plaine force to haue driuen them backe into the citie. In which skirmish he was by one Georgius Alexius, with a bullet, shot quite thorow the throat; and feeling himselfe mortally wounded, setting spurres to his horse, ran as fast as he could to his campe, where he presently fell downe from his horse and died. The Turks discouraged with the death of their General, & the comming of Scanderbeg, rose the same night, & with great silence retired themselues vnto the plaine of Tirana, about eight miles from Croia. Scanderbeg the next morning entring the forsaken tents of the Turks, found therein great store of corne and other victuals; which he caused to be forthwith conueyed into the city, & in triumph followed after himselfe, to the great ioy and comfort of his late besieged subiects: whom hee highly commended for their fidelitie, and bountifully rewarded according to their deserts. The same day he sent certaine companies of souldiers to take the strait passages whereby the Turks must needs passe in their returne out of Epirus: which when the Turks vnderstood, they sent two messengers to Scanderbeg (who seemed to be men of good account in the armie) offering in the name of the rest of the captaines and commanders, to deliuer vnto him their horses and armes, so that they might in safetie depart with their liues. Which their request Scanderbeg propounding to his counsellors and captains, was by them diuerslie digested. In conclusion, they receiued this answer from Scanderbeg himselfe, That as they came into his countrey, without his commandment, so should they not by his leaue depart thence. The Turks receiuing this short answer by their messengers, & considering that they must needs in that bare country in short time perish, either with famin or with the sword; the same night departed from Tiranna, and in the dead time of the night entering the aforesaid straits, by plain force desperatly brake thorow and escaped, but not without their great losse: for whose escape the common souldiers murmured grieuously against Scanderbeg, and were not without much adoe appeased. In short time after, Scanderbeg recouered all such places as Mahomet had before taken from him, and put to sword the souldiers he had left for the keeping of the same: which done, he brake vp his armie, retaining only two thousand horsemen & a thousand foot for the defence of his frontiers. The Turkish tyrant hearing of the euil successe of his affaires in Epirus, as that his Generall was slaine, Croia relieued, his armie discomfited, and all that he had done, brought to nought; fretted thereat exceedingly, & was therewith so much grieued, that he could not for a season eat or drink, or take rest, his discontented thoughts so much troubled him. In the end, to reme-die the matter, he resolued the next Spring to go again in person himselfe with a most puissant G armie into Epirus, and so if it were possible, to make a full conquest thereof: of which his purpose Scanderbeg vnderstanding, prouided for his comming, as hee had in former time. The Spring being come, Mahomet according to his former resolution, with a mightie armie entred into Epirus, and there with exceeding labour & charge, first repaired or rather re-edified the old ruines of the citie of Valmes, wherein he left a strong garrison, of purpose to trouble that part of the country. From thence he marched to Dirrachium (now called Durazzo, but of old time Epidamnum) a city vpon the sea coast, then in the possession of the Venetians, famous for many things in the time of the Roman empire, but especially for the flight of the Roman Se-nat thither, and their entertainment there in the time of the ciuil wars betwixt Cæsar and Pom- peius. This city Mahomet thought to haue taken vnprouided, & so vpon the sudden to haue car- H ried it, but was therein much deceiued, finding it strongly fortified and manned both by the Venetians and Scanderbeg. Where when he had there spent some time, & to his great losse in vain attempted the citie, he rise vpon the sudden: & retiring into Epirus, came and sat down againe before Croia, of purpose by his sudden comming to haue terrified the citizens: and vainly persuaded, that he had left Scanderbeg in Dirrachium, for that in the assailing thereof he had discouered many of Scanderbegs men, and thereby supposed him to haue bin there also;

the greatest cause why he so suddenly rise and came to Croia. At his first comming he offered great rewards and large priuiledges vnto the citizens, if they would forthwith yeeld vp their citie; otherwise hee threatned vnto them all the calamities of warre, vowing neuer to depart I thence before he had it: wherunto he receiued no other answer out of the citie than was sent him by the mouth of the cannon, or brought him by many most braue sallies. Scanderbeg in the mean while continually molesting his campe, & euery night falling into one quarter or another thereof. Mahomet taught by experience, to what small purpose it would be for him to lie there long, rise with his armie, and marched againe to the sea side, to a place now called the head of Reden vpon the gulfe of Venice, not far from Dirrachium, where Scanderbeg had begun to build a new citie called Chiurill, not yet finished: which Mahomet in despight of the man, rased downe to the ground. After that, hearing that many of the Epirots were retired into the mountaines, hee went to seeke them out, and was with great losse by those mountaine people repulsed: Scanderbeg still following them at the heels, and awaiting all opportunities, K daily cut off part of his armie. So that at last the tyrant despairing of any good to bee done in that expedition, was glad to depart out of Epirus, hauing atchieued nothing worth his com-ming, and so, full of discontentment and melancholie returned into Constantinople.

After all these great troubles, Scanderbeg rid ouer most part of Epirus, to view the state of his kingdome, and so at last came to Lyssa (a citie of the Venetians, which he had alwaies specially liked) there to confer with the Venetian legat and other the confederat princes, of matters concerning their state in generall, as his manner was: but more particularly how they might take the citie of Valmes, which Mahomet had the last yere built in the seignorie of Ary- annites Comynat, and much troubled that part of Epirus. But whilst he lay there, he fel sicke of a feauer, which daily so increased vpon him, that he became sicke euen vnto death: and now L perceiuing his end to draw nigh, sent for his wife and son, with the princes & lords his confe-derats, & the embassadors of the Venetians, into his bedchamber. Where after he had at large with greater pain notably discoursed of his troublesome life led among them, than he had before passed the same, and carefully forewarned them of the dangers like to ensue, he earnestly exhorted them to continue in vnitie & concord, and valiantly to stand in defence of their religion, country, and liberty. And afterwards turning his speech to his wife & his son, commended them both with his kingdome to the tuition of the Venetians: who by the articles of the confederation betwixt him and them, were in honor bound to protect his son and kingdome, during the time of his minoritie, and afterwards peaceably to place him in the same. In fine he willed his wife after his death to passe ouer with her sonne into Apulia, where they might in safety and quiet liue vpon such possessions as he there held by the gift of King Ferdinand. And M so after hee had with most feruent prayer commended his soule into the hands of Almightie God, departed in peace the 17 day of Ianuarie, in the yeare of our Lord 1466, when he had liued about 63 yeares, and thereof raigned about 24. His death was worthily lamented of all Christian princes, but especially of the Venetians and Princes of Albania, who had now lost

Death of Scanderbeg.

A their most carefull watchman and inuincible champion: the sorrow of his subiects is not to be expressed, euery man bewailing him, as the only stay of the common-weale, and as if with him they had lost all their hope. His dead bodie was with the generall lamentation of all men roially buried in the cathedrall church of S. Nicholas at Lyssa: where it rested in peace, vn- Scanderbeg buried at Lyssa.

The bloudie bane of faithlesse Turkes, and terrour of their name, Epirus strong defence and guard, lay buried there with fame:
Within that tombe wherein long since, Great Castriotus lay;
But now those limbes and tombe defac'd, are carried quite away.
The remnants of that worthie wight out of his graue were torne;
And being dead, could find no rest, but were for Iewels worne.
For after he, farre spent with age, gaue place to fatall doome,
Forthwith the cruell Turks preuail'd, and all things there possest:
Who worshipping his stately tombe, and place of quiet rest, Dig'd vp his bones, and brake the tombe wherein he did remaine:
And glad was he that could thereof some little part obtaine.
As if in them some martiall force, or vertue great had beene:
Or fortune rare, such as before in him was liuing seene.
So vertue, which to others giues a sepulture and graue, Bereft it him, yet for'st his foe in honour it to haue.

Mathias king of Hungarie, taketh the kingdome of Bosna from the Turks.

Most part of the times of those wars betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, the Venetians by sea and the Hungarians by land, kept the Turks througly busied. Mathias Coruinus King of Hungarie (according to his promise made vnto the Venetians) entered into the kingdome of Bosna, whereby force he ouerthrew the strong forts which the Turkes had built for the defence of their frontiers, and manfully draue them out before him vntill he came to Iaziga (of some called Iaitze) the chiefe citie of Bosna, which he at length took: & following the course of his victorie, scarcely suffered the Turkes to breath, vntill he had by force wrested all that kingdome out of their hands. Wherewith Mahomet being exceedingly grieued, in great fury came with a strong armie into Bosna, and laid hard siege to Iaziga, which was by the Christians right valiantly defended, vntill Mathias with a puissant armie came to the relieefe therof: who so troubled the Turks campe with continuall skirmishes on the one side, and they of the town with desperat sallies on the other; that at length the proud Turke was driuen to such extremitie, that he was glad secretly to steale away by night with all his armie into Seruia; and for hast to leaue behind him both his tents & great ordnance, which (the Turks histories report) he caused to be cast into the riuer, because it should not come into the hands of the Christians. Mathias after he had thus valiantly put to flight his enemies, and relieued his city, followed the Turks into Seruia, and took part of that country also, which together with Bosna he vnited to the kingdome of Hungarie. In these warres, Mahomet had such proofe of the force and power of Mathias and the Hungarians, that for a good while after he had no great stomacke to prouoke them farther: for why, the name of Mathias was now become vnto the Turks no lesse dreadfull, than was sometime the name of his father the valiant Huniades.

The Venetians at the same time also with their gallies scoured the seas, & landing their men sometime in one place, sometime in another, did great harme in many places of the Turks dominion neere vnto the sea coast. Amongst other their Generals at diuers times sent from that state, one Nicholas Canalis succeeding Lauretanus (whom we haue before spoken of) as soone as he had receiued his charge, came with his fleet into the bay of Salonichi, and landing his men, burnt diuers townes and villages alongst the sea side: And afterwards returning into Peloponesus,

A ponesus, he fortified the towne of Legosticium in the gulfe of Patras; which worke the Turks with their often skirmishes laboured to haue hindred, but in despite of all they could doe, it was brought to perfection, and a strong garrison therein left for the defence thereof; which done, he returned againe to Eubœa. Shortly after, he with the same fleet put to sea againe; and sailing alongst the coast of Macedonia and Thracia, surprised the citie of Ænus which standeth vpon the mouth of the riuer Meritza, called in antient time Hebrus, vpon which riuer the famous cities Andrianople, and Philippopolis are also scituate. Canalis after hee had taken the spoyle of the citie, returned to his gallies, carrying away with him two thousand captiues into Eubœa. At the same time also, the Venetians giuing aid vnto Nicholas Duchaine against his brother Alexius, then at variance for the principalitie of Zadrima, neere vnto the riuer of Drino in Epirus, gaue a great ouerthrow to the Turks which came in the quarrell of Alexius.

Mahomet not a little offended with the harmes done vnto him by the Venetians, and perceiuing that the Island of Eubœa (now called Nigroponte) was for the commodious scituation and strength therof, the chiefe place from whence they wrought him all these wrongs, and whither they afterwards retired againe, as vnto a most sure place of refuge; determined with himselfe at once to be euen with them for all, and to imploy his whole forces both by sea and land for the gaining of that place. This Island of Eubœa is about an hundred miles in length, and lieth ouer against that part of Græcia which was of old called Bæotia, from whence it is separated with a narrow strait of the sea: it aboundeth with corne, wine, oyle, fruit, & wood fit for shipping. The chiefe city thereof, was in antient time called Chalcide, and of latter time 1470
C Nigroponte, by which name also the whole Island was knowne: albeit the Turks now call it Egribos; a populous, rich, and strong citie; so fortified with wals and bulwarkes, that (in most mens iudgement) it seemed a place impregnable. Vnto this strong citie, Mahomet resolued to lay siege, knowing well, that vpon the fortune thereof depended the state of the whole Island. Wherefore he assembled a mighty army, and made great preparation both by sea and land: and when all things were in readinesse, sent Mahomet (the great Bassa of the court) with a fleet of three hundred gallies, and certaine other small vessels well furnished with souldiers, mariners, and all things necessarie, by sea into Eubœa: and with a great army marched himselfe by land through Achaia, vntill he came ouer against the citie of Chalcis. The Venetian Admirall hearing of the comming of the Turks fleet, set forward to haue met them neere vnto the straits of D Hellespontus: but after he had by his espials descried the great number of the enemies fleet, finding himselfe too weake, shaped his course to the Island of Sciros. The Bassa comming out of the straits of Hellespontus, couered the sea with his fleet, & holding on his intended course without let came to Eubœa: where at his first landing, he tooke Stora and Basilicon, two smal townes, which he rased to the ground, and from thence went directly to Chalcis. As soone as this great fleet was there ariued, Mahomet caused a great bridge to be made of his smaller vessels ouer the strait betwixt Achaia and Eubœa, whereby he passed all his armie, and so belaied the citie round both by sea and land. And after he had planted his batterie, began most furiously to shake the wals: wherein he had in short time made faire breaches, and the sooner, for E that one Thomas of Liburnia (chiefe canonier of the citie) before corrupted by the Turks, by signes agreed vpon, gaue them certaine knowledge in what places the wals were weakest: whereby they so aptly planted their batterie, as if they had taken view on the inside of the wals. Which foule treason was at length perceiued, and the traitor therefore worthily executed. Yet little preuailed the tyrant thereby; for such was the industrie of the defendants, that whatsoeuer he had by the furie of his great ordnance beat down by day, that they with restlesse labor repaired again by night. Thus was the siege continued thirtie dayes, in which space many a sharpe assault was giuen by the Turks, to their great losse; and the citie still valiantly defended by the Christians. At length the Venetian Admirall (to the great comfort of the besieged) came with his fleet within view of the city, making semblant as if he would haue giuen F the Turks battell. Whereupon it is reported, that Mahomet was about to haue raised his siege, and haue got himselfe ouer into the maine, for feare the Venetians should with their gallies haue broken the bridge, and so haue shut him vp into that Island: which thing if it was thought the Admiral might haue done, to his great praise, if he would as a couragious captaine haue aduentured the matter, as he was earnestly requested by the captaines of euery priuate galley who generally grieued to see him so great a commander, to let slip so faire an opportunitie. G But he fearing to come any neerer, came to an anchor and moued not, neither gaue any signe of comfort or relieſe to the beſieged. Which thing the Turkiſh King quickly perceiuing, and therewith encouraged: hauing now in diuers places beaten downe the wals, and made them ſaultable, brought on his men to the breaches, promiſing them the ſpoile of the city, with many other great rewards and hie preferments according to their particular deſerts, whereof he ſaid, he would himſelfe be an eye-witnes. Hereupon the Turks gaue a moſt fierce and furious aſſault; which the defendants with inuincible courage receiued, and made ſuch ſlaughter of them, that the ditches were fill'd, & the breaches made vp with the bodies of the dead Turks.

But ſuch was the number of that populous armie (the greateſt ſtrength of the Turks) that the liuing little felt the loſſe of the dead: Mahomet continually ſending in new ſupplies of freſh H men, in ſtead of them that were ſlaine or wounded: ſo that one could no ſooner fall, but two or three ſtept vp in his roome, and ſo ſucceſſiuely, as if new men had ſprung out of the bodies of the dead. Twiſe they had euen woon the breaches, and were both times with wonderfull a night without intermiſſion. At length the defendants being for the moſt part ſlaine or wounded, and the reſt wearied with long fight, and vnable to defend the town now aſſaulted almoſt round, retired from the breaches into the market place, and there like reſolute men, ſold their liues at a deere price vnto the Turks. Amongſt the ſlaine Chriſtians, were found the dead bodies of many notable women, who ſeeing the ruine of the citie, choſe rather to die with their friends in defence thereof, than aliue to fall into the hands of their barbarous enemies.

Mahomet being now become Lord of the citie, and hauing loſt fortie thouſand of his Turks I in that ſiege, in reuenge thereof cauſed all the men that were found in the citie aliue, to be put to moſt cruel death, eſpecially the Italians, vpon whom he ſhewed his tyrannie with moſt exquiſit and horrible torments. Paulus Ericus gouernor of the citie, with a few others, who with him were fled into the caſtle, without reſiſtance deliuered the ſame vnto him, vpon his faith-full promiſe, that they might in ſafetie depart: but after that he had got them into his power, the perfidious tyrant without regard, commanded them all to be cruelly murthered. The Go-uernors daughter a maiden of incomparable beautie, was amongſt the reſt taken priſoner, and for her rare perfection, by them that tooke hir preſented to Mahomet as the mirror of beauty:
The barbarous tyrant greedie of ſo faire a prey, ſought firſt by flattering words and faire per- K ſuaſion, to induce her to conſent to his deſire: but when he could not ſo preuaile, he fell into another vaine, and began to ſhew himſelfe in his owne nature, threatning her with death, torture, and force, worſe than death it ſelfe, if ſhe would not otherwiſe yeeld vnto his appetite.

ly ſlaine. The horrible and monſtrous crueltie, with the filthie outrages by that beaſtly and barbarous people committed, at the taking of that citie, paſſeth all credit. Chalcis thus woon, the reſt of that fuitfull Iſland without further reſiſtance yeelded vnto the Turkiſh ſlauerie, vnder which it yet groaneth. This calamitie happened vnto the Venetian ſtate, or rather (to ſay truly) to the generall hurt of the Chriſtian common-weale, in the yeare of our re- L demption, 1470.

Canalis the Venetian Admirall, who all the time of the ſiege, had in the ſight of the citie lien at anchor as a looker on, fearing now that the citie was loſt, to be ſet vpon by the Turkes fleet, hoiſed ſaile, and laded with diſhonour returned in haſte vnto Venice, where he was by the commandement of the Senat committed to priſon, and afterward with all his familie exiled to Vtinum.

Shortly after, when Mahomet was departed with his army out of Euboea, and his fleet re-1471 turned to Conſtantinople: the Venetians with their gallies, attempted to haue vpon the ſud-den ſurpriſed the citie, a little before loſt. But Mahomet had therein left ſo ſtrong a garriſon, M that when the Venetians had landed their men, they were againe enforced to retire to their gallies, and to forſake their Iſland.

Chalcis thus loſt with all the Iſland of Euboea, the Venetians choſe Petrus Mocenicus, a valiant and diſcreet gentleman, Admirall of their fleet, in ſtead of Canalis: and by their embaſ-ſadours ſolicited Sixtus the fourth of that name, then Biſhop of Rome, and Ferdinand King

A of Naples, with Lewis king of Cyprus, and the grand maſter of the Rhodes, to ioyne their forces together with theirs againſt the great and common enemie: which thing all the aforeſaid Chriſtian princes promiſed them to do. And the more to intangle the Turke, they at the ſame time ſent Caterinus Zenus their embaſſadour with rich preſents vnto Alymbeius Vſun Caſſanes, the great king of Perſia, to incite him on that ſide againſt the Turke: in which negotiation Zenus ſo well behaued himſelfe, that the next yeare following, that great king tooke vp armes againſt Mahomet, and had with him mortall wars, as ſhall be in conuenient place hereafter declared. Mahomet not ignorant of the proceedings of the Venetians, & that they did what they might to ſtir vp as many enemies as they could, and to bring him (if it were poſſible) into hatred with the whole world: and well knowing how much he had offended the minds of the
B Chriſtian princes with the cruelty he had of late vſed againſt them of Chalcis, thought it not beſt as then further to prouoke them, and ſo happily to bring all at once about his eares; but for a ſeaſon to lie ſtill at Conſtantinople, as if he had beene deſirous now to liue in peace, not meaning further harme: hoping thereby, that although he concluded no peace with any of them (which indeed he was not deſirous of) yet that tract of time might mittigat the hainouſnes of the fact, and coole the heat of their diſpleaſure; whereby it came to paſſe as he wiſhed, that nothing worth the ſpeaking of was that yere attempted againſt him: and becauſe the Perſian king was the man of whom he ſtood moſt in doubt, he ſought by his embaſſadors to pacifie him, and to withdraw him from the league of the Chriſtians: requeſting him, if it were for nothing els but for the communitie of the Mahometan religion, wherin they well agreed,
C and were thereby the profeſſed enemies of the Chriſtians, to withdraw his hand, and in their cauſe to ceaſe to take vp armes: vrging now (for that it ſo ſtood with his purpoſe) the zeale of religion; whereas otherwiſe he regarded (as was thought) no religion at all. But Zenus the Venetian embaſſadour lying continually in the Perſian court, ſo wrought the matter with Vſun-Caſſanes, that he told the Turks embaſſadours plainly, That he could not nor would not longer endure the manifeſt iniurie and wrong done vnto him by the Turkiſh king: and farther, that he had made a faithfull league with the Chriſtian princes, and therefore would to the vttermoſt of his power make it knowne vnto the world, that he would effectually performe what thing ſoeuer hee had promiſed: and ſo diſmiſſed them, now no leſſe diſcontented than were before the Perſian embaſſadours at ſuch time as they returned from the Turkes court, hauing obtained nothing they then requeſted concerning the Emperour of Trapezond.

D The yeare following, Mocenicus the Venetian Admirall with his fleet arriued in the Iſle of Lesbos, where he did great harme. From thence hee paſſed the bay of Adramittium into the leſſer Aſia, and ſore ſpoiled the countrey about Pergamus. After that he landed again at Cnidus vpon the coaſt of Caria, where he tooke a great bootie: and ſo hauing done the Turkes exceeding much harme in Aſia all alongſt the ſea coaſt oppoſite to Græcia, hee returned laden with ſpoile towards Peloponeſus. In his returne about the promontorie of Malea, vpon the coaſt of Peloponeſus, he met with Richaienſis comming vnto him with 17 gallies from King Ferdinand: by whom he was certified, that the great Biſhops fleet was ready to come forth alſo. After mutuall gratulation, as the maner at ſea is, the Admirals ioyning their fleets in one,
E landed at Methone, now called Modon, then a citie of the Venetians in Peloponeſus: where after they had well refreſhed their ſouldiers, and taken in freſh victuals, they put to ſea againe; and ſailing through the Iſlands, landed in Aſia, where they were at their firſt landing encountered by the countrey Turks, whom at laſt they put to flight, and by the ſpace of foure dayes tooke what pillage they could in the countrey: where the ſouldiers found great ſtore of rich bootie, eſpecially of Turkie carpets, which are there made in great abundance. From thence they ſailed to Halicarnaſus, which is part of Caria (where ſometime ſtood the ſtately tombe which Queene Artemeſia built for her husband Mauſolus, accounted amongſt the wonders of the world) where they tooke a wonderfull ſpoile. There came vnto them Nicholas Biſhop of Modruſſa, with twentie gallies ſent from the great Biſhop: whom the other two Generalls F welcomed with great ioy. At the ſame time alſo came thither two gallies from the great maſter of the Rhodes. With this fleet of eighteene gallies, they ſailed to the Iſle of Samos ouer againſt Epheſus (ſometime a place of great fame, but then altogether deſolate and vnpeopled) there to conſult for their further proceedings in thoſe warres. Looſing from Samos, they took their courſe alongſt the ſea coaſt of Aſia, and landed at Attalia, the chiefe city of of Pamphilia, a place of great traffique: where they found in the ſubburbes of the citie great G ſtore of many rich commodities, brought thither out of Ægypt and Syria; whereof they took what pleaſed them, and burnt the reſt together with the ſubburbs. Vnto the citie it ſelfe they began to lay ſiege, but perceiuing that it was not without great loſſe of their men to be taken, they departed thence: & running all alongſt the coaſt of Pamphilia, burnt and deſtroied what came in their way, and ſo returned backe againe to Rhodes: where they met an Embaſſador from Vſun-Caſſanes the Perſian King, to the Biſhop and the Venetians, for great ordnance; whereof that ſo mightie a Prince was altogether vnfurniſhed. Of this Embaſſadour they vnderſtood, that Vſun Caſſanes was entred into league with the Chriſtian Princes, and now buſie in making preparation againſt the Turke. At which time Mahomet requited the Venetians with no leſſe harme in Epirus and Dalmatia, than they had done to him in Aſia: for now that Scanderbeg was dead, the Turks mightily preuailed vpon the weake princes of Epirus and Albania, with the countries adioyning. The Chriſtian fleet departing from the Rhodes, landed in the country of the Myndians, a part of Caria, and with great ſpoile returned to the Iſland of H Naxos, one of the Cyclades: from whence King Ferdinand his gallies returned home, laded with much rich ſpoile; for now the yeare was far ſpent. Yet after the departure of the Kings gallies, Mocenicus with the Legat returned backe againe into Aſia, and there landing their men tooke the famous citie of Smyrna in Ionia, and when they had taken the ſpoile thereof, ſet it on fire. At which time alſo they did great harme about Clazomene, not farre from Smyrna. So Winter drawing now faſt on, they returned, laded with the rich ſpoiles of Aſia; the Legat into Italie, and Mocenicus into Methone.

Mahomet no leſſe troubleſom vnto the Mahometane princes than to the Chriſtians.

The inſatiable deſire of Soueraigntie, whereunto the Turkiſh king was naturally inclined, had continually armed him, not onely againſt the Chriſtian princes, but againſt others alſo euen of his owne ſuperſtition: making no great difference betwixt the one and the other, if ſo he might extend his dominion. He had long before vnder the pretence of a friendly parley craftily circumuented the King of Myſia, a countrey in Aſia, and hauing got him within his danger, cruelly put him to death, & by force ſubduing his kingdome, left not one of the kings bloud aliue. After that he inuaded Cilicia, which the Turks call Caramania, where the two young brethren, Pyramet and Caſſambet raigned, and draue them both out of Cilicia: of whom Pyramet the elder, fled for refuge to Vſun-Caſſanes; Caſſambet the younger aſſiſted by his old friends, ſought by force of armes to recouer againe his inheritance wrongfully by the Turkes K poſſeſſed, and was beſieging certaine townes vpon the ſea coaſt, which being taken from the Turks would eaſily draw all the reſt of the kingdome after them. Mocenicus the Venetian Admirall being now with the firſt of the Spring come vpon the coaſt of Cilicia, at the requeſt of Caſſambet, landed certaine companies of his men vnder the leading of Victor Superantius, and certaine peeces of great artillerie, wherewith he ſo battered the wals of Sichinum, that he enforced the Turks therein to yeeld vp the citie: which he deliuered to Caſſambet. In like manner he tooke the citie of Corycus, which he alſo reſtored to Caſſambet. At laſt he laied ſiege to Seleucia, which ſtandeth vpon the riuer Orontes, and was built by King Seleucus, one of the ſucceſſors of Alexander the Great, diſtant from the ſea about fiue miles: the Gouernor of this city diſcouraged with the ſight of the great artillerie, deliuered the city to the Venetian cap- L taine, who by the appointment of the Admirall reſtored the ſame to Caſſambet. Who by this meanes brought againe into his kingdome, gaue great thanks vnto the Admirall, promiſing both for himſelfe and for his brother to be alwaies frinds vnto the Venetians. Mocenicus departing from Cilicia, landed his men in Lycia, and harried that countrey alongſt the ſea coaſt. And this Mocenicus ſailed into Cyprus, to appeaſe a great inſurrection there raiſed againſt the Queene, who was by her husband at his death left to the protection of the Venetians: which rebellion when he had well quieted, hearing that Triadanus Grittus, was by the decree of the Senat appointed Admirall, and alreadie come into Peloponeſus, he with as much ſpeed as he could haſted thither, to giue vp his charge, and ſo to returne home againe to Venice,

About this time the great Perſian King Vſun-Caſſanes began to make war vpon the Turkiſh M emperor Mahomet, for the better vnderſtanding wherof, it ſhal not be from our purpoſe briefly to ſhew by what means this Vſun-Caſſanes, of a ſmall prince aſpired to the kingdome of Perſia, and ſo in ſhort time grew to that greatneſſe, that he was iuſtly accounted amongſt the greateſt monarchs of the world then liuing; as appeareth by theſe warres betwixt him and the great Turkiſh

A Turkiſh Emperor Mahomet. This Vſun-Caſſanes of whom we now ſpeake, was the ſonne of that Tachretin, who with other poore princes was driuen into exile by the violence of Baiazet the firſt, great grandfather to this Mahomet the great, Emperor of the Turks, and was againe reſtored by great Tamerlane, as is before declared in the life of Baiazet. By the death of Tachretin, his ſon Vſun-Caſſanes (of ſome called alſo Aſymbeius) obtained that ſmall territorie which his father had in Armenia: nothing anſwering vnto the greatneſſe of his conceits. Wherefore not contented with ſuch poſſeſſions as was from his father diſcended vnto him, he began to ſhoulder for more roome, with ſuch weake princes his neighbors as he thought he might beſt deale withall; wringing one prouince from this prince, another from that, and thruſting ſome others quite out of all that they had: and in ſhort time ſo inlarged his dominion, that he had ■ got into his hands a great part of Armenia, and was reputed both for a mightie and fortunate prince. Inſomuch that Calo Ioannes, then Emperor of Trapezond (whoſe power altogether anſwered not to the greatneſſe of his ſtile, being for moſt part ſhut vp within the bounds of Pontus, and fearing the greatneſſe of the Turkiſh Emperour Mahomet, whoſe name began then to grow dreadfull vnto his neighbour princes) gaue to him his onely daughter Deſpina in marriage, by ſuch allyance to ſtrengthen himſelfe againſt the Turkiſh tyrant, if need ſhould require. At which marriage it was agreed, That Vſun-Caſſanes ſhould in the right of his wife enioy all the kingdome of Pontus, after the death of Calo Ioannes her father, and of Dauid his brother: and that Deſpina ſhould ſo long as ſhe liued haue the free exerciſe of her Chriſtian Religion. By this woman, Vſun Caſſanes had a daughter called Martha, whom I willingly remember, for that ſhe was the mother of Hyſmael, afterwards the great king of Perſia, commonly called Hyſ-
C mael the Sophy; of whom more ſhall be ſaid hereafter in the life of Selymus. Vſun-Caſſanes honoured with this marriage, and ſtrengthned with this new allyance, ceaſed not, after his wonted manner, daily to incroach vpon his neighbor Princes; and proceeded ſo far, that at length he began to lay hand vpon a part of Armenia, which was then part of the Dominion of the Perſian King. Zenzes (whom ſome call Tzokies, which was indeed the name of his father) raigning then in Perſia, by his Embaſſadors admoniſhed, and in ſort commanded Vſun-Caſſanes to hold himſelfe content with his owne, or at leaſt, with that he had alreadie wrongfully taken from others, & not to preſume to come within the bounds of his dominion, threatning otherwiſe to take him as an enemie to his ſtate, and to turne his forces vpon him. With which em-
D baſſage Vſun-Caſſanes being much offended, gaue the Embaſſadors no entertainment, but commanded them with ſpeed to get them out of his Kingdome, and to tell their Maſter, That he would ſhortly himſelfe in perſon come and debate the matter with him face to face. With which proud anſwer from ſo meane a prince the Perſian king moued, leuied ſuch an armie for the inuading of him, as was thought to haue beene ſufficient to haue ſubdued a farre greater prince: and ſo appointed, ſet forward toward Armenia. Vſun-Caſſanes much inferiour to this great king in wealth and number of men, but not in haughtines of mind, and valiantnes of courage, ſtayd not to expect the comming of ſo puiſſant an enemie, but full of hope ſet foward to meet him, and by great journeys ſought to come vpon him before he could haue any knowledge of his comming: yet had he then in his army ſcarcely one man to ten, but al armed with E couragious hearts, and conducted by a moſt fortunat chiefetaine which feared nothing. So hoſding on his way, at length he met with the great army of the Perſians, with whom he preſently ioyned battell, and after a long and cruell fight ouerthrew them in the plaine field, with ſuch a ſlaughter as might well haue weakned the forces of a right great kingdome. The great king more inraged than diſcouraged with his ouerthrow, raiſed a far greater army than before, the verie ſtrength of his kingdome: reſoluing now, not to ſend any more his lieutenants, but to go in perſon himſelf againſt ſo deſperat an enemie. All things being in readineſſe, he ſet forward, and at length met with the Armenian prince, whom he found as ready to giue battel as he was at the firſt. So being both deſirous to trie their fortune, they ioyned battel; wherein the Per-
F ſians were againe diſcomfited and put to flight, and mo of them ſlain in that battell, than were brought into the field in the firſt armie. Zenzes the Perſian king was there ſlain with Vſun-Caſſanes his owne hand, and Cariaſaphus his ſon taken priſoner: whom the Armenian prince vſed with the greateſt honor could be deuiſed, giuing vnto him the honor and title due to the Perſian king, taking to himſelfe the bare name of the protector of the Perſian ſtate. Which he did only to pleaſe the Perſians, and to keepe them quiet vntill he had got ſome more aſſured poſ-

Scodra, Mocenicus hauing receiued such commandment from the Senat, came and joined himselfe to Grittus the new Admirall, who then lay with his fleet in the mouth of Boliana, a great riuer running out of the lake whereupon the citie of Scodra standeth. These two great Commanders being met together, were both as one man, and with a wonderfull consent did what they might for the furtherance of the Common good, a thing not common: first they put strong garrisons, with all things necessarie, into Colchinum, Lyssa, Dirrhachium, and other cities of their seigniory vpon the sea coast. After that, they went vp the riuer Boliana with certaine gallies, and came within sight of Scodra, and there by fires in the night, and other tokens of comfort, encouraged the defendants, as with an assured promise of reliefe: which thing grieued the Turks to behold, who therefore went about to haue shut in those same with a great chaine drawne crosse the riuer, where it was narrowest betwixt them and but in doing thereof, the Venetians out of their gallies slew 500 of the Turks diuers others, and so returned againe to sea. It was afterward attempted by the mirals, if a new supply might haue bin put into the citie: but the enemy had to bel that it was not possible to be done. In the mean time, Mathias king of H great yerely portion of the Venetians for the defence of their countrie ring that Scodra was besieged, began to make such spoyle in the Turks vpon him, that Mahomet was glad to call home the great Bassa from the fend his own frontiers. So the Bassa after he had lien three months with hi siege, and lost 14000 of his men, whereof the greatest part died of ing in the rotten moorish ground neere vnto the rose with his armie and departed. ne Venetians their gallies were rou

B Mahomet remembring the shamefull repulse he had about foure yeres before receiued at Scodra, and hauing the name of that citie daily sounding in his eares, determined now once againe to gage his whole forces vpon the winning thereof, and so to giue peace to his ambitious desires. And because he would not againe be dishonored with that he purposed to take in hand, he gaue out order into al parts of his dominions, both in Europe and Asia, for the assembling of his best souldiers and men of war. Now when all things were in readinesse, and such an armie assembled as he seldome or neuer had a stronger; first he sent forth Aly-Beg (Warden of the frontiers of his kingdome alongst the riuer Danubius) with eightie thousand of the soldiers called Achanzij, towards Scodra. These Achanzij are horsemen, which for their good seruice, according to their deserts, haue certaine lands giuen them by the king to liue vpon during their liues; for which they are of dutie bound to serue vpon their owne charge, as the forerunners of the Turke his armie, whensoeuer he goeth to besiege any place: these be they which first enter into the enemies countrey, burning and spoiling what they can, vntill they come vnto the place appointed: and haue this priuiledge, That so soone as all the armie is come vnto the place to be besieged, they may then at their pleasure either depart or stay. 1479 Vid Marinum Barletium de expug. Scodrensi.

C The Gouernor of Scodra vnderstanding both by common fame and certaine intelligence, of the Turks designes, with all care and diligence fortified the towne, labouring continually both night and day at the rampiers, as if the enemie had been already present; and plentifully prouided all things necessary for the enduring of a long siege. The aged and vnnecessarie people, he sent out of the city into other places of more safetie farther off: in whose stead he tooke

D in great numbers of strong and able men which dwelt in the countrey round about: amongst whom were many mariners taken out of the gallies, and other men of like qualitie, which got their liuing vpon the riuer and lake of Scodra, lustie bodies enured to hardnesse, who in the long siege following did great seruice.

Whilest this preparation was making in Scodra, behold, the mountaines a far off Northward from the city, began to shine with many great fires, and all the country was couered with thicke smoake, which euerie houre seemed to draw neerer and neerer; when within short time after, the poore country people (which as yet were not all fled) with such trash as they could well carrie, came running for life all ouer the countrey to the strong cities vpon the sea side, crying out that the Turks were come. The poore countrey people flie for feare of the Turks.

E The next day, which was the fourteenth of May, Aly-Beg with his eightie thousand Achanzij, came into the suburbs of the citie, and there encamped; so that none could goe in or out of the gates: which was not the least part of his charge. To him, by the commandement of Mahomet, had Scander-Beg Gouernor of Bosna, and Malcotius with seuen thousand horsemen, ioined themselues vpon the way. Of this Malcotius it is reported (as was of Augustus) that the maiestie of his countenance, with the resplendant beames issuing out of his eyes (as if it had been the rayes of the Sunne) were of such piercing brightnesse, that no man was able with immoued and fixed eye long to behold the same. These horsemen (the forerunners, as I said, of Mahomets great armie) the Christians much troubled, with often sallies and shot, out of the towne, and slew many of them with little or no losse vnto themselues.

F When Aly-Beg had thus lien before the citie ten dayes, came Taut Gaiola the great Bassa of Constantinople with fiue and twentie thousand souldiers, and about twelue thousand camels, for most part laden with metall in masse, for to make great Ordnance of, and other necessaries for the campe. The Bassaes great and stately Teat of purple colour, was pitched vpon the Scodra, Mocenicus hauing receiued such commandment from the Senat, came and joined himselfe to Grittus the new Admirall, who then lay with his fleet in the mouth of Boliana, a great riuer running out of the lake whereupon the citie of Scodra standeth. These two great Commanders being met together, were both as one man, and with a wonderfull consent did what they might for the furtherance of the Common good, a thing not common: first they put strong garrisons, with all things necessarie, into Colchinum, Lyssa, Dirrhachium, and other cities of their seigniory vpon the sea coast. After that, they went vp the riuer Boliana with certaine gallies, and came within sight of Scodra, and there by fires in the night, and other tokens of comfort, encouraged the defendants, as with an assured promise of reliefe: which thing it grieued the Turks to behold, who therefore went about to haue shut in those same gallies with a great chaine drawne crosse the riuer, where it was narrowest betwixt them and the sea: but in doing thereof, the Venetians out of their gallies slew 500 of the Turks, and wounded diuers others, and so returned againe to sea. It was afterward attempted by the aforesaid Admirals, if a new supply might haue bin put into the citie: but the enemy had so beset the same that it was not possible to be done. In the mean time, Mathias king of Hungarie (receiuing a great yerely portion of the Venetians for the defence of their countries against the Turk) hearing that Scodra was besieged, began to make such spoyle in the Turks dominions bordering vpon him, that Mahomet was glad to call home the great Bassa from the siege of Scodra, to defend his own frontiers. So the Bassa after he had lien three months with his great armie at the siege, and lost 14000 of his men, whereof the greatest part died of sickenesse taken by long lying in the rotten mooriſh ground neere vnto the riuer; by commandement from his Master, I rose with his armie and departed. The Venetians also, which lay all that while thereabout in their gallies, were toucht with the same contagion: Triadanus Grittus died thereof; & Mocenicus the other Admiral fell therof dangerously sicke, but being somwhat recouered, returned home, and was shortly after for his good seruice chosen Duke of Venice, Marcellus the old Duke being then dead. With this dishonour taken at Scodra Mahomet was so discontented, that he appointed a yearely fee vnto one, to put him in mind dayly of the siege of Scodra.

The same yeare that this great Bassa Solyman had in vain besieged Scodra, he was afterward sent with a great armie into Valachia, where he was so intangled in the woods and fennes, by Stephanus the Vayuod, that he lost all his armie, and with much adoo escaped himselfe, by the wonderfull swiftnesse of a mare whereon he rid.

1476. The yeare following, which was the yere 1476, Mahomet sent out a great fleet to sea, vnder the conduct of Geduces Achmetes, his chiefe counsellor and man of war, (whose verie name was dreadful in all places where he came) in hope to haue by treason surprised the Island of Crete: but that plot was in good time by the Venetians perceiued, the traitors executed, and he of his purpose disappointed. Whereupon he changed his former purpose for Crete, and sent the same Achmetes with his fleet into the Euxine (or as the Turks call it, the blacke sea) to besiege the rich citie of Caffa. This citie was in antient time called Theodosia, scituate in the country of Taurica Chersonesus, fast by the sea side, and had of long time bin in possession of the Genowaies, and was a place of exceeding great trade, vntill that this great Emperor Mahomet hauing taken Constantinople, and falling out with the Venetians, had by his strong castles built L vpon the straits of Hellespontus and Bosphorus, taken away both the traffique of merchants into those seas, and all possible meanes for the Genowaies to send succour to that citie: yet it is credibly reported, that one valiant captaine vndertooke to carrie his companie (in number not aboue one hundred and fiftie men) by land from Genoa to Caffa, not much lesse than two thousand miles, and worthily performed what he had vndertaken. Achmetes comming thither with his fleet, enclosed the citie both by sea and land: which diuided in it selfe by reason of the diuers disposition of the Inhabitants, being of diuers Nations, some Genowaies, some Greeks, some Armenians, but most Tartars, could not long hold out, but was in short time giuen vp to the Bassa, vpon condition, That the Genoway Merchants, who were there both M in number many, and exceeding rich, might in safetie depart thence with their wealth. Which promise the Bassa performed not; but when he was possessed of the citie, sent such as he thought good, to Constantinople, and commanded the rest vpon paine of death, not to depart thence, or to conuey away from thence any part of their substance. In short time after, the whole Countrey of Taurica Chersonesus yeelded vnto the Turkish obeisance. At which time

A time also the Tartar Princes, namely the Precopenses and Destenses, terrified with the greatnesse of the Turke, cowardly yeelded themselues as tributaries vnto him; euer since which time they haue liued a most seruile and troublesome life, subiect to euery command of the Othoman Emperor; for whom they haue done great seruice many times in their warres, against the Persians, the Polonians, the Hungarians, Transyluanians, and Germanes, as in the processe of this Historie well appeareth; and as the aforesaid nations their neighbors, with others also further off, haue euen of late to their great losse felt.

Although the Venetians had in these late warres lost the great and fertile Island of Euboea, with the strong citie of Chalcis, the surest harbour for their gallies; yet held they still diuers strong towns and commodious hauens by the sea coast, both within Peloponesus & without; 1477.
B as Methone, Corone, Tenarus, Naupactum, & others: which standing as it were in the bosome of his Empire, Mahomet sore longed after. And therefore to satisfie his ambitious desire, sent Solyman (the great Bassa of Europe) with a strong fleet into Peloponesus. Who entering the gulfe of Corinth, at his first comming layd siege to Naupactum, now called Lepanto, a citie standing in the gulfe of Corinth, in the countrey of Ozolæ neere vnto Locris, ouer against Peloponesus. Antonius Lauretanus (for his late good seruice done in defending of Scodra) made Admirall for the Venetians, came with speed to Naupactum, and in despight of the enemy so furnished the citie both with men and what soeuer else was needfull, that the Bassa now out of hope to win the citie, rose vpon the sudden with his armie, and in a great furie departed, after he had lien there foure moneths. In this fret returning towards Constantinople, he put cer-
C taine companies of his men to shore in the Island of Lemnos, in hope to haue vpon the sudden surprised the citie of Coccinum: but as they were about to haue entered, they were contrarie to their expectation, manfully resisted by such Christians as by chance were next the gate: where the notable courage of Marulla (a maiden of that Citie) was much commended; who seeing her father slaine in the gate, tooke vp the weapons that lay by him, and like a fierce Amazon notably reuenged his death, desperatly fighting in defence of her countrey, with those few which were there at the first; and so kept the Turks out, vntill the rest of the citizens (mooued with the alarme) came to the gate, and forced them, not without some losse, to retyre againe to their gallies. Not long after, Lauretanus came thither with his fleet: but before his comming, the Bassa was departed thence for Constantinople, hauing in this expedition done nothing that was expected at his hands.

D Mahomet after the death of Scanderbeg ceased not from time to time by one of his great captaines or other to inuade Epirus, and the other parts of Albania; and so gaining sometime one part, and sometime another, had subdued most part thereof. And about this time his army lay at the siege of Croia: for reliefe wherof, the Venetians (in whose protection it was) sent Franciscus Contarenus, a noble gentleman, their lieutenant, with such forces as were sufficient for the raising of the siege. He finding the Turks in the plaine of Tyranna, gaue them battell; which a great while stood doubtfull: at length victorie inclining to the Venetians, the Turks began to flie; after whom the Venetians made no great pursuit, but contented to haue put them to flight, tooke their tents, with such forts as they had raised against the citie. Thus whilest the E Venetians thinke themselues in sure possession of the victory, & out of feare of their enemies, they were through their owne too much securitie, by and by themselues ouerthrowne: For whilst the common soldiers hauing their minds more set vpon the spoile, than vpon the pursuit of the enemie (the battel as yet scarce ended) scatter themselues, & the captains were consulting, whether they should lodge that night (which began then to approch) in the enemies tents, or not; in the middest of their consultation, the Turks hauing perceiued their disorder, suddenly returned againe vpon them, and without great resistance ouerthrew them, and put them to flight. In which flight a thousand of them fell, amongst whom Contarenus the Generall, and diuers others of good place and calling, were slaine also. This ouerthrow the Venetians tooke a great deale better than that which shortly after followed in the confines of Italie, at the riuer of Sontium.

F Mahomet hauing conquered a great part of Albania, and dayly incroaching vpon the Christians, made diuers incursions into the countries of Dalmatia, Histria, and Carniola; yea, and sometimes went so far, that he and his Turks entred into the prouince of Friuli, called in antient time Forum Iulij, a part of the Venetian seigniorie, and so carried away with them many prisoners, with much spoile. For remedie whereof, the Venetians with exceeding charge and wonderful labour fortified alongst the riuer of Sontium, from Goritia, to the tens of Aquilea, the space of twelue miles, and there built two Forts, wherein they continually kept strong garrisons for the defence of the country. Whereby the countrey people thinking themselues now in safetie, began to fall into securitie (the dangerous sickneſſe of all commonweales) neglecting by their carefull watch to foresee a farre off the enemies comming, as they had before vsed. It fortuned at this time, that Asa-beg (whom some call Marbecke) one of the Turks great captains, vpon the sudden when no such thing was feared, came and shewed himself in an euening vpon the further side of the riuer of Sontium, with 1000 horsemen: vpon the sight of whom, an alarme was raised in both forts, and euery man put himselfe in readinesse, as if they should euen presently haue ioyned battell: but it was so nigh night, as that nothing could as then be done; yet the Venetian garrisons ioyning themselues together, watcht all that night in arms. There was at that time in both these forts, 3000 horsemen, and some few companies of footmen, all vnder the command of Hieronimus Nowel Countie of Verona, a famous captain of that time: who with the rest of the captaines resolued if they could, to keepe the Turkes from passing the riuer; if not, then to giue them battel. Marbecke Generall of the Turks armie, taking good view of the place, in the night time secretly conueyed a thousand of his best soldiers ouer the riuer, foure miles off, in such a place as the Venetians feared least, deeming it impossible for any man, there to haue passed ouer. These men he appointed to lie close in ambush behind a great hil, in sight, not far from the other side of the riuer, and vpon a signe giuen, presently to discouer themselues and charge the enemie. The next morning verie early, he sent certaine troups of his readiest horsmen ouer the riuer, which by offering to skirmish with the Venetians, might draw them into the field; and then as men in doubt whether to fight or to flie, to tole them on to the place where the ambush lay. The Venetians had diuided themselues into three battalions; whereof the Generall himselfe had the leading of the first, who seeing these disordred troups comming to skirmish with him, encountred them fiercely, and easily put them to flight (being so determined before) & in that flight earnestly pursued them; especially the Counties son, a valiant yong gentleman, who with others like himselfe, thought by that dayes good seruice to gaine vnto themselues great honour. When the Turks General saw that the Venetians following the chase, were gone a great way from the riuer, he forthwith passed ouer with the rest of his armie, and followed the Venetians at the heeles: which the Turks which before fled, now beholding, turned againe vpon their fierce enemies, and valiantly withstood them. At which very instant the other Turks vpon signe giuen arising out of ambush, came downe from the hill Licinis, with such violence and clamour, that the Venetians therewith discouraged, would haue fled if they could haue told which way: but they were on euery side so beset, that there was no way left for them to escape; but were there all slaine, except some few which yeelded themselues, and so were saued. The other two battalions of the Venetians, discouraged with the slaughter of the first, fled incontinently, and in flying were many of them slaine. In this battell the Countie himselfe, with his sonne, and many other notable gentlemen, and halfe the horsemen, were lost. The Turks incouraged with this victorie, the next day spoyled all the country of Friuli, betwixt the riuers of Sontium, (otherwise called Lisonzo) and Tiliauentum, and cruelly burnt all the country before them; so that at once 100 country vilages were to be seen on a light fire together, which stood so thick, that it seemed as if one continuall fire had wholly couered all the face of the country. The barbarous Turks laden with the spoile of that rich country, and driuing before them great numbers of miserable captiues, as if they had bin flocks of sheepe, returned to Sontium. But when they had passed the riuer, and had trauelled homeward one days journey, and all men thought they had now bin quite gone, they suddenly returned backe again, and posting thorow the country they had before spoyled, came to the riuer of Tiliauentū, which they desperatly passed, & did no lesse harme on that side the riuer, than they had before on the other: and so carrying away with them what they pleased, returned by the same way they came, hauing filled all that part of Italy with terror and feare. This ouerthrow of Sontium the Venetians account amongst the greatest losses which they receiued from the Turks in all these their long warres.

The Turks shew themselues at the riuer of Sontium.

1478. The next yeare about Harueſt the Turks came againe with a farre greater power: and passing the riuer of Sontium, came before the Forts of Gradisca, where Carolus Fortebrachius lay

A lay with a strong garrison of the Venetians, offering him skirmish, so to haue drawne him into the field. But the wary captaine considering the great strength of the enemie, and the losse receiued the yeare before, would not be drawne out of his strength, but stood vpon his guard, expecting to take the enemie at some more aduantage: which thing the Turks fearing, durst not disperse themselues abroad for the spoile of the countrey, leauing so strong a garrison of the enemies behinde them. And therefore when they had gone about foure miles into the countrey, they turned their course vp into the mountaines (which are part of the Alpes) towards Germanie, and there grieuously spoyled the mountainie people; strangely passing through those abrupt and high mountaines with their horses, where men could hardly either goe or stand on foot without somthing to stay vpon. And so when they had done what harme they could, taking a great compasse about, returned home another way.

F When Aly-Beg had thus lien before the citie ten dayes, came Taut Gaiela the great Bassa of Constantinople with fiue and twentie thousand souldiers, and about twelue thousand camels, for most part laden with metall in masse, for to make great Ordnance of, and other necessaries for the campe. The Bassaes great and stately Tent of purple colour, was pitched vpon the

the top of an high hil called the Baſſaes hill, becauſe in that place Selyman Baſſa had lien in the former ſiege about foure yeares before: the Baſſaes armie lay encamped betwixt the ſame hill and the towne. This Tanr Gaiola was borne in Epirus of baſe parentage, and was from thence by the Turks carried away young to Conſtantinople; where for his ſharpneſſe of wit and rare actiuitie, he grew into ſuch fauour, firſt with Mahomet, and afterward with Baiazet his ſonne, that he was by them promoted to the greateſt places of honor, next vnto themſelues: wherein he became ſo popular, and had ſo poſſeſſed the hearts of the people, that it was ſuſpected of ſome, he would haue aſpired to the Turkiſh empire himſelfe. Preſently after the comming of this great Baſſa, workmen were ſet a worke about the caſting of the great ordnance, and making readie of other things for the ſiege. The Chriſtians alſo were no leſſe buſie about their fortifications, the Gouernor appointing vnto euery man his charge, and which part of the wal to defend: yet keeping continually in the maket place certaine companies (with the enſignes of S. Marke, and S. Stephen) to ſerue as freſh ſupplies, as need or occaſion ſhould require. Whilſt the great ordnance was in caſting, the Baſſa caſued a great bridge of timber to be made ouer the riuer, that ſo he might at his pleaſure paſſe ouer his men, and command both ſides of the riuer. The Chriſtians in the meane time with vigilant eye ſo attending the Turks, that none of them could ſtirre within ſhot, but he was forthwith ſet off and ſlaine.

The thirteenth of Iune, Muſtapha the Beglerbeg or Viceroy of Aſia (commonly called the great Baſſa of Natolia) came alſo in great pompe to the ſiege with thirtie thouſand ſouldiers brought out of Aſia; perſonable men, but not accounted ſo good ſouldiers as they of Europe: for it is a common ſaying among the Turks, That the men of Europe, and the horſes of Aſia doe beſt ſeruice. This great Baſſa was honorably met and welcomed by the other great Baſſa of Conſtantinople, and was quartered vpon another ſide of the citie, where his rich pauillion (all of Greene) was pitcht in a vineyard about a mile from the towne. Muſtapha to proue the courage of his ſouldiers, propounded a reward to which ſoeuer of them, as durſt aduenture but to goe and touch the wals of the citie: vpon which occaſion, two of his ſouldiers paſſing well mounted, attempted to haue performed that enterpriſe. But making what haſt they could poſſibly, they were both ſlaine from the wall, and one of their bodies recouered by certaine valiant ſouldiers which ſallied out of the towne, and his head being cut off, was vpon a launce ſet vpon the wals for the Turks to behold.

Two of the Turks attempt to touch the wals of Scodra, are both ſlaine, and one of their heads ſet vp vpon the wal.

The fifteenth of Iune, 5600 Ianizaries came into the campe, with foure white enſignes: at whoſe comming all the ſouldiers of both the Baſſaes camps gaue a wonderfull ſhout, & welcomed them with great ioy. Theſe are the great Turks guard and beſt ſouldiers, in whom the greateſt ſtrength of his kingdome conſiſteth, and are called the ſons of the great Sultan. After whoſe comming Mahomet himſelfe was daily expected. Three dayes after, came two other great men, attended vpon with a number of followers, who by their countenance, and the great reuerance done vnto them by the reſt of the Turks, ſeemed to be men of great place and authoritie: theſe men deſired, that they might with ſafetie ſpeake with the Gouernour of the citie, and the reſt of the captaines, to deliuer vnto them ſuch a meſſage, as they had for their good (as they ſaid) brought vnto them from Mahomet. Which their requeſt being granted, the elder of them, after he had with many glorious words ſet forth the power of his maſter, and what he had done to other great cities, with their Princes; and further ſhewed into what danger they were like to fall, if they ſhould long ſtand vpon their defence: he began to perſuade them to yeeld vp the citie, aſſuring them of all kind vſage, with many rich rewards from the great Emperor; whereas otherwiſe, they were to expect nothing but extreme miſerie & moſt ſhamefull death. Whereunto anſwer was in the name of them all giuen by the mouth of Petrus Pagnanus, a graue and worthie citizen, That they were not afraid of the greatnes of Mahomet, or of any thing hee had done, or could doe: and that he ſhould find it hard to inforce them, but impoſſible to perſuade them to deliuer their citie: and therefore that he might at his pleaſure vſe his forces againſt men fully reſolued rather to yeeld vnto nature her laſt due, than to hearken to any compoſition: and in concluſion told them, that if they ſhould at any time after make any ſuch motion, they ſhould not expect any other anſwer than from the mouth of the Cannon. With which ſhort anſwer theſe great men departed, not a little diſcontented.

At this ſame time the ſtrong city of Croia (which the worthy Scanderbeg had liuing ſo honorably defended, and dying had left it with his kingdome, in the protection and poſſeſſion of the the Venetians) hauing holden out a yeares ſiege, after that all the kingdome of Epirus and moſt part of Albania was loſt, for lacke of victuals was yeelded vp vnto the Turke, vpon condition, That the hungerſtarued defendants (who then ſeemed rather ghoſts than men) might at their pleaſure in ſafetie depart: which agreement the faithleſſe Turke brake and without mercie put them al to the ſword. This heauy news was deliuered to them of Scodra by certain Chriſtians in the Turks campe: wherwith they were much grieued, but nothing at all diſcouraged.

Whiles the Turks thus lay at the ſiege, the watermen, of whom a great number liued vpon the great lake of Scodra (being in circuit about one hundred miles) came many times downe the riuer by night, and did much harme in the Turks campe: for remedie whereof, they were inforced to build certaine ſmall gallies to keepe them in, who for all that, many times ſtole ſecretly vpon them, and much troubled them.

The two and twentieth of Iune, the Turks mounted two great peeces of ordance vpon the top of the hill whereon the Baſſa lay; whereof the one carried a bullet, made of an hard kind of round ſtone, of three hundred pound weight, and the other a bullet of foure hundred, wherewith they began to batter the towne foure daies: after that, they placed a third peece of artillerie at the foot of the ſame hil; which deliuered a bullet of foure hundred pound weight: and the next day they planted a fourth peece, greater than the reſt, about the middle of the ſame hill; which carried a ſhot of ſix hundred and fiftie pound weight. In this while, eight thouſand of the Turks ſoldiers, called Aſapi (which are knowne from the Ianizaries by their red caps, whereas the Ianizaries weare white) came into the campe. And ſhortly after came Mahomet himſelfe with all his armie to the riuer of Drimon, whither the two great Baſſaes of Aſia and Conſtantinople went with great pompe and triumph to meet him.

The order of Mahomets campe.

The ſecond of Iuly, Mahomet with all his armie before the riſing of the Sun came to the campe before Scodra: where after he had well viewed the ſcituation thereof, he is reported to haue ſaid, O what a faire and ſtately place hath the Eagle choſen out for her ſelfe to build her neaſt, and to hatch her young ones in. Diuers rich pauillions were ſet vp for Mahomet himſelfe, but one far greater than the reſt, diſtant from them about a flight ſhoot, which was the place wherin he held his counſell; the other were for his one priuat vſe. Round about theſe his tents, lay the Ianizaries incamped, a good diſtance off; yet ſo cloſe one to another, as if it had bin a perpetuall rampire or ſtrong trench, wherinto was but one entrance, continually guarded with a moſt ſtrong guard. Round about the Ianizaries lay all the reſt of the armie encamped: ſo that al the countrie as farre as a man could ſee was couered, and white with tents, much like as when the ground in Winter is couered ouer with a deepe ſnow: and ſtill more people reſorted to the campe daily; ſo that it was deemed by men of great experience, that Mahomet had then in his armie of al ſorts of people, about 350000 men, al gaping to deuoure that poore city: a ſight of it ſelfe ſufficient to haue daunted the courage of right valiant men: but what can be terrible to them that feare not to die? Againſt this terror of the enemie, the defendants were notably encouraged by the comfortable perſuaſions and exhortations of one Bartholomeus, a preacher, (ſometimes one of the worthie Scanderbegs ſouldiers) who afterwards giuing himſelfe to the ſtudie of diuinitie, became a zealous preacher, and in this ſiege did notably comfort the Chriſtian defendants againſt the terror of ſo great an armie of miſcreants. All this while the batterie was ſtil maintained; and the fifth of Iuly the Turks mounted two other great peeces, whereof the one was like vnto the former before mounted, but the other placed vpon the middle of the Baſſaes mount, was of an incredible greatneſſe, diſcharging a ſhot of twelue hundred pound weight, and was called the Princes peece, in whoſe name it was with much cunning and induſtrie made: with which huge peece, the Turks euen from the beginning of the ſiege had threatned the beſieged, willing them to expect the comming of the Princes Peece. The next day they planted vpon the ſame mount a ſeuenth peece, which carried a ſhot of fiue hundred and fiftie pound weight: from which time they battered the citie with the aforeſaid ſeuen great peeces, and ceaſed not oftentimes by night out of their great mortar peeces, to caſt great bals of wild fire into the city, ſo to haue ſet it on fire: wherby diuers of the citizens were inforced to vncouer their houſes couered with ſhingle, & by men appointed for that purpoſe, to watch the fal of ſuch fireworks, & ſo to quench the ſame: which they ſo carefully looked to, as that the deuiſe of the enemy tooke no effect at all. At the ſame time alſo the Turks out of their ſhort mortar peeces, caſt huge great ſtones of incredible weight, which falling from hie, did moſt most terribly crush in peeces whatsoeuer thing they light vpon, wherewith the defendants were wonderfully troubled. In few daies after, the enemie mounted three other great peeces, whereof one was greater than that was called the Princes, and carried a bullet of thirteen hundred weight: from which time they daily battered the citie with ten such peeces, as the like hath seldome times beene heard of: and the arrowes fell so thicke into the citie, as if it had bin continuall showers of haile, so that no man could goe or well stirre in the streets without hurt. Yet in the midst of all these dangers the Christians valiantly defended the city, and with their deadly shot from the wals and mounts exceedingly annoyed the enemie. The eleuenth of Iuly the Turks mounted another great peece like vnto the former, vpon the Bassa's mount, and the same day battered the wals with a hundred seuentie eight shot of this huge artillery.

Mahomet hauing by the furie of his great ordnance, beaten downe a great part of the wall, and that now nothing stood in his way but such simple repaires as the defendants had made of timber & planks, with earth cast in betwixt, was in good hope in short time to become master of the towne: and therefore sent certaine companies of his Ianizaries and other soldiers (which he with continuall supplies of fresh men stil relieued) to assault the breaches, so if it were possible to enter the town, or at least wise to burn such fortifications of timber as the defendants had made. But that which seemed vnto him at first so easie, he found in execution ful of difficultie & danger: for the Turks approching the breach, found there resolute men, a surer defence than any wall: whose valiant courage serued in stead of a strong bulwarke. So whilst the Turks desperatly striue in the face of the breach either to enter or to set fire vpon the new fortifications made for most part of timber, and the defendants with no lesse resolution doe what they may to the vtmost to repulse them, many were on both sides slain, but especially of the assailants. Which Mahomet wel perceiuing, & that by that manner of assault he gained nothing but notable losse & spoile of his best men, caused a retreat to be sounded, & his battery to be again forthwith renewed; euery day shaking the wal with 160 or 180 most terrible great shot, and one day with 194, the greatest batterie that he made in one day during that siege.

After this great batterie, the tyrant caused a fresh assault to be giuen, but with little or rather worse successe than before: for though diuers of the defendants, and among them, some of good place, as Franciscus Patauinus, Franciscus Scorbaro, two Italian captains, and some other of the better sort of the citizens were there slaine with the great shot, whereof the enemie that day discharged into the breaches 193, yet were they with greater losse enforced againe to retire, and with shame to giue ouer the assault.

Notwithstanding this repulse, Mahomet continuing his batterie with no lesse furie than before, still sought by force of his artillerie to open a way into the citie: and the third day after the former assault, gaue a more furious and desperate attempt vnto the citie than before, insomuch that the Turks were in the breaches come to handy strokes with the Christians, and there made a most cruell and deadly fight; wherein many fell on both sides, but of the Turks most; yet were there many of the Christians also slaine, especially with the Turks great ordnance. It was a right ruthfull sight to haue seene the rampiers at the great gate of the citie beaten downe flat to the ground, and to lie full of the rent bodies of the Christians: at which place the enemie so preuailed, that he was euen now readie to haue entered, for the Turks so furiously assailed the defendants, and the murthring shot from the Bassaes mount fell so thicke and so terribly into the breach, beside the infinit number of arrowes, that there was scarce any of the Christians which defended that place, but they were either slaine or grieuously wounded. But when all seemed now almost desperat and forlorne, and the greedie enemie euen readie to deuoure his prey, a new supplie of lustie souldiers well armed, came couragiously to the breach, and as Lyons encountering the enemie, draue him dowue againe, and so enforced him with great losse to retire. Mahomet grieued with this repulse, in his furie caused 173 great shot to be discharged into the citie, and afterwards sending for his great Bassaes and other his principall men of war, declared vnto them his mind, as followeth:

Mahomet purposing to giue a general assault, encourageth his captaines and souldiers thereunto.

I thinke none of you are ignorant (right worthie souldiers) that now it is the third moneth since this citie hath by vs beene most straitly besieged, and with all manner of Artillerie and engines of warre impugned, assaulted, and on euery side assailed, the wals thereof vtterly subuerted, and the bulwarkes layed flat with the ground, and (as you see) as euen as may be raised: besides that, so oft as wee haue set fire vpon vpon their fortresses, so often we haue prouoked them of Scodra to fight, and haue also much vexed them with assaults. Last of all, as you know, we haue left nothing vnproued, nothing vnattempted, which could be deuised, the easilier to ouercome them, being wearied, worne out, and their strength spent. Wherefore (in mine opinion) the matter is not longer to be put off or delayed, but euen to morrow before the enemie can recouer his strength or repaire his breaches, let vs enclose the citie round, and giue them a generall and terrible assault: and therefore euery one of you make your selues readie, and exhort your souldiers in the campe, that they euery one of them to morrow with the dawning of the day come forth armed and well appointed for the winning of the citie. Now will I proue and know them that are worthie of my pay. Thou the Bassa of Constantinople, with thy squadrons and certaine companies of the Ianizaries our faithfull guard, giue charge vnto the breach: in the meane time, let the Bassa of Asia with his power assault the other parts of the citie: let euery man make readie and bring with him what so is needfull for this generall assault; my mind giueth me, that to morrow before this time we shall winne the citie: for who is there can resist vs? The towne (as you see) is bared both of wall and of all other defence: the bulwarkes and ditches are laied euen, and an easie way for vs to come vnto it: the citizens themselues wearie with so many fights and assaults faint and want strength; whereas we are still fresh and lustie: they in number few, we almost innumerable: besides that, we farre passe them in the force of our artillerie, wherewith many of them shall perish in the defending of the breaches. Who then can gainesay, but that they of Scodra are alreadie our prisoners? Where, vpon such as remaine alme, I will at my pleasure vse the law of armes and captiuitie. On therefore courageous hearts without further delay. Is not the very name of Scodra hatefull vnto vs? For which of you doth not with great disdaine call to remembrance the death of your parents, or brethren, or friends, or companions, cruelly slaine vnder these wals? Can you digest your hatred against them of Scodra? And so many slaughters of your friends, by them made? But to forget elder times, and the harmes receiued from them long since, let vs but looke vpon our late slaughters and wounds as it were yet bleeding: it is not yet full foure yeares since that we made warre with these men of Scodra, wherein so many thousands of our people fell, that their slaughter is yet almost obiects before our eyes, and their bloud craueth reuenge. This very hill whereon we stand, and the stones yet seeme besprinckled and polluted with their bloud. Wherefore haste you as men of courage: Take vp armes, valiantly mount the hill, assault the towne, and reuenge your old iniuries. Glut your selues to the full in the effusion of the Christian bloud whereunto our lawes doe so much exhort vs, and doe what you may with force and sword, that not one of them of Scodra may bee left aliue: which you may easily bring to passe, hauing all things thereunto needfull: for there is nothing to withstand you, nothing wanting for the gaining of the victorie. All things are prepared, all things are readie: an easie matter it is for a strong man to ouercome the weake and feeble, that wanteth strength as doe they.

This speech of the barbarous tyrant, was receiued with great applause & good liking of the hearers: and now was Scodra to be with all might & maine assaulted, and not a man there left aliue. Hereupon proclamation was made throughout the campe, That euery man vpon paine of death should be readie against the appointed time: and the great captains and commanders of the armie departing from Mahomet, went vp to the top of the hil wheron the Bassa lay, and from thence taking view of the citie, and laying their heads together, consulted how they might best giue the assault. The defendants on the other side alwaies expecting their enemies houering ouer their heads, left nothing vndon that they could possibly deuise, for the defence of themselues & the citie. Now vpon the top of the Bassaes mount, was a royal pauillion erected, richly couered with purple, from whence the proud tyrant might plainly behold all the assault. who with the dawning of the day (being the 22 of Iuly) entering the same, the Turkes who in the couert of the night had conueied themselues, as neere vnto the wals as they could vpon the signall of battell giuen by a tire of ordnance discharged from the Bassaes mount, suddenly ran to the breaches as thicke as bees, in hope by their sudden approch to haue taken the Christians at some aduantage, wherin they were much deceiued. For they alwayes doubting such a matter, & carefully obseruing the least motion of the enemie, were alwaies in readines to meet with their attempts: so that the Turks desperatly striuing to gain the breaches, and the Christians valiantly defending the same, there was in diuers places begun a most cruell and mortall fight: but especially neere vnto the great gate, where the furie of the cannon had made the wals most faultable. There the enemie was come to fight hand to hand, and preuailing uailing vpon the defendants, had set vp one of the Turks ensignes vpon the top of the rampiers; which Mahomet beholding, reioyced exceedingly, thinking the citie now as good as taken. But the Christians seeing the danger, speedily repaired thither with new supplies, and by plaine force draue the enemie out again, & beat him from the rampiers. Vpon them also that were comming vp, they cast downe peeces of timber, great stones, wildfire, pots of lime, and such other things as might most annoy them: as for shot, none fell in vaine by reason of the wonderfull multitude of the Turkes, who stood so thicke, that a man could hardly haue cast down a graine of mustard seed from the wall but it must needs haue light vpon some of them: by which means the Turks were notably repulsed, their ensigne pluckt down, and they enforced to retire from the wals. Which sudden alteration Mahomet perceiuing, fell into a great rage, and forthwith commanded his great ordnance, with greater fury than euer, to be discharged into the breach: and with great words commanded the two chiefe Bassaes which stood by him vpon the mount, to goe presently downe and enforce the soldiers which were alreadie retired, to returne again vnto the assault. These great commanders seeing the tyrant in such a fret, forthwith descended from the hill, and where persuasion would not serue, with their drawne swords enforced the soldiers to returne backe againe to the assault. The Turks knowing that they were now in the eye of their king, and in the presence of their greatest commanders, striue with might and maine to win the rampiers: for in that place, the wals of the citie were beaten downe to the ground, shaken before this assault with 2539 shot of the cannon or other peeces of no lesse force. The Christians likewise in defence of themselues and their citie, with inuincible courage opposed themselues against the Turks: so that a more desperat fight than there, was hardly euer to be seen; desperat men with desperat band assailing one another: and the more to increase the terror of the day, the thundering shot, with the clamor of men, and noise of the instruments of warre, was so great, as if heauen and earth should haue presently fallen together; and arrowes falling into the citie as if it had bin showers of rain, oftentimes darkened the light of the day. In this dreadfull fight, many of the defendants were slain; but of the Turks, twenty to one. Neere vnto that gate where this terrible assault was giuen, were certaine loupes hewen out of the maine rocke, which flanked the ditch all alongst that side of the citie, out of which the Christians with their murthering shot made lanes amongst their enemies, and slew them without number. For all that, the mightie Bassaes and great captains, one while by persuasion, another while by threatning, forced them still forward, and if any turned backe, presently slew him: so that the Turks seeing no lesse danger in retiring than in fighting against the enemie, like desperat men thrust forward by heapes, and were slaine without number. Yet still pressing on so long as life lasted, and others stepping forward in stead of them that were slaine, they began againe to preuaile vpon the defendants (who in that place were for most part either slaine or hurt) and againe recouered the top of the rampiers, and there aduanced the Turks ensignes. Then began the tyrant to lift vp his head, making sure account that the city was now his owne. But as the common saying is, He that reckoneth without his hoast, must reckon twise, so chanced it to Mahomet. For the companies, from the beginning of the siege left in the market place readie for all euents, & oftentimes wishing for some occasion wherein to shew themselues, being now in good time aduertised of the imminent danger, came with speed to the place of the assault before the Turks had taken good footing; and there valiantly encountring them, slew a great number of them, and forced the rest from the rampiers; and plucking downe their ensignes before set vp, in stead of them placed their owne. With which repulse the Turks were so dismaied, that they quite forsooke the assault, and in despight of their imperious commanders, not expecting any signe of retrait, in hast retired to their campe. Mahomet fallen from so great an hope, and grieued aboue measure with this shamefull repulse, returned into his pauillion fretting & fuming as a man halfe mad, where two daies he tormented himself with his own passions, not admitting any man to his presence. The Christians afterwards tooke the spoile of the dead Turks, and cutting off diuers of their heads, set them vp vpon poles round about the citie, to the terrour of their fellowes. In this assault were 12000 of the Turkes slaine, and many moe wounded. Of the Christians were lost 400: and of them that came to the breach escaped none, but he was wounded more or lesse.

A most terrible assault.

Twelue thousand Turkes slaine in the last assault.

After that Mahomet had two daies digested the last repulse, the shame wherof grieued him more than the losse it selfe; hee sent for both the great Bassaes of Constantinople and Asia, and

A and other two of his chiefe Counsellors, with whom he resolued to giue another assault, and thereon to gage his whole forces: for they were all of opinion with him, That the defendants were so weakned & wasted with the former assault, that they could not possibly hold out another. Whereupon straight commandment was giuen thorow the campe, that euery man without exception should be readie to go to the assault whensoeuer they were called vpon: & the more to incourage the soldiers, great rewards and preferments were promised to them which in time of the assault should performe any especiall piece of seruice. The first appearance of the new Moone (which the Turks worship with great deuotion) was the time that Mahomet had appointed for this generall assault: in the mean time he spared not to poure out his furie against the walls and rampiers of the town, by the mouth of the canon. The Christian defendants on the other side, first by heartie prayer commended themselues and their Citie to the protection of the Almightie, and afterwards with restlesse labour and no small perill, speedily repaired and new fortified whatsoeuer the furie of the artillerie had ouerthrowne or shaken; omitting nothing that could be done or deuised for the defence of themselues and their citie. Now as soon as the new moon began to shew her selfe, the Mahometan priests going about the armie, gaue the soldiers knowledge thereof (as their manner is) by singing of a song in manner of a procession; whereunto the whole armie answered with a short responde, but with such a terrible noise as was wonderfull to heare; and at the same time bowing themselues to the ground, salured the Moon with great superstition. All their fond ceremonies performed, they began to draw nigh the citie so thicke, and in number so many, that all the ground for the space of a mile round about Scodra, was thicke coueted with men. The Christians expecting euerie houre to be assailed, were readie vpon the walls and rampiers of the citie, to repulse the enemie: but especially at the great gate where most danger was feared, for that the Turkes with their great Ordnance had made that place of all others most faultable. Here Iacobus Moneta a noble captain, with his brother Moncinus a valiant gentleman, tooke vpon them to receiue the first assault, which is commonly of all others most terrible: for the Turks vse in their assults to giue three attempts, whereof the first is most furious and dangerous, as performed by their best soldiers: the other two are of lesse force; but if they faile in all three, they forsake the enterprise as men discouraged. Whilest both the assailants and the defendants stood thus in readines, the one as it were facing the other a great part of the night, Mahomet before day went vp to the top of the Bassa's mount, from whence he had before beholden the former assault: at whose comming there were presently 11 canons discharged, and 12 smaller Pieces (the signal appointed for the assault.) The Turks vpon this signe giuen, with exceeding tumult & most hideous outcrie (as their manner is) began to assaile the citie round, and with such wonderful agilitie of bodie and courage mounted the rampiers at the great gate, that they had there as it were in a trice set vp one of their ensignes, which was forthwith pluckt vp by Moneta, & the Turks with great slaughter driuen down, where many of them were slain with stones, timber, fire, & such other things cast down vpon them; beside a great number slain or wounded with shot, arrows, and darts, whereof none fel to the ground in vain, by reason that the Turks stood so thicke, that they violently pressed one another forward, in such sort that the formost could by no meanes shun any danger, were it neuer so great or terrible. In this sort the assault was with great slaughter of the Turks continued vntil it was day; they striuing to win the breach, and the Christians most valiantly defending the same. Moneta himself in this fight receiued diuers wounds, and was twice beaten down to the ground; yet still recouering himself, incouraged his soldiers, and worthily repulsed the enemie. Mahomet seeing his souldiers beaten from the breach, caused a tyre of his great ordnance to be discharged vpon the Christians which stood therein thicke for the defence thereof, by force whereof many of them were rent in pieces, and the rest sore dismayd: which the Turkes quickly perceiuing, and therewith encouraged, came on again with a fresh charge, forcing themselues to the vtmost to haue entred. But the valiant captain nothing discouraged either with the losse of them that were slaine, or the danger of himselfe, valiantly withstood the furious enemy, & maintained the place till new supplies came to relieue him, and departed not thence, nor suffered any man to depart, til the assault was ended. Many were slain on both sides; yet nothing troubled the defendants so much as the great ordnance, which being discharged from the Bassa's mount, into the breach, when as the Turks were driuen back, slew many of the Christians, leauing the breach almost cleere: so giuing

uing occasion for the Turks to haue entred, had not other couragious soldiers stept vp in stead of them that were slain, who manfully repulsed the enemy. The tyrant from the mount seeing the inuincible courage of the defendants, was therewith exceedingly troubled: but fully resolued now or neuer to haue it, commanded all his forces to be drawn from all other parts of the citie, to the great gate, there to renew the assault; straitly charging his captains, neuer to return thence vntill they had taken the citie. Hereupon the greatest part of that hugie army was forthwith in the sight of himselfe brought to the appointed place, and there gaue a sharpe and cruel assault at the breach, with such desperat fury, that in short time they had slain most of the defendants there present, and aduanced diuers of their ensignes vpon the top of the rampiers. Which Mahomet beholding from the Mount, rejoiced exceedingly, making sure account, that the city was now his own: but by that time he had well conceiued this hope, new supplies of fresh and couragious men (of purpose reserued for all euents) came to the place of danger, and with great resolution incountring the wearied Turks, draue them backe, cleared the breach, and ouerthrew the ensignes. Which so sudden an alteration in the breach, wrought no lesse alteration in the proud tyrants mind, his hope was turned into dispaire, and his joy into choler: insomuch that in his furie he commanded all his great artillerie to be at once discharged into the breach, whereby many of his forward and couragious souldiers were slaine togither with the defendants. At the same time, the great commanders & captains knowing themselues to be in the eye of their imperious lord and master, with their drawn swords forced the poore soldiers again forward to the breach; & the more to encourage them, aduentured themselues also among them: whereby the fight became more fierce and terrible than before. Many of the Turks were there slaine; yet such was the force and multitude of them which still stept vp in their place, and bullets and arrowes flew so thicke, that the defendants oppressed with multitude, and ouerwhelmed with shot, were hardly able longer to maintain the place, being for most part either slain or wounded. Wherupon a great crie ran apon the sudden thorow the city, that euery man without exception should forthwith repaire to the breach. Which was with such cherefulnes done, that in lesse time than was to haue bin thought, a wonderful multitude of all sorts of people was there met togither, encouraging one another against the present danger; who all as men resolued to lay down their liues in defence of their country, valiantly encountred the Turks vpon the top of the rampiers, and so hardly laid vnto them, that notwithstanding their great number, they began now again to wauer and shrinke back. Which thing the tyrant perceiuing from the mount, in great rage commanded his canoniers, as fast as they could to discharge the great ordnance into the breach, without regard of his own men, so that together with them he might also kil some of the Christians: and withall imperiously commanded his captaines, with all their force and power to maintaine the assault, threatning them with most horrible death, if they returned without victorie. Hereupon the assault was again renewed, euery man (in shew at least) set downe there to doe his last deuoire. But the great ordnance still playing vpon the breach, slew many of the Turks, as well as of the Christians. Thrise the great shot fell amongst the Turks themselues, and rent in sunder a great number of them which were formost, to the great discouragement of the rest: whereof the tyrant had small regard, so that togither with them he might also diminish the number of the defendants. Neuertheless, such was the desperat furie of the enemie, that the citie was in no small danger to haue been presently taken, had not fresh supplies come from other parts of the city which they were appointed vnto; who with great courage resisted the enemie. Yet the Turks far exceeding in number (and fresh men continually stepping vp in stead of them which lay by heapes vnder their feet, and serued them in stead of steps to get vp to the rampiers) maintained a long and terrible fight: at which time the great ordnance also sore annoyed the defendants, so that with one shot (whereby the greatnesse of the harms done at other times may be gathred) eighteen of the Christian defendants were slaine. As for arrowes, they flew as thicke as haile into the citie, so that they obscured the light of the day, and lay in most places of the street a span thicke: so that for the space of a moneth after, the inhabitants vsed no other fuell to burne, but Turkish arrowes. It was a ruthfull sight, to haue seene the bodies of the valiant Christians rent in sunder with the great shot, and peeces of them cleauing vpon euerie wall thereabout, euery street was stained with their bloud, the great ordnance continually thundred, Churches and houses came ratling downe, yea the heauie countenance of the ayre

A wofull sight.

A aire it self seemed to bewaile the miserie of the poore Christians: besides, the noyse of trumpets, drums, and other instruments of warre, with the horrible crie of the hellish Turks, was so great and hideous, that it seemed as if heauen and earth should haue gone together: nothing was to be heard but the verie terror of the eare; nothing to be seene but death, and the verie instruments of death. And now in this extremitie a fearefull crie ran through the citie, That without present helpe all would be lost at the great gate: whereupon not onely they which were whole, (which were the fewest in number) but they also which lay wounded or sicke in their beds, chering vp themselues, with weapons in their hands ranne with speed to the place where the danger was; chusing rather there to die, than to be slain in their beds. Thus whilest the Christians of all sorts, and from all parts of the citie, ran desperatly to the gate, the Turkes
B were on euerie side hardly pressed, and in great number slain; yet fresh men still comming vp, as if they had sprung out of the earth, the deadly fight was by them still maintained: for the Turks on the one side, for feare of the tyrant, laboured with might and main to win the citie; and the Christians on the other, knowing no hope left for them if they should be ouercome, with no lesse resolution defended the same. In this obstinacie of mindes many fell on both sides; sometimes the Turks seemed to haue the better, and were straitway by the Christians put to the worse. Which manner of mortall fight, with doubtfull euent, was continued most part of that day; vntil that at length many being on both parts slaine, and the rest for the most part sore wounded and hurt, the furie of the assault began to assuage: for the Turkes now wearie of that long and deadly fight, and fainting with their wounds, had no great stomacke to mount vp the rampiers, where they saw no hope to preuaile, but all things threat-
C ning present death. Mahomet beholding the wonderfull slaughter of his men, and that hauing done what was possible for men to doe, they now fought as men discouraged; and in despaire of victorie himselfe, caused a retrait to be sounded, which the Turkes no sooner heard, but that they left the assault, and without order ran to their tents, as men halfe feared out of their wits.

Of this victorie, the Christians (as they had good cause) reioyced greatly: yet was this joy mingled with much sorrow and heauinesse, for the losse of such worthie men as were slaine in that assault, many of whose bodies they were glad to gather vp by piecemeale, some here, some there, some cleauing on this wall & some on that: which they, as the time would giue
D leaue, honorably buried with the rest of the slain. At which time also, they with all diligence and expedition repaired their breaches, and put all things in such readinesse, as if they should haue presently receiued a fresh assault.

Mahomet wonderfully grieued with the shamefull dishonour and great losse he had receiued at the last assault, repented himselfe that euer he had taken the matter in hand, wishing that he had neuer heard of the name of Scodra: and in his choler and franticke rage most horribly blasphemed against God, most wickedly saying, That it were enough for him to haue care of heauenly things, and not to crosse him in his worldly actions; in which furie he descended from the Mount, and got him into his tent, where he againe tormented himselfe with his melancholie passions by the space of two dayes; wherein he would neither be spoke withall, or E admit any man to his presence. Vpon the third day he called a generall Councell of his commanders and best souldiers, and thereupon openly before them all sayd, That he was determined to giue the enemie a fresh assault, for that being weakened with so many assaults, he could not possibly be able to hold out another; and therefore hoped for an easie victorie. But he had no sooner so sayd, but that all they that heard him, cried out with one voyce to the contrarie; saying, That it was not by any meanes to be attempted, for as much as his best souldiers were alreadie slaine, and the greater part of them that were left, either sore wounded, or brought to that weaknesse, that they were not able to doe any more seruice; and that therefore it were better for them to kill one another, or else himselfe to kill them one by one, than to expose
F them to be so shamefully butchered by the Christians. In this diuersitie of opinions, Achmetes Bassa the great champion of the Turkes (a man reuerend and of great authoritie, for his birth, yeares, and rare experience in martiall affaires, and one by whom Mahomet had done great matters) standing vp, with pleasing speech calmed his furious mind, and with substantiall reasons, perswaded him to desist from that his intended purpose, and to take another surer course, as followeth:

Your great valour and worthie praises, inuincible Emperour (sayd he) who is able to expresse? the greatnesse whereof the mind of man cannot conceiue, and my dull spirit but wonder at; my tongue faltereth to speake of them, neither would this time serue so much as to recount them. It is of all men deemed a thing of great honour (most dread Soueraigne) when a Prince hath receiued a Kingdome from his Ancestours, to be able in safetie to keepe and defend the same: greater than this is it, honourably to increase and augment it, so left: but of a small thing, by worthie prowesse to bring it to the highest type of worldly honour, is of all other things the greatest. Which most rare excellencie, all men worthily ascribe vnto your perfection and felicitie: and I, of all others, can thereof bring the most assured testimonie, who haue oftentimes heard it of mine Ancestours (which following the Othoman Princes out of Asia into Europe) that your worthie predecessors at their first comming into Europe (without offence be it sayd) possessed but a corner thereof: to whom you afterward by diuine appointment succeeding, haue adioyned so many prouinces, kingdomes, and Empires, as were tedious to rehearse them. For who can worthily expresse, how you haue in Europe subdued Constantinople, the Imperiall citie of the East Empire, with all Thracia, Achaia, Grecia, Peloponesus, Bœotia, Thebes, and the noble citie of Athens the Mother and Nurse of all good learning. The Empire of Trapezond, with the Emperour thereof is by you ouerthrowne: The Kingdomes of Seruia and Bosna, with the Princes of Peloponesus, are by you gloriously vanquished. You haue at your command twelue kingdomes in Asia the lesser; Pontus, Bythinia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, Cilicia, Pamphilia, Lycia, Caria, Lydia, Phrygia, Nicomedia, and Nicea, with the famous citie of Prusa. Besides these, Ionia, Doris, Smyrna, Colophon, Ephesus, Miletum, Halicarnassus, Pergamus, with the Countrey of Taurica, are vnder your subiection. The great countrey of Armenia hath felt your force: The Islands of Lesbos, Chios, and Eubœa, are parts of your Empire. What should I speake of infinite people and Nations, by you most victoriously vanquished? This may suffice for all, That you haue gained from the Christians twentie Prouinces, and two hundred great Cities. For it were too long to rehearse the Mahometane Kings and Princes by you also vanquished: In all your expeditions all things haue yet giuen place to your fortune. The antient Monuments may now cease to extoll the praises of Cæsar, Scipio, Pyrrhus, Hannibal, and other Chiefetaines of Rome and forraine Nations: for why, they are all inferiour to you, both for victories and countries subdued. The Othoman Familie is vndoubtedly fatall for soueraigntie: all the world shall in short time come vnder your gouernment, and all Nations shall serue you. As for this towne of Scodra, let it not so much grieue you: worldly things (as you know) doe oftentimes deceiue our expectation; in them Fortune beareth great sway. Yet for this matter quiet your selfe; for I dare gage my Faith vnto your Imperiall Majestie, that I will in short time find meanes, that this citie shall stand at your deuotion. Did not I of late bring into your subiection the impregnable citie of Croia, which you so long desired? But whereas you would now againe forthwith attempt to win it by assault, I therein craue your pardon, in that I cannot be of that opinion, but must needs thinke far otherwise: for to attempt war, and to be ouerthrowne, is an easie matter for euery one to do; but to vanquish the enemy, and to carry away the triumph, that right few men know. He that consulteth of such great and waightie matters, ought to be free both from furie and desire, both euill Counsellors. The Christians of Scodra are not in my opinion to be againe assaulted. for in so doing you shall but lose your labour. For if you could not subdue them, your Armie being then fresh and strong, how shall you now ouercome them with much fewer, and they wounded, weake, and feeble? I haue viewed the whole camp, and searched euery tent; and found no place, no tent, yea scarcely any cabin, without groaning, sighing, weeping, or wailing; in euery place was heauinesse, sorrow, mourning, and death it selfe: for in the last assault you lost thirtie thousand and more, of your best soldiers: many moe are grieuously wounded and maimed; none, but he carrieth about him some signe that he was there: few or none there be that dare againe mount the hill to giue a fresh assault, they are all so affraid and discouraged. Whom when I demanded, how so great a feare was come vpon them, and what was the cause they had so lost their wonted courage? they answered me, That it was the looke, euen the verie looke of them of Scodra, whose eyes did seeme vnto them, to burne and sparkle with fire: their sterne and terrible countenances (said they) haue strooke this terror into vs. Wherefore I thinke it not good to giue a fresh assault with men so dismayed; but rather to vse policie and delay, against such resolute enemies. This Citie of Scodra is the eye and head of all this Prouince, which the Venetians haue notably fortified, and planted with store of ordnance, and of all things else necessarie for defence thereof; but especially with most valiant Souldiers, of purpose chosen out of many their Garrisons, for defence of this Citie. You haue not now to doe with the weake and effeminate people of Asia, but with the

A the hard and rough people of Epirus. And you know (most mightie Emperour) the strength and courage of this Nation: it is now thirtie yeares that you haue made warre against this People, and haue not yet altogether subdued them; and how dangerous and chargeable this warre hath beene vnto you, who knoweth not? It is now six moneths since we came first before this Citie; we haue intrenched our selues round about it, we haue day and night layd hard siege vnto it, we haue battered it of long with eleuen Cannons: I speake not of other smaller Pieces or engines of warre, with all kinds of shot and fire-works, and whatsoeuer else we could deuise. We haue many times to our cost assaulted it; what could be done by force, strength, or multitude of valiant men, is alreadie done in the former assaults: Nothing hath bin left vnattempted, no policie, no direction hath wanted in your Leaders, neither courage in your souldiers. What should I recount the innumerable great shot, or speake of our arrowes and darts, deliuered in-

B to the citie as showers of haile? Did all this, or any thing else we could doe, any thing terrifie these Defendants? Were they not, nay are they not still readie with great assurance and courage at all assayes encounter vs? You take a wrong course, by force to constraine them: they haue taken vpon them the defence of this place, and are not thence to be remooued, there shall you be sure still to find them either aliue or dead: and what account they make of their liues, you see, they will sell them vnto vs deere for their countrey, and preferre an honourable death before a seruile life. Wherefore against men so set down, policie is be vsed; and them whom we cannot by force subdue, let vs by delay and time ouercome. If you will winne Scodra, blocke it vp, build strong Forts in places conuenient round about it, and furnish them with good souldiers; make a bridge ouer Boliana, with a strong Castle on either side, to stop the passage: which done, besiege the other weaker Cities of the Venetians, which are as it were the

C limmes of Scodra; and subaue the Countrey round about, which will be no hard matter for you to doe, being master of the field: so must Scodra at length of necessitie yeeld vnto you, as of late did Croia, inforced thereunto by famine. Thus may you in safetie without slaughter of your people, come to the full of your desires.

The wholesome counsell of the Bassa so well pleased Mahomet himselfe, and the rest there present, that the assault was layd aside, and present order taken for the speedie execution of that which was so well by him plotted. Whereupon the Bassa of Constantinople with his Forces was sent to Zabiache, a citie in the borders of Dalmatia, standing vpon the lake of Scutarie, not farre from Asciuium, which in few dayes was yeelded vnto him. The Bassa pos-

D sessed of the citie, thrust out all the inhabitants, and leauing therein a garrison of Turks, returned againe to the campe at Scodra. At the same time the great Bassa of Asia was also sent by Mahomet against Driuasto a citie also of the Venetians: which when he had besieged and sore battered by the space of sixteene dayes, the great tyrant came thither in person himselfe, and the next day after his comming tooke the citie without any great resistance. Such as he found vpon the walls, he put to the sword; of the rest he tooke three hundred away with him to the campe at Scodra, and there in the face of the citie caused them all to be cruelly slaine, of purpose so to terrifie the defendants. The next day after, he sent the great Bassa of Constantinople to Lyssa, called also Alessa, a citie of the Venetians, scituated vpon the riuer Drinus, about thirtie miles from Scodra. The Bassa comming thither, found the citie desolate, (for the ci-

Lyssa taken by the Turks, and the bones of Scanderbeg digged vp by them, & had in great reuerence.

E tisens hearing of his comming, were for feare before fled) for which cause he set the citie on fire. Here the Turks digged vp the bones of the worthie Prince Scanderbeg, for the superstitious opinion they had of the vertue of them; and happie was he that could get any little part thereof to set in gold or other jewell, as a thing of great price, (as is before declared.) All these things thus done, Mahomet committed the direction of all things concerning the siege of Scodra, vnto the discretion of Achmetes; by whose persuasion he leauing a great power for the continuing of the siege, departed thence himselfe with fortie thousand soldiers, for Constantinople, cursing and banning by the way all the countrey of Epirus, all the inhabitants therein, and euery part thereof, their corne, their cattell, and whatsoeuer else was fruitful; but aboue all other things, the citie of Scodra, with all that therein was, for that he had neuer re-

F ceiued greater dishonour or losse, than there.

After his departure, which was about the seuenth of September, the two great Bassa's of Constantinople and Asia, according to order before taken, built a great bridge ouer the riuer Boliana, and on either side a strong castle, to the intent that no reliefe should that way be brought into the city. Which worke when they had brought to perfection, & furnished both castles with garrisons, ordnance, and all things necessarie, they left Achmetes Bassa with fortie thousand souldiers to continue the siege, and returned themselues, the one to Constantinople, the other into Asia. The warie and politique Bassa mindfull of the charge he had taken vpon him, tooke such order, that no reliefe could possibly be brought vnto the citie either by land or by water: and so lying still before it a long time, he brought it at length into such a distresse and want of all things, that the poore Christians were fain to eat all manner of vnclean and loathsome things; horses were daintie meat, yea, they were glad to eat dogs, cats, rats, and the skinnes of beasts sod: it exceedeth all credit, to tell at what exceeding great price a little mouse was sould, or puddings made of dogs guts. All these bare shifts and extremities the poore Christians were content to endure euen vnto the last gaspe, rather than to yeeld themselues into the hands of their mercilesse enemies.

Whilest Scodra thus lay in the suds, the Venetians wearie of the long and chargeable war they had to their great losse now maintained against so mightie an enemie by the space of sixteene yeares, and hauing no meanes to relieue their distressed subiects in Scodra, thought it best to proue if they could procure a peace from the tyrant. For which purpose they sent Benedictus Trinisanus, a great Senator, and a man of great experience, to Constantinople: who so well vsed the matter, that after long debating too and fro, at length a peace was concluded; whereof the chiefe capitulations were, That the Venetians should deliuer vnto Mahomet the citie of Scodra, the Island of Lemnos, and the strong castle of Tenarus in Peloponesus, and pay him yearely eight thousand duckats; that they might freely after their woonted manner traffique into the Euxine by the straits of Hellespontus and Bosphorus Thracius, and other parts of his dominions. Concerning the citizens of Scodra, it was comprised in the same peace, That it should be at their owne choice, either to liue there still vnder the gouernment of the Turkish Emperour, or else at their pleasure to depart in safetie with their goods whither they would. Trinisanus hauing in this manner concluded a peace, in his returne homeward, the fourth of Aprill found the Venetian Admirall riding at anker in the mouth of Boliana, from whence they both by letters certified the Gouernor and citizens of Scodra, in what manner the peace was concluded with the Turke, and what prouision was therein made for them. Vpon receit of which letters, the Gouernor calling together the citizens, declared vnto them how the case stood; and there with them entred into consultation vpon this hard question, Whether they would remaine there still in their natiue countrey vnder the Turkish tyrannie; or forsaking the same, liue amongst other Christians in perpetuall exile? But after that the matter had beene throughly debated, and many reasons on both parts alledged; at length it was by generall consent concluded, That they should all forsake the citie and the house of bondage, as dangerous both to their soules and bodies, and liue as it should please God amongst other Christians. So the Turks giuing pledges for the safe departure of the Christians in Scodra, they all at an appointed day with bag and baggage came out of the citie, and were by the Venetians carefully transported into other parts of their territorie in Italie, where they liued in peace. The Turks (who had now besieged the citie a whole yeare) after the departure of the Christians entred the citie with great joy and triumph; which, with manie others thereabout, hath euer since, to the great ruth of all Christendome, remained in the possession of the faithlesse Infidels. Thus was the strong citie of Scodra lost, and the long wars ended betwixt Mahomet and the Venetians, which hapned in the yeare 1478.

1480. Mahomet now at peace with the Venetians, sent the same Achmetes Bassa (by whom he had but a little before taken in Scodra) with his fleet of gallies against one Leonard Prince of Neritus, Zacynthus, and Cephalenia, Islands neere vnto Peloponesus: where the Bassa arriuing, easily took the same Islands, the poore Prince for safegard of his life being glad to flie into Italie with his wife and treasure, to King Ferdinand, whose nigh kinswoman he had married.

About the same time Alis Beg, syrnamed Michael Ogli, Isa Beg the son of Cassanes, and Balis Beg, syrnamed Malcozogli (men of great account amongst the Turks, and most honourably discended) entred into Transyluania with a great army of an hundred thousand men, and brought such a generall feare vpon the countrey, that Stephanus Batore the Vayuod, was glad with all speed to flie vnto Matthias king of Hungarie, to declare vnto him the danger of his countrey, and to craue his ayd. Matthias at the same time lay sicke of the gout: neuertheless he tooke such order by his captains, Stephanus Cherepetrus, and Paulus Kinissus Countie of Temesware, that that the Turks were encountred not far from Alba Iulia, and there in a great and bloudie battell ouerthrowne: wherein Isa one of their great Captaines was slaine, with thirtie thousand Turks mo. Neither was this victorie gained by the Christians without losse, Bator the Vayuod himselfe being sore wounded, and eight thousand men slaine.

Mahomet in his ambitious humor, had long time desired to haue in his subiection the Island of the Rhodes. For why, it grieued him that so smal an Island should lie so nie his great dominions in Asia, holden by a few Christians, to the great trouble of his merchants trading in the Mediteranean, beside many other harmes daily from thence receiued, and to haue no feeling of his greatnesse. But forasmuch as the winning of that place was thought to bee a matter of great difficultie, and in former times vnfortunatly attempted by some of the Mahometan princes: he purposed now with good aduise to take this enterprise in hand. Wherefore calling together his graue counsellors and most expert men of war, after he had declared vnto them the manifold iniuries receiued from them of the Rhodes; he propounded the matter, Whether it were best to attempt the winning of that Island or not? Some forward men persuaded him to reuenge those iniuries done by those Christians, and to subdue that Island, which for the neerenesse vnto Caria, might of right be accounted as part of his dominion, & not to forbeare that enterprise for feare of repulse, forasmuch as he was able to bring mo men to assaile it than were stones in the wal about it. Others better aduised, declared the strength of the Island, with the valor of the defendants; men alwaies brought vp in armes, and as it were chosen out of all parts of Christendome: so that it was (as they said) like to proue a matter of more difficultie than was by some supposed; whereof some of the Mahometan princes had to their no small dishonor, alreadie made sufficient triall: alleadging farther, that that small Island which scarcely appeared in the sea, was not of that worth, as that he should thereon gage his honor, with the liues of so many good men, and most valiant souldiers as might serue for the conquest of a kingdome. For all that, Mahomet prickt forward with the spurs of ambition, and continuall solicitation of Anthonius Meligalus, a fugitiue knight of the Rhodes, resolued to follow the counsell of them which persuaded the war. This Meligalus was a knight of the Order, which when he had prodigally consumed his substance, which was great, with two others, Demetrius and Sophonius, men of his own qualitie and disposition, fled vnto the Turkish Emperor; presenting vnto him a perfect plot of the citie, with all the strength both of it, and the Isle wherin it stood, and which way he might with most ease win it. In which seruice they frankly offered to spend their liues: but hoping indeed, by such foule treacherie to repaire their broken estate. All things being now in readinesse, Mahomet appointed Mesithes Paleologus, one of his chiefe Bassaes (the neere kinsman of Constantinus Paleologus the last Emperor of Constantinople) Generall for that expedition; committing to his charge the whole managing of that so great an action. Mesithes embarking his armie, in number eightie thousand, and throughly furnished with all things necessarie for the siege, set forward from Constantinople, and with a pleasant gale of wind, sailed alongst the coast of Asia the lesse, towards the Rhodes: where by the way he called vnto him Demetrius (one of the fugitiue knights) to learne of him the best means for the safe landing of his army. As for the arch traitor Meligalus, and chiefe authour of this warre, he was fallen sicke vpon the way; and in the extremitie of his sickneſſe, growing both troublesome and loathsome vnto the Turks that were with him in the same gally, was by the marriners throwne ouer boord aliue, crying out in vaine for helpe, no man vouchsafing to haue any compassion vpon him: and so swallowed vp of the sea, receiued amidst the waues, the iust guerdon of his treacherie.

Mahomet longeth after the Rhodes.

A death right worthie such a traitour.

At this time Peter Damboyse a Frenchman, an Auergnoies, a man of singular gouernment, was Great Master of the Rhodes; whose vigilancie was such, that commonly once in eight daies he had certain intelligence what great matters passed in the Turks court: and therewith of such deepe iudgement, that he was seldome or neuer ouertaken, or deceiued with any false aduertisements. This carefull Grand Master, was not ignorant of all these great preparations, neither of the comming of the Bassa; and therefore had before strongly fortified the city, and so stored the same with all things needfull, as might wel haue serued for many yeres siege: but especially with such shot and powder, that it was deemed (as indeed it was) an especiall meanes whereby the citie was afterward preserued. At the same time, many noble and valiant gentlemen hearing of the Turkes designes, repaired thither out of Italie, France, Spaine, Germanie, manie, and other places of Christendome, cheerfully to aduenture their liues, in defence bo, G of the place, and of the Christian religion, against the common enemie of Christianitie. Th Great Master taking a generall view of all the forces he had, to oppose against so puissant an enemie, found that he had in the citie sixteene thousand able men: in which number were reckoned many Iewes and other men of seruile condition; who in the siege following, did right good seruice. The great Bassa conducted by the false traitor Demetrius, safely landed both his armie and artillerie in the Island the two and twentieth day of Iune, not far from the citie. At which time the Great Master considering that the safetie of the Citie consisted more in the liuely valour of the defendants, than in the strength of the dead wals, or other warlike proui-sion; thought it requisit, as a part of his dutie, by cheerfull persuasions to encourage them, va- H liantly to withstand the force of their enemies. And therefore calling them all together, spake vnto them as followeth.

The oration of the Great Master to the rest of the knights and souldiers, to encourage them valiantly to withstand the Turkes.

At length valiant souldiers and fellowes at armes, we see the Turkes our mortall enemies (as wee were before aduertised, as well by Letters from our friendes, as by common fame) breathing after our destruction; in readinesse to destroy our Churches, our Oratorries, our Altars, our Religion, and whatsoeuer else we account sacred or religious; seeking the ruine of this noble Citie, and the cruell death of vs all; gaping at once, to deuoure our liues, our wealth, our hope, with all our former honour. And truly as I cannot denie but that the chance of warre is doubtfull, and the euent thereof vncertaine: So when I consider your valiant courage and cheerfulnesse of mind, I presently conceiue a most assured hope I of victorie. They haue entered into armes against vs, not so much for any desert of ours, or vpon any other quarrell; as for the vnsatiable desire of rule, and the great despite they beare against vs and the Christian religion. But to withstand their furie, and to frustrate their designes, we want neither weapons nor artillerie, nor prouision for many yeares; we haue a most strong garrison of Frenchmen, Spaniards, Germaines, Englishe, and others, the verie chiualrie of Christendome: and that which more is, Christ Iesus our Captaine and Generall, by whose power, we shall no doubt easily repulse the vaine force of our most wicked and graceleſſe enemies. The care we haue for the defence of the Christian Faith, whereunto we are by speciall profession bound, will animate and encourage vs, against them, which seeke for nothing more than to extend their wicked and grosse superstition, to the great dishonour of God, and of his sonne Christ Iesus. Besides that, we are warlike Frenchmen, Italians, Germaines, and other wor- K thie Christians: they are of Caria, Lydia, Capadocia, and the other delicate countries of Asia; effeminat persons brought vp to pleasure. I say it not to draw you into any manifest or vneuitable danger, neither to feed you with vaine hope, or to fill your eares with windie wordes: but this I promise and assure you of, that if this siege shall continue long, hither will come such strong ayde out of France, Italie, and Spaine, as will serue not onely to raise the siege, but to reconer againe the Empires of Constantinople and Trapezond. Then shall our enemie see no good end of their councels; but all their deuises so confounded, as that they shall hardly be able by speedie flight to saue themselues. But suppose the hardest should happen, which I feare not; would not any man account his life most happily and honourably spent, in defence of a good conscience, and the quarrell of Christ Iesus? Truly my great yeares and course of life L now almost spent in defence of the Christian religion (as I euer desired) doth call me foorth, as one so assured of that good layed vp for me in heauen by Christ Iesus (whose battell we are to fight) that I no whit feare any enemies force or future chance: which for all that, I haue as farre as I could, and to the vttermost of my power so prouided for, as that we will not (I hope) be therewith ouerwhelmed. Be you therefore of good cheere and comfort (as I know you are) and shew your selues valiant and couragious, which resteth wholly in your selues: and as for all the rest, time, and our discretion, shall right well prouide I doubt not.

The valiant men & worthie souldiers, resting vpon the assurance of their aged gouernor, departed euery man to his charge, full of hope and courage. Now had the Bassa landed his great armie, and sent Demetrius the traiterous knight, Meligalus his companion, with certain troupes of horsemen and some foot, to view the ground, where he might best encampe with his ar- M mie. Demetrius in great pride riding about the citie, was knowne by Anthonie Damboyse, the Great Masters brother; by whose leaue, he sallied out with a troupe of gallant horsemen, and skirmished with them: but the Turks being moe in number, cast about to haue inclosed them; which Anthonie perceiuing, turned vpon them that were comming behind him, and that with such

A such force, that he slew or wounded most part of them. In this hot skirmish, Demetrius hauing his horse slaine vnder him, and himselfe ouerthrowne, was there troden to death vnder the horses feet: an end too good for so false a traitor. Muratius a French knight, vnaduisedly dispoiling his dead bodie, was by the Turks slaine, and his head presented vnto the Bassa in stead of Demetrius.

The Bassa approching the city, at the first comming tooke a great orchard, which the Great Master had strongly intrenched, and therein placed certaine companies of soldiers, with some small peeces of ordnance: which place if it could haue bin kept, might fitly haue serued the defendants to haue at their pleasure sallied out vpon the enemie. But they which were appointed to the keeping thereof, either terrified with the sight of so great an armie, or els doub-
B ting to be able to hold it against so great a power, abandoned it by night, and retired into the citie; leauing the great ordnance behind them for hast. In this place, the Bassa by the counsell of George Frapaine (a Christian fugitiue of the Rhodes, and now master of his ordnance) began to plant his batterie, and from thence to batter the tower called Nicholea, or S. Nicholas his tower, distant from the citie three hundred paces. But against this place, Damboyse had so aptly mounted two great Basiliskes, that he made him glad quickly to forsake the same: yet finding no other place more conuenient for his purpose, shortly after hee neere vnto the same place planted againe his batterie, of far greater force than before. Wherin, beside the ordnance of greatest charge, he had three hundred smaller peeces for batterie: wherewith at the first he did small harme, for that this George Frapaine repenting himselfe (as was thought) of his foule
C treason, bestowed the shot to small purpose; for which cause the Bassa began to haue him in distrust: which Frapaine perceiuing, fled by night againe vnto the Rhodes, and discouered vnto the Great Master all the secrets of the Turks campe. The Turks continuing the batterie, had sore shaken the aforesaid tower called S. Nicholas, and beaten downe some part thereof: which the Christians with great industrie, speedily repaired in best sort they could: for all that the Turks gaue thereunto a fierce assault, by the space of six houres, forcing themselues to the vttermost to haue taken it: but perceiuing that it preuailed them nothing, they retired, hauing Eight hundred Turkes slaine. loſt eight hundred of their men, with many others drowned in the sea, of whom the number was not knowne, and a thousand others sore wounded.

Mesithes disappointed of his former purpose, bent his artillerie against the wals of the city, D and with continuall batterie had made a faire breach. But Damboyse foreseeing the danger, had with great labour cast vp such rampiers with a countermure before the breach, that the Bassa durst not in any case aduenture to enter the breach hee had made. For performance of this so necessarie a worke, the captaines themselues refused not to put too their helping hands: by whose example, all the rest of the people which were able to do any thing, being moued, willingly imployed their labour vntill the worke was fully finished.

Whilest these things were in doing, Caly Bassa the younger (a great courtier) was sent from Mahomet to see with what successe the siege went forward. Vpon whose arriuall, it was giuen out through all the Turks campe, That Mahomet was in person himselfe comming to the siege, E with 100000 men, and 150 peeces of great ordnance. These newes (of purpose deuised to the terror of the defendants) being blowne out of the campe into the citie, strucke an exceeding great feare into the minds of some of the defendants, and so discouraged the Spaniards, with their nigh neighbours that came from Nauar, that they began openly to reason in their conuenticles, That it was not possible for the citie to be defended against such a power; and therfore after an insolent manner, desired leaue to be gone, to the great discouragement of the rest. The Great Master vnderstanding of their doings, sent for these mutinous Spaniards: and after he had sharpely reproued them both of disorder and cowardise, promised to ship them away forthwith out of the Isle, saying, That he doubted not, right well to defend the citie a-F gainst the greatest power of the Turk, without the help of such base minded cowards. In the mean time he commanded them to surcease from their mutinous talke, threatning otherwise to make them examples to others, what it is so much to forget themselues. But these Spaniards shortly after, better considering of the matter, and what a dishonour it would be both to themselues and their nation, if they should so dishonourably bee sent away, repenting themselues of that they had done, came and craued pardon of the Great Master: and to redeeme their former fault, in all sallies & seruices during that siege, shewed themselues most valiant & forward men: for all that, the Great Master would neuer afterwards trust them in any seruice alone. The Bassa attempting much and preuailing little, thought it would much further his designes, if he could by any meanes take the Great Master out of the way, by whose careful policie he saw all his deuises still countermanded: wherefore to bring this his purpose to passe, he practised by the means of one Ianus a Dalmatian, to poyson him. This Ianus hauing conceiued this treason from the Bassa, was receiued into the citie of the Rhodes, as a Christian fugitiue fled from the Turkes: where hee acquainted himselfe with one Pythius an Epirot, of great familiaritie with Marius Philelphus (of late Secretarie vnto Damboyse, but as then out of fauor and in disgrace, for that he was partaker with the Spaniards in the late mutinie.) Ianus by the means of Pythius, whom he had now throughly corrupted, sought after Philelphus, who then as he right well knew, liued discontented, as a fit instrument wherby to worke this treason, for that he was a man well acquainted with the cookes and butlers, and other seruitors in the Great Masters house, and himselfe (yet) there very conuersant also. Pythius presuming of his old acquaintance and familiarity with Philelphus, and waiting vpon his melancholie humor, began to persuade him to reuenge the disgrace he liued in, and withal to shew him the meanes how to do it, by poysoning of the Great Master: which might (as he said) fal out to his greater good than he was yet aware of. Philelphus making semblant as if he had not disliked of the motion, was desirous to know of him what farther benefit might thereby arise to him, more than reuenge. To whom Pythius forthwith shewed the Bassaes Letters to Ianus, whereby hee assured him, that whatsoeuer hee should promise vnto any man for the furtherance of the practise, he would to the full performe the same. Philelphus hauing got full vnderstanding of the treason, presently discouered the same to Damboyse. By whose commandement, Ianus and Pythius were straight waies apprehended, and being examined, confessed the treason: for which Ianus lost his head, and Pythius (as he had well deserued) was shamefully hanged. Philelphus for his fidelitie, was pardoned his former errour, and againe receiued into the Great Masters fauour.

The Bassa vnderstanding that the treason was discouered, and the traitours executed, was much grieued therewith. Neuertheless, he ceased not with continual batterie to shake the citie, but especially the tower of S. Nicholas, for the assailing whereof, he made wonderfull preparation. Amongst other things, he had framed a great bridge, staied with strong ropes and cables, ouer a short fret of the sea, betwixt the place of his batterie and the same tower, whereon six men might march abreast: in which deuice he reposed great hope. But as the Turks were making fast this bridge, and had (as they thought) brought the worke to a good perfection; Gernaise Rogers an Englishman of great courage, and very skilful in sea matters, found meanes by night to cut and breake in sunder all the ropes and cables wherewith the bridge was staid; which now loose, was by the violence of the sea quickly carried away, and the Turkes disappointed of their purpose. For which good seruice he was by the Great Master honorably rewarded, and of him in publicke audience highly commended.

Yet was the furious batterie by the Bassa still maintained, and a new bridge framed vpon small boats and lighters, fast moored with cables and anchors; and diuers peeces of great ordnance placed in fusts and gallies. So that the the tower was at one time battered both by sea and land, the defendants assailed with smal shot and arrowes innumerable, and the tower at the same instant desperatly scaled. But Damboyse had so placed his great ordnance, that with the force thereof the bridge was broken in sunder, foure of their great fusts sunke, with great store both of men and ordnance: the defendants also in the tower, with shot, timber, stones, & other such like things prouided for that purpose, grieuously ouerwhelmed the Turks that were scaling the wals and beat them down with great slaughter. This hot assault was desperatly maintained by the Turkes, from three a clocke in the morning vntill ten: when the Bassa seeing no hope to preuaile, gaue ouer the assault, hauing therein lost aboue 2500 men; whose dead bodies shortly after driuen on shore, were spoiled by the Christians. The same night two mercinarie souldiers of Crete, going about to haue fled vnto the enemie, were apprehended and put to death. And George Frapaine, who in the beginning of the siege fled from the Turkes, now againe vehemently suspected of treason, was executed also.

Two thousand fiue hundred Turks slaine in the assault.

Thus neither force nor treason preuailing, the Bassa because he would leaue nothing vnproued that might better his cause, sent certain messengers vnto the Great Master, offering to him in

A in the name of the Turkish Emperor, great rewards, with many honorable preferments, if he would yeeld vp the citie; which he could not (as they would haue persuaded him) long hold against so mightie an enemie: wishing him now in his declining estate not to refuse such honorable and princely offers, for feare he were afterwards constrained to accept of far worse, or els through his desperat wilfulnesse plunge himselfe and his people into such extreme peril, as should be impossible for him or them to find any way out of. Whereunto the Great Master in briefe answered, That he would not willingly in his sure estate vse the counsell of his enemy: neither in his greatest distresse refuse cheerfully to yeeld his life vnto Almightie God, to whom he did owe it; and that with far better will than to yeeld vp the citie vpon any conditions, beare they neuer so faire a shew of honor or profit. The messengers perceiuing his constant resolution, rather to die than to yeeld his citie, began (according to instructions before giuen them by the Bassa) to temper

The resolute answer of the great Master.

B with him another way, and to persuade him to yeeld vnto the mightie Emperour some small yerely tribute or other homage, as an acknowledgment of his greatnesse, and so to liue as his friend in peace. But the Great Master knowing by the wofull example of others, that in that small request lay included the beginning of the Turkish thraldome and slauery; vtterly refused to pay him the least tribute, or to doe him the least homage that could be deuised. With which answer the messengers returned, hauing obtained nothing of that they were sent for.

The resolute answer of the Great Master, reported by the aforesaid messengers vnto the Bassa, troubled him exceedingly; for though he had small hope by force to win the citie, yet he was alwaies in hope vntill now, at his pleasure, to forsake the siege with some such reasonable composition as might stand with his honor. But sith nothing remained now, but by plain

C force to constrain his enemies, he resolued for the safegard of his honor, in that extremetie to vse that extreme remedie: wherefore beside the great peeces of batterie he had already planted against the wals, he mounted diuers smaller peeces much higher, thereby the more to annoy the defendants, by beating downe of their churches and high built houses. His ordnance thus placed, he battered the citie day and night for the space of foure daies together without intermission: during which time, the Christians out of the city spared not, liberally to bestow their shot among their enemies also: so that the aire seemed to grow thicke, and the light of the day to be darkned with the smoke of the great ordnance; and the great shot came so thicke into the citie, that the fearfull women and children were glad to shroud themselues from the danger therof, in cellars and caues vnder ground. So long continued this great batterie, that at

D length the strength of the wall gaue place to the fury of the cannon, & a faire breach was laid open for the enemie to enter: which was no sooner made, but that with the first shew thereof the Turks gaue thereunto a desperat assault; and preuailing by reason of their multitude, had vpon the sudden recouered the top of the wals, & there set vp some of their ensignes: but the Christians speedily comming in on euery side to the defence of the breach, they were againe quickly repulsed & beaten down into the diches, out of which most of them neuer rise more. At which time the Turkes in another place with their scaling ladders had gained the top of the wals, and there aduanced their ensignes also, and were now fiue hundred of them entred the citie and come into the street called the Iew street: where they were encountered by the

E Great Master and his followers, and all slaine that were already entered, and their ensignes that stood vpon the wals throwne down. The rest yet scaling the wals, and ignorant of the fortune of their fellowes, were likewise beaten from the wals, and with wonderful slaughter reiected. So that the Bassa not able longer to indure the slaughter of his men, being in both places repulsed, caused a retreat to be sounded, and left the assault; wherein he had lost of his most forward men about fiue thousand, with small losse of the Christians. In this assault, the Great Master himselfe receiued fiue wounds, whereof one vnder his right pap was thought to haue bin deadly: which yet afterward was very well cured with the rest.

After that the Bassa had by the space of three months to smal purpose spent all his forces and deuices vpon the city, he began to doubt whether it were better for him to raise his siege & depart, or to tarrie & expect some better fortune, which in al his former actions had seemed almost to haue waited vpon him; to forsake the siege, was dishonorable; and to continue it without hope, presented no lesse danger. Besides that, in the former assaults he had already lost nine thousand of his best souldiers, and all the rest of his armie was filled with heauinesse and despaire, to heare the wofull sighing and groning of their fellows, of whom fifteen thousand lay Whileſt the Baſſa was thus deliberating what courſe to take, a rumour was raiſed in the campe, That the Chriſtian Princes were comming with great power to relieue the towne: with which newes the whole armie was exceedingly troubled; whereupon he raiſed his ſiege. At the ſame time that the Rhodes was thus beſieged, Mahomet ſent his old and moſt expert captaine Achmetes Baſſa, with a great fleet and a ſtrong army to make an entrance into Italie (for no kingdome was ſo ſtrong, which the ambitious tyrant in the pride of his heart thought not he might now command) and hauing long before conquered Conſtantinople, otherwiſe called new Rome, was ſtill dreaming (I wot not what) of the conqueſt of Old Rome alſo. The miſchieuous Baſſa according to his great maſters deſignes, embarked his armie at Vallona (otherwiſe called Aulona) a ſea towne in the borders of Macedonia; and from thence paſſing directly ouer that narrow ſea, which is in breadth about ſixty miles, landed his men in that rich and fertile part of Italie, called in antient time Apulia (now Puglia) neere vnto the old and famous citie of Hydruntum, at this day called Otranto: where as ſoone as this warlike Baſſa had landed his forces, he forraged all that rich country alongſt the ſea coaſt and tooke ſuch infinit ſpoile as might wel haue ſatisfied the greedie deſire both of himſelfe and of his hungarie ſoldiers; all which rich bootie he cauſed to be conueyed into his gallies. So when he had at his pleaſure ranged vp and downe the countrie by the ſpace of fourteene dayes, and ſaw that none made head againſt him, he laid ſiege to Otranto, the chiefe citie of that countrey, and as it were the key of that part of Italie: and hauing with ſuch ordnance as hee tooke out of his gallies, made a breach, eaſily entred the ſame, & ſo without any great loſſe tooke the citie. A thing not greatly to be marueled at, foraſmuch as it was but weakly manned, and more weakly defended, by men altogether liuing in ſecuritie in the midſt of their wealth and pleaſure. The Archbiſhop, with Zurlo the Gouernor, and the chiefe men of the city, for ſafegard of their liues fled into the great Cathedral Church, as into a Sanctuarie; where they were all together moſt miſerably ſlain. Now after the Turks had at their pleaſure ranſackt Otranto, Achmetes cauſed the ſame to be ſtrongly fortified (as the ſure footing of the Turks in Italie) and victualled for eighteen moneths, and there leauing eight thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers in garriſon, returned himſelfe with the reſt to Vallona, and ſo by land to Conſtantinople to know his great Maſters further pleaſure: but purpoſing with himſelfe, with the firſt of the next Spring to haue returned with greater forces againe to Italie for the proſecuting of his former victorie. Which if he had done, it was greatly to haue been feared, that all that goodly countrey, ſometime miſtreſſe of the World, but then and yet alſo rent in ſunder by the diſcord and ambition of the Chriſtian princes, had in ſhort time become a prey vnto the barbarous Turke for euer.

The death of this mightie man (who liuing troubled a great part of the world) was not much more lamented by thoſe that were neereſt vnto him, (who euer liuing in feare of his crueltie, hated him deadly) than of his enemies, who euer in doubt of his greatneſſe, were glad to heare of his end. He was of ſtature but low, and nothing anſwerable to the height of his mind, ſquare ſet, and ſtrong limmed, not inferior in ſtrength (when he was young) vnto any in his fathers Court, but to Scanderbeg onely: his complexion was Tartarlike, ſallow and melancholie, as were moſt of his anceſtors the Othoman Kings; his looke and countenance ſterne, with his eyes piercing, hollow and a little ſunke as it were into his head, and his noſe ſo high and crooked, that it almoſt touched his vpper lip. To be briefe, his countenance was altogether ſuch, as if Nature had with moſt cunning hand therein depainted and moſt curiouſly ſet forth to view the inward diſpoſition and qualities of his mind, which were on both parts notable. He was of a verie ſharpe and apprehenſiue wit, learned, as amongſt that nation, eſpecially in Aſtronomie, and could ſpeake the Greeke, Latine, Arabicke, Chaldee, and Perſian Tongues. He ſo ſeuerely puniſhed theft, as that in his time all the wayes were ſafe, and a theefe ſcarcely to be heard of. But theſe good parts were in him obſcured with moſt horrible and notorious vices: for why, he was altogether irreligeous, and of all others moſt perfideous, ambitious aboue meaſure, and in nothing more delighted, than in bloud; in ſo much that it is probably gathred, that he was in his time the death of eight hundred thouſand men: craft, couetouſneſſe, and diſſimulation, were in him accounted for tollerable faults, in compariſon of his greater vices. In his loue was no aſſurance, and his leaſt diſpleaſure was death: ſo that he liued feared of all men, and died lamented of none. He had iſſue three ſonnes, Muſtapha (dead before him, as is before declared) Bajazet, and Gemes, or rather Zemes, of ſome called Zizimus, competitor of the Empire with his eldeſt brother; whom he exceedingly troubled in the beginning of his raigne, ſo that he could not well attend any other thing but him: which opportunitie (by God himſelfe no doubt offered for the ſafegard of Italie) Alphonſus Duke of Calabria (King Ferdinand his eldeſt ſonne) taking hold vpon, with all the power hee could make in Italie, beſieged the Turks in Otranto; with whom he had many ſharpe skirmiſhes, wherein he loſt diuers of his great Captaines and Commanders, as the Countie Iulio de Aquaiua, Loys de Capua, and the Countie Iulio de Piſa, with others, and was ſtill by the ſtrong garriſon of the Turks put to the worſe; vntill ſuch time as being ſtrengthened with aid out of Spaine and Portugal, (but eſpecially with certaine companies of moſt valiant ſouldiers ſent from Matthias Coruinus out of Hungarie, whoſe forces the Turks moſt feared) he began to cut them ſhort, and ſtraitly beſieged the citie both by ſea and land: vntill at length the beſieged Turks hearing of the death of their great Emperour, and now hardly preſſed with the dangers of a ſtrait ſiege, no longer expecting the returne of Achmetes their Generall, (then readie to haue come to their reſcue with fiue and twentie thouſand ſouldiers) yeelded vp the city vnto the Duke, vpon compoſition before made, That they might with bag and baggage in ſafetie depart thence: which they did, after they had to the great terrour of all Italie holden that ſtrong citie by the ſpace of a yeare. And ſo was that rich countrey rather by the mercie of God (in taking away the great Tyrant) preſerued, than by the ſtrength or policie of the

But theſe good parts were in him obſcured with moſt horrible and notorious vices: for why, he was altogether irreligeous, and of all others moſt perfideous, ambitious aboue meaſure, and in nothing more delighted, than in bloud; in ſo much that it is probably gathred, that he was in his time the death of eight hundred thouſand men: craft, couetouſneſſe, and diſſimulation, were in him accounted for tollerable faults, in compariſon of his greater vices. In his loue was no aſſurance, and his leaſt diſpleaſure was death: ſo that he liued feared of all men, and died lamented of none. He had iſſue three ſonnes, Muſtapha (dead before him, as is before declared) Bajazet, and Gemes, or rather Zemes, of ſome called Ziximus, competitor of the Empire with his eldeſt brother; whom he exceedingly troubled in the beginning of his raigne, ſo that he could not well attend any other thing but him: which opportunitie (by God himſelfe no doubt offered for the ſafegard of Italie) Alphonſus Duke of Calabria (King Ferdinand his eldeſt ſonne) taking hold vpon, with all the power hee could make in Italie, beſieged the Turks in Otranto; with whom he had many ſharpe skirmiſhes, wherein he loſt diuers of his great Captaines and Commanders, as the Countie Iulio de Aquaiua, Loys de Capua, and the Countie Iulio de Piſa, with others, and was ſtill by the ſtrong garriſon of the Turks put to the worſe; vntill ſuch time as being ſtrengthened with aid out of Spaine and Portugal, (but eſpecially with certaine companies of moſt valiant ſouldiers ſent from Matthias Coruinus out of Hungarie, whoſe forces the Turks moſt feared) he began to cut them ſhort, and ſtraitly beſieged the citie both by ſea and land: vntill at length the beſieged Turks hearing of the death of their great Emperour, and now hardly preſſed with the dangers of a ſtrait ſiege, no longer expecting the returne of Achmetes their Generall, (then readie to haue come to their reſcue with fiue and twentie thouſand ſouldiers) yeelded vp the city vnto the Duke, vpon compoſition before made, That they might with bag and baggage in ſafetie depart thence: which they did, after they had to the great terrour of all Italie holden that ſtrong citie by the ſpace of a yeare. And ſo was that rich countrey rather by the mercie of God (in taking away the great Tyrant) preſerued, than by the ſtrength or policie of the Inhabitants, which was then in great danger to haue for euer giuen place vnto the power of the great tyrant, had he longer liued; yea and after his death, to the power of Bajazet his son, had he not by domesticall troubles beene enforced to turne himselfe another way; and as it were to neglect in time to relieue his distressed garrison in Otranto, as shall hereafter be declared. tie and the reuerence of his father, resigned vnto him the imperiall gouernment, which he pre- G sently tooke vpon him with the generall good liking of the people, and made Corcutus Gouernor of Lycia, Caria, and Ionia, with the pleasant and rich countries thereabouts; allowing him a great yerely pension for the better maintenance of his estate, with promise also of the empire after his decease: and so sent him away to his charge, where he most pleasantly liued during the raigne of his father Baiazet, giuing himselfe wholly to the studie of Philosophie, which made that he was afterwards lesse fauoured of the Ianizaries and other men of war.

Zemes riseth against his brother Baiazet.

Zemes thus preuented by his elder brother, and vnderstanding by his friends how all things stood at Constantinople, and that Baiazet was alreadie possessed of the empire; returning with great speed, raised a puissant armie in the countries which were vnder his command, and marching through the heart of Asia the lesse, by the way as he went, tooke into his possession such cities and strong places as he thought best; and so entring into Bithynia, tooke the great citie H of Prusa, the antient seat of the Otheman Kings. Purposing in himselfe, that as Baiazet had shut him out of Europe, so he would also in requitall thereof exclude him out of that part of the Turkish empire which is beyond Hellespontus in Asia, & to make himself lord therof. Wherein fortune at the first seemed vnto him most fauourable, all the people whersoeuer hee came yeelding vnto him obedience as vnto their Prince and Soueraign: so that in short time he seemed both vnto himselfe and to others, in strong possession of that part of the Empire.

Baiazet goeth against Zemes.

Of these his proceedings Baiazet hauing intelligence, and perceiuing the greater part of his empire now in danger to be lost, and doubting further, that Zemes his ambitious minde would hardly rest therewith long contented; for remedie of so great a mischiefe leuied a strong and I puissant armie, wherewith he passed ouer into Asia, and came to Neapolis a Citie of Anatolia, neere whereunto Zemes lay with his armie strongly incamped. As Baiazet was vpon the way against his brother, Achmetes the great Bassa (in the confession of all men the best man of war and most expert Captaine amongst the Turks, and of all others most entirely beloued of the Ianizaries) came, and vnarmed presented himselfe vpon his knees before Baiazet, his sword hanging at his saddle bow: to the admiration of many, who could not but wonder to see so worthie a Chiefetaine of so great place in time of seruice, without any apparent cause, in such humble manner to appeare before his Soueraigne, as if he had had nothing to do with armes.
It chanced many yeares before, in the mortal warres betwixt Mahomet the late and great Em-perour of the Turks, and Assymbeius Vsun-Cassanes the King of Persia, that Baiazet hauing the K leading of the right wing of his fathers Armie, had not martialled it in so good order as was to Mahomet his good liking: for which cause he commanded this Achmetes to goe and set that part of the battell in better order. Which his Soueraignes command whiles hee most skilfully performed, Baiazet taking it in euill part, as tending to his owne disgrace, in great choler threatened the Bassa, to finde a time when he would be reuenged vpon him. But hee being a man of great spirit, and one that durst both doe and say much, perceiuing his meaning, bid him doe what pleased him; and laying his hand vpon his sword, solemnly vowed, That whensoeuer he came to command as Emperour, he would neuer weare sword in field: the remembrance whereof was the cause that he then came in manner aforesaid, readie to serue if he were thereto commanded, or otherwise to endure what so his Princes pleasure was. Ba- L iazet perceiuing that the vnkindens so long before conceiued, was not yet disgested, in token of grace stretched out to him his scepter, and taking him vp, commanded him to girt his sword vnto his side, and not to remember that which hee had long before both forgiuen and forgotten. And knowing right well that he was a most valiant and expert captaine, made him General of his armie, to the great contentment of the Ianizaries and the rest of the army; who so soone as they saw him, gaue out diuers great shouts for joy, as if victorie had most assuredly attended vpon him. Achmetes taking vpon him the charge, came and incamped so neere as he could to Zemes, and so lay by the space of ten dayes: during which time, many sharpe skirmishes were made with diuers fortune; sometime the one side preuailing, and sometime the other. At length the matter was brought to a generall battell; wherein after a long and M cruell fight, and great slaughter on both sides, the fortune of Baiazet, conducted by the policie of Achmetes, preuailed against Zemes. Who seeing his Armie ouerthrowne, betooke himselfe to flight, and came to Iconium: in which flight many of Zemes his followers were taken prisoners; whom Baiazet would haue pardoned and enlarged, but that by the persuasion

Achmetes made Generall of all Baiazets armie.

A sion of Achmetes he changed his mind, and to the terrour of others suffered them all to be put to the sword.

Zemes flieth into Syria.

Zemes doubting after this ouerthrow to fall into his brothers hands, and finding no means to make head againe: when he had staied three daies at Iconium, caused his treasure, plate, iewels, and other things of great value and light carriage to be trussed vp, and taking with him his mother and his two yong children, a sonne and a daughter, accompanied with a small retinue, fled into Syria; then part of the dominion of Caytbeius, commonly called the great Sultan of Ægypt and Syria. It was not long after the departure of Zemes from Iconium, but that Baiazet came thither with his armie, to haue surprised him: but vnderstanding of his flight, hee took order for the peaceable gouernment of that part of his empire. And so hauing suppressed
B that dangerous rebellion, and again reduced that troubled part of his empire to his obeisance, returned with victorie to Constantinople.

1482. The distressed prince Zemes trauelling through Syria, came at length to Ierusalem: where he stayed a good space, deuoutly visiting the monuments of that most antient and famous citie. From thence he trauelled into Ægypt; where at his first entrance into the countrey, hee was met by diuers of the greatest nobilitie of that kingdome, sent from the great Sultan, by whom he was honourably conducted to Caire, and there presented to Caytbeius, of whom he was graciously welcommed: vnto whom after due reuerence done, he declared the cause of his comming, as followeth:

Zemes his speech to Caytbeius, Sultan of Egypt.

C If it were not to me certainely knowne (most victorious) that you are not ignorant either who I am, or from whence descended, or with what iniurie enforced, after long and painfull trauell I am here arrived; it would much concerne me to vse another manner of beginning of my speech, and with greater protestation of words to seeke your gracious fauour. But forasmuch as all these things are vnto your most royall Maiestie sufficiently knowne, as I doe well perceiue in this, that your infinite clemencie hath entertained me with farre greater kindnesse than I in such my aduerse fortune durst wish for, much lesse request: Now nothing remaineth for me to say, more than iustly to complaine vnto your inuincible Maiestie, of the wrong and iniurie done vnto me by Baiazet, whom I may more iustly tearme my cruell enemie, than kind brother. For he not contented to haue taken vnto himselfe my fathers Empire by great tumult and slaughter, hath with all hostilitie and force of armes persecuted me his brother,
D excluded out of the Imperiall Citie, and then liuing in Bythinia, troublesome neither to him, nor any of his people, and neuer rested vntill he had chased me out of the bounds of my fathers Empire. Neither hath the iealous desire of Soueraigntie (whereof my father whilest he liued, had him alwaies in distrust) so much moued him vnto this so cruell fact, as a certaine vnnaturall crueltie towards all his kindred in generall, and mortall hatred against me his brother in particular: for he which is alreadie possessed of the Empire, and doth with all hostilitie persecute a priuate person, subiect and exposed to his iniurie, that man thirsteth not after Soueraigntie, but after bloud; neither desireth he to conquer, but to kill. And whereas after my fathers death great troubles arose in Constantinople, and many bloodie skirmishes were fought betwixt the fauourites of both of vs, it cannot with any truth be laied to my charge, as done by mine aduise or counsell, I being at the same time so farre from thence. Neither am
E I iustly to be blamed, if that after my fathers departure I put my selfe vpon the way towards Constantinople, especially being sent for thither by many my good friends, men of great marke and qualitie: but his fortune preuailing, I gaue place, and lest my comming to the imperiall Citie might haue been the occasion of new troubles, I returned aside into Bythinia, and so to Prusa, with purpose there to haue rested in quiet, if my brother would haue giuen me leaue. But so far was he from that, to suffer mee there to rest, as that I was by him most cruelly assayled as an open enemie: and had I not by speedie flight withdrawn my selfe from the imminent danger, and departed quite out of my fathers kingdome, F I must haue yeelded my selfe, my blood, and life, as a sacrifice into his cruell hands. Neither is he to me so mortall an enemie, or thirsteth after my life so much for feare, as for very hatred and malice: for what is there in me to feare? Verily nothing: Constantinople is his, the fauour of the great Chiefetaines and men of warre is his, the treasure and regall riches are all his; wherefore he hateth his brother, but feareth him not. He will sway all things alone, he will haue all that belongeth to the Othoman familie alone, and he, yea none but he, must liue alone. Xerxes was a mightie King, and yet in that great and large Kingdome he not onely preserued his brethren in safetie, but had them also in great honour and estimation. What did Alexander the Great? Who not

onely tooke pleasure in his brother, but had him also as a companion of his most glorious expedition: and many other famous Kings of forreine Nations, and of our owne familie, haue ruled both more safely, and better strengthened, with the counsell and aid of their most louing brethren, rather than with others. But Baiazet is of a farre other minde, reputing violence and haughtinesse of heart to be his greatest and surest defence: herein his fierce nature delighteth, more than in the lawfull course of nature, iustice, and equitie; he had rather haue his brother his enemie than his friend, and to driue him into exile, than to make him partaker of his counsels. But I beseech thee most puissant Monarch, the faithfull keeper and maintainer of our Law and Religion, by the sacred reliques of our great Prophet Mahomet, which thou hast at Hierusalem and Mecha, suffer me not, a Kings sonne, to liue in banishment and exile, poore and miserable, a scorne of his brothers crueltie, farre from home farre from his countrie and kingdome; but regarding the Law of the great Prophet, lift vp the afflicted and oppressed, and by the great authoritie which you haue, bridle domesticall wrong; or if that will not take place, reuenge it with thy sword, and suffer not our Empire, with so great trauell founded, by the crueltie or follie of one wilfull man to be ouerthrowne: which should be no more grieuous and lamentable to vs, than dangerous to your most high estate, and all other Kings and Princes of our Religion. For you of your selfe vnderstand right well, what deadly enemies the Christian Princes are vnto the Turks: and doe you thinke, that if any great warre (which I wish not) should arise of this our discord, that they would long rest in quiet, and as idle beholders stand looking on vntill it were of it selfe appeased? Or rather hauing such an opportunitie presented, would not with might and maine suddenly inuade our kingdome, before shaken with ciuile warres, and seeke the vtter ruine and destruction of the same? Which their desire, if that hatefull people could bring to passe (which thing Mahomet turne vpon themselues) my mind abhorreth to, thinke how far that mischefe would runne: For the Othoman familie once rooted out, there is none of our Religion, (your Maiestie onely excepted) which is able withstand their power: wherefore you must thinke of Asiana for your selfe and all the rest, you alone must withstand the force of the Christians, you must maintaine that warre with much losse, and greater charge, and most vncertaine successe. Wherefore inuincible Monarch, I most humbly beseech thee, that pitying our estate, whiles the matter is yet whole, and remedie is yet to be had, to deale with Baiazet by your Embassadours, That though he will not receiue me his brother as partner of the Empire, yet at least to admit me into some small part of my fathers kingdome: Let him raigne and rule, let all things be his command; let it be lawfull for mee poore man but to liue in rest and quiet somewhere, possessing but so much as may suffice mee honestly to lead a priuate life. Which thing if he shall refuse to grant, although he neither feare the Lawes of God or man, yet as I haue at Hierusalem, so will I also shortly at Mecha (if by your leaue I may) complaine vnto the great Prophet, of the iniuries done vnto mee by my cruell and vnnaturall brother; and afterwards make proofe of your compassion towards mee, all which I hope shall much auaile. But if (which I would not) I shall prooue al these things in vain, sith desparation enforceth men to all extreamities, I will goe with fire, sword, and slaughter, by secret and open force, by right and wrong; and hated, will vex my hateful brother by all manner of mischiefe, by all manner of reuenge. Neither will I make an end of confounding of all, vntill I bee either receiued into part of the Empire, or else together with my life leaue those desperate and lost things for him alone to enioy. For I deeme it much better, quickly to die, than with disgrace and infamie to protract a lingring loathed life.

The great Sultan in courteous manner comforted the distressed prince, willing him to be of good cheere, and patiently to beare his present hap: forasmuch as it became a man borne in so high fortune, not to be discouraged with any mischance, or dismaid if things fell out otherwise than he looked for: commending him withall, for that he saw in him no lesse courage than might well haue becommed his better estate; & willing him to liue still in hope, promised to doe what in him lay, to reconcile him to his brother, & to perswade him that he might be receiued into some part of the kingdom: and to that purpose shortly after dispatched away an honorable embassage to Baiazet. Zemes in the meane while, by the same Sultans leaue, vpon a superstitious deuotion trauelled into Arabia, to visit the Temple of Mahomet at Mecha, and his sepulchre at Medina. Vpon his returne to Caire, the embassadours before sent, returned also, but not hauing obtained any thing they desired: for Baiazet would not giue eare to any agreement, but seemed altogether to contemne and despise his brother. Wherfore Zemes more vpon stomacke & desire of reuenge, than for any hope he had of the empire, determined with himselfe himselfe to make open war vpon him; reposing some good hope in his secret friends, and in the reuolt of some of the great captaines, who discontented with the gouernment of Baiazet, secretly wished for his returne.

Whilest he was thus plotting these weightie matters, a messenger with letters came fitly from the King of Caramania, offering with all the power he could make, to joyne with him, if he would take vp armes against his brother. This poore titular King then liued in Armenia, and being able by his friends to make some good force, was in hope by joyning with Zemes, to recouer some part of the Caramanian kingdome, from whence his father was not many yeres before driuen by the force of the late Turkish Emperour Mahomet the Great, Baiazet his father. It is hard to say, whither of these distressed and exiled Princes gaue the greater encouragement to the other, to take this desperat war in hand, being both together far vnable by all the friends they could make, to encounter with the great power of Baiazet. But what is so dangerous or desperat, which aspiring minds will not attempt in hope of a kingdome? whose brightnesse so dazeleth their eyes, that they can see nothing but it. 1483.

Hereupon Zemes hauing receiued great gifts of the Ægyptian Sultan, with promise of aid, departed from Caire (the Sultan earnestly perswading him to the contrarie) and as it was before appointed, met with the Caramanian King vpon the borders of Asia the lesser: where they concluded to joine together such Forces as they had, and to inuade Baiazet. Which they accordingly did: for raising all the power they could, they entred into Cilicia, (now called Caramania) and joyning their armies together, incamped betweene Iconium and Larenda. Neither did Baiazet in time of so great a danger sit still; not so much fearing his brothers power, as the reuolting of his captaines and souldiers, whom he knew either to loue, or at least not to hate the young Prince his brother. Wherefore he raised a great armie, and sent Achmetes (the great man of war) before with the one part thereof, himselfe following after with a far greater strength: for at that time he had vnder his ensignes two hundred thousand men.

As he was marching with this great armie, a rumor was raised in the campe, That some of his chiefe captaines had conspired to betray him into the hands of his brother, and that many of the souldiers secretly fauouring Zemes, would vpon the joyning of the battell forsake him, and take part with his brother. Which report so troubled Baiazet, that he stood in doubt what to doe, or whom to trust: but knowing that nothing winneth the heart of the common soldier more, than the Generals bountie, he forthwith caused a wonderfull masse of mony to be diuided amongst the captains and soldiers, loding their minds with ample promises of far greater rewards, for their fidelitie and valour to be shewed in that present seruice. Hauing thus assured himselfe of the wauering minds of his souldiers, he began to draw neere to Iconium, where his enemies lay incamped: and by glosing letters and flattering messengers made shew openly, as if he had been verie desirous to come to some good agreement with them, but secretly went about to stop all the straits and passages, in such manner as that it should not be possible for them againe to retyre backe into Syria: for he doubted nothing more, but lest they being few in number, & in strength far vnequall vnto him, would not vpon so great disaduantage hazard the fortune of a battell, but retyre themselues into Syria, and so to his exceeding trouble and infinite charge protract the warre.

Zemes perceiuing his brothers subtill drift, and seeing no such reuolt as he had hoped for, and as had before by letters to him bin promised; and weighing with reason his owne weake forces, retyred in good time vnto the straits of the mountain Amanus, which diuideth Cilicia from Syria. Here, despairing of all good successe in the enterprise he had taken in hand, he perswaded the Caramanian king his confederate to giue place vnto the time, and to reserue himselfe vnto his better fortune: and so breaking vp his armie, with a few of his followers came down to the sea coast of Cilicia; where he hired a tall ship to attend in readinesse, that if any sudden danger should arise, he might go aboord, and so saue himselfe by sea. In the mean time he sent a messenger vnto Damboys Great Master of the Rhodes, certifying him, That for as much as he had no place of safetie left amongst his owne people, wherein he might shroud himself from the fury of his brother, still seeking after his life, he would vpon his safe conduct come to him into his Island of the Rhodes. Which his request the Great Master easily granted, deeming the flight of so great a Prince from the Turke, to be a thing much profitable to the Christian Commonweale: and thereupon he presently sent forth certaine gallies to fetch him from the troublesome coast of Cicilia. But before these gallies were come, Zemes was in- G forced by the sudden accesse of his enemies, for the auoiding of present danger, to go aboord on that ship which he had prouidently before prepared to be in readinesse for such purpose.

And hauing put a little from the shoare, shot backe againe an arrow with letters made fast vnto it, directed vnto his brother Baiazet, containing as followeth:

Zemes his letters to his brother Baiazet.

Thou knowest (most vnkind and cruell brother) that I flie not vnto the Christians, the mortall enemies of the Othoman Familie, for hatred of my religion or nation; but enforced thereunto by thy iniurious dealing, and dangerous practises which thou incessantly attemptest against me, yea euen in my extreame miserie. But this assured hope I carrie with me, that the time will come when as thou the authour of so great wrong, or thy children shall receiue the iust guerdon of this thy present tyranny against thy brother.

It is reported, that when Baiazet had read these letters, he was so troubled in mind, that for H certaine daies he gaue himselfe wholly to mourning and heauinesse, and would in no wise bee comforted: insomuch, that he was brought into the campe by the Bassaes, as a man halfe distraught of his wits, shunning for a season all mens speech and companie.

Zemes flieth to the Rhodes.

Zemes sailing to the Rhodes, was there honorably receiued of the Great Master, and all the rest of the Knights of the Order: to whom in their publicke assemblie three daies after, hee openly declared the causes of the discord betwixt his brother and him: alledging for the color of his rebellion, That although Baiazet were his elder brother, yet that he was born whilst his father yet liued in priuat estate, vnder subiection and command, long before he possessed the kingdome, and so no kings sonne: whereas he himselfe was the first borne of his father, I beeing an Emperour, and so not heire of his fathers priuat fortune (as was Baiazet) but of his greatest honour and empire; and yet not of such an hautie mind, but that he could haue beene content to haue giuen place vnto his brother, so that he could haue bin contented likewise to haue granted him some small portion of the empire, wherein he might safely haue liued a poore Prince, and his brother: but that such was his pride, as that he would not vouchsafe to suffer him to liue so much as a poore priuat life in any corner of so large an empire, and was therefore by his vnnaturall and tyranous dealing, enforced to craue aid of the Christian princes. Of whom (forsomuch as he had alwaies heard much honour) he was in good hope to find succour and reliefe in that his distressed estate: protesting vnto God and the world, that if euer it should be his good fortune by their means and helpe to obtaine the empire, he would K neuer be vnmindfull of so great a benefit; but to make with them a perpetuall and inuiolable peace, and so to rest their fast friend for euer. The Great Master on the other side comforting him with cheerfull speeches, promised to keepe him in safetie from the furie of his brother; and farther to commend his cause to the other great Kings and Princes of Christendome.

The description of Zemes.

This exiled Prince Zemes, was about the age of eight and twentie yeares when he came to the Rhodes; of stature tall, somewhat corpulent and well limb'd, gray eyed, but looking something asquint, hooke nosed, and in the middle rising, in such maner as the Persians commend in their kings: of colour browne, spare of speech, and by nature cholericke: a great feeder, so that he seemed rather to deuoure his meat, than to eat it; much delighted in swimming, and to lie abroad in the night; pensiue and melancholie, which men imputed to his great cares, neuer L merrie but in the companie of the grand Master, a religious obseruer of the superstition, from which he could neuer be drawne during the long time he liued in exile; learned as among the Turks, so that he wrot the historie of his fathers life. But leauing him in safe keeping with the grand Master of the Rhodes, let vs againe returne to the course of our historie.

Baiazet hauing now the second time chased away his brother, after he had wel quieted that part of his troubled kingdome in Asia, returned againe to Constantinople, carefully attending when some new motion should be made by his brother, to his farther disquiet. But after he vn-derstood that he was with the Great Master of the Rhodes, hee sent certaine of his Bassaes (amongst whom Achmetes the great souldier is reported to haue bin one) vnto the Great Ma- M ster, requesting him to deliuer vp Zemes, offering for him a wonderfull sum of mony. Which dishonorable request, when it could by no meanes be obtained, the same Embassadors in the name of their master, concluded a peace very commodious for the Rhodians: wherein among other things it was agreed, That the Great Master should keepe Zemes in safe custodie, so that hee should no more trouble the Turkish Empire: in consideration whereof, and for his honourable

A notable vsage, Baiazet should yearely pay vnto the Great Master thirtie thousand duckats the first of August, which was afterward accordingly paied.

It fortuned that whilest Achmetes the great Bassa (emploied in matters abroad) was absent 1484 from the court, Baiazet discoursing with the other Bassaes his graue counsellors, vpon his late expedition into Asia against his brother, seemed to be highly offended with the vntrustinesse & doubtfull faith of some of his greatest captains & soldiers; yet vpon whom he might iustly lay the blame, he well knew not, although it seemed by his talke, he should somewhat distrust the great capraine Achmetes. Hereupon Isaac the most antient Bassa of the court, and of greatest authoritie next vnto Baiazet himselfe (whose daughter, a ladie of exceeding beautie, Achmetes had long before married, but doubting that she had yeelded her honour to the wan-B ton lust of Mustapha the eldest sonne of Mahomet the late Emperor, had put her from him, and would by no meanes be reconciled; for which cause there was a secret hatred euer after betwixt those two great Bassaes) perceiuing the Emperors discontented and suspitious humour, and desiring nothing more than the destruction of Achmetes, tooke hold vpon his opportunity, and by all meanes he could deuise, encreased the suspition of the treason, which had already too much possessed the iealous Emperor: sometimes craftily imagining, intelligence to haue passed betwixt Zemes and Achmetes; and forthwith amplifying his power and authoritie, which (as he said) was so great with the Ianizaries and souldiers of the court, that they by reason of his often imployments, were wholly at his deuotion; so that he might at his pleasure do more in Zemes his quarrell, than should stand with the safetie of Baiazet; a matter well to Achmetes his death contriued.
C be considered of, and also carefully preuented. For remedie of which dangers, it was thought necessarie, that Achmetes at his returne to court, should be taken away and slaine.

Achmetes fearing nothing lesse than that which was contriued against him, came after his wonted maner to the court; and was with the other great Bassaes inuited to a solemne supper which Baiazet had commanded to be prepared, to solace himselfe after his trauels (as it was giuen out) with his chiefe Bassaes. To this royall supper came Achmetes with the rest of the bidden guests, mistrusting nothing, and was there sumptuously feasted by Baiazet: who to make his guests the merrier, dranke wine plentifully himselfe, causing them also to drinke in like manner; so that they were full of wine: a thing vtterly forbidden by their law, yet day-ly more and more vsed, especially by their great men in their feasts. Supper now ended, and D the night far spent, Baiazet in token that they were welcome, and stood in his good grace, caused certaine rich robes of pleasing colours to be brought forth, & to be cast vpon euery of his guests one, giuing beside vnto euery one of them a faire guilt boule full of gold. But vpon Achmetes was cast a gowne of blacke veluet, which among the Turks may well be called the mantle of death, being so sure a token of the Emperours heauie indignation, as that it is death for any man once to open his mouth, or to intreat for him vpon whom it is by the Emperors commandement so cast. Achmetes seeing himselfe now vnder the shadow of death, and knowing it but vaine to intreat for mercie, as he was a man of great spirit, brake forth and said, Oh cachpogly (which is as much as to say, thou sonne of a whore) sith thou entendedst so much cru-eltie against me, why didst thou not put it in execution before thou hadst inforced me to drink E this impure and forbidden wine? and so casting his eies vpon the ground sat still. The other Bassaes hauing leaue to depart, giuing thanks to the Emperor, and crauing pardon for their excesse, kissed the ground at his feet and so departed: with whom Achmetes offered to haue gon out also, but was forthwith commanded to sit still, for that the Emperor had to talke with him in secret. The Bassa's were no sooner departed, but the terrible executioners of Baiazet his wrath stept in, and laid hands vpon Achmetes to haue slaine him; when one of the Eunuchs in greatest fauor with the tyrant, standing by, aduised him not to be too hastie in executing of so great a man, so entirely beloued of his best souldiers and men of war, but rather to stay his execution for a while, to see how the matter would be disgested; and in the meane time by torture to wrest it out from him what might be got, to make it in some sort appeare, that he died F for his due desert. Hereupon Baiazet deferred his execution to a farther time, and caused him there presently to be stript, and carried away to be tortured.

Achmetes his son stirreth vp the Ianizaries to help his father.

Amongst other gallants of the court which attended the comming out of the great Bassaes whom they followed, was one of Achmetes his sons, a gentleman of great hope; who missing his father among the rest, began presently to mistrust that all went not wel, & speedily running from

from one of the Bassaes to another, with much ado learned the hard estate of his father: wherof he was also at the same instant aduertised by a secret friend neere about Baiazet. Hereupon this yong gentleman began forthwith piteously to lament his fathers mishap, and to exclaim against the crueltie of Baiazet; called on the Ianizaries for aid, putting them in remembrance of his fathers great and manifold deserts towards them, together with his imminent danger: and so running vp and down the citie in the dead time of the night, had in short space raised vp all the Ianizaries in armes: who vnderstanding of the danger of their antient commander, who they generally loued and honored as their father, came running by heaps from all parts of the citie vnto the court gate, there with terrible exclamation doubling and redoubling their Bre, Bre, (which barbarous word they commonly vse in expressing their greatest discontentment and fury) & did indeed so furiously beat at the court gate, that Baiazet fearing least they should breake in by violence, caused the outer gate to be set open, and shewing himselfe from aboue out at an yron window, demanded of them the cause of that tumult and vprore. To whome they insolently answered, That they would by and by teach him as a drunkard, a beast, and a rascall, to vse his great place and calling with more sobrietie and discretion: and among other opprobrious words wherewith they shamefully loded him, they called him oftentimes by the name of Bengi, Bengi (that is to say, Batchelor or Scholler) which amongst those martial men, contemners of all learning, is accounted a word of no small reproch and disgrace. And after they had in most despitefull manner thus reuiled him, they proudly commanded him forthwith to deliuer Achmetes vnto them, or else to take that should ensue thereof. Baiazet terrified with this insolencie of the Ianizaries, & fearing some sudden violence to be offred, commanded Achmetes to be without delay deliuered vnto them: which was done in such hast, that he was brought forth vnto them almost naked, bare legged, & bare headed, bearing in his body the manifest markes of his hard vsage. The Ianizaries receiuing him with great reioycing, supplied his want of apparell with such habiliments, as they for that purpose vpon the sudden tooke from Baiazets minions: and so taking him vpon their shoulders, with great ioy carried him out of the court, still crying vnto him, How he did, and how he felt himselfe? And so guarded him home, ready no doubt to haue slain Baiazet and rifled the court, if he would haue but said the word. But he yet loyall, laboured with good words to appease that tumult, and to pacifie their furie: excusing that which Baiazet had done against him, to haue bin done onely to correct him, for that happily he had forgotten some part of obedience and dutie. Neuertheless, hereupon remained no small heartburning betwixt Baiazet and the Ianizaries for a long time after: yet Baiazet for feare of them reconciled himselfe to Achmetes, and in open shew had him in greater honour than before, promoting him euen vnto the highest degrees of honor, howbeit he inwardly hated him to death. And the more by the contiuuall instigation of the old Bassa Isaac: by whose persuasion, when it was thought that all had bin forgotten, hee was by Baiazets commandement as he sat at supper in the court, thrust through the bodie and slaine. This was the miserable end of Achmetes, the great champion of the Turks, and one of the greatest enemies of Christendome that euer liued in the Turkish court: for by him, Mahomet subuerted the empire of Trapezond, tooke the great citie of Caffa (called in antient time Theodosia) with all the countrey of Taurica Chersoenesus, the impregnable citie of Croia, with all the kingdome of Epirus, the strong citie of Scodra, and a great part of Dalmatia, and last of all Otranto, to the terror of all Italy: by him also, Baiazet vanquished and put to flight his brother Zemes, as is before declared. In reward of which good seruices, he was, by the tyrant (vpon a meere suspition) thus cruelly and shamefully murthered. About this time also, Caigubus (Zemes his son, then but a childe) was by the commandement of Baiazet his vncle, strangled, in the new tower of Constantinople.

Baiazet for feare deliuereth Achmetes to the Ianizaries.

Achmetes slaine.

Baiazet now grieuously offended with the pride and late insolencie of the Ianizaries, caused secret inquirie to be made, of them which were the authors of those late stirs; & finding them to be the officers of their companies, and specially those which had before slain Mahomet Bassa the great polititian, immediatly after the death of Mahomet the late Emperor, at which time they had also raised great tumults, and done much harme in the citie; he vnder color of preferment, sent away those authours of sedition into diuers parts of his Empire, appointing vnto them (as vnto old souldiers and men of good desert) certaine lands & reuenues for their maintenance and preferment. But as soone as they were departed, he by secret letters commanded the

A the gouernors and magistrats of those places whereunto they were sent, suddenly to apprehend them, and as traitors to put them to death; which was accordingly done. The Ianizaries of the court and about Constantinople, hearing what had hapned vnto their fellowes, became wonderfull discontented, and began to mutine in diuers places of the citie, vttering speeches against the Emperor full of despight and reuenge. Which thing when Baiazet vnderstood, and had wel considered the late danger he was in, together with the intollerable pride and insolencie of those his masterful slaues; he secretly purposed in himselfe for curing of so dangerous a disease, to vse a most desperat remedie: which was, suddenly to kill and destroy all the Ianizaries, especially those which were belonging to the court, or about Constantinople. This his purpose he imparted to diuers of his greatest Bassa's, charging them vpon paine of his heauie displeasure not to disclose it: and for the execution thereof, had sent for great numbers of B those soldiers which are called Acanzij, who are amongst the Turks reputed for the best sort of common soldiers. Most of all the Bassa's to whom he had imparted this his cruell deuise, much disliked thereof, as too full of perill and danger: yet seeing him fully resolued for the performance thereof, would not, or durst not say any thing to the contrarie. Only Alis & Isphender Bassa (both discended of the honorable family of Michael Ogli) dissuaded him from attempting any such thing: alledging first, That the Ianizaries were in number many, soldiers of great courage and experience, resolute men, and such as would sel their liues deere: Then, admitting that he should kill all them about the court and in Constantinople; yet for as much as all his strong townes and castles, especially in the frontiers and chiefe places of his dominions, were
C possessed and holden by strong garrisons of other Ianizaries, fellows and friends of these (who would vndoubtedly take vp arms in defence of themselues, and reuenge of their dead friends) it were a thing very like to endanger himselfe, together with the whole state of his empire, beside the great dishonour which would grow vnto himselfe thereby for euer.

This so dangerous an exployt, wherein the hands of so many were to be vsed, was not kept so secret, but that the vigilant and wilie Ianizaries had got an inckling thereof; and thereupon began daily more & more to suspect the matter, both by the often & secret repare of the great men to the court, more than they had before seen, & also by the vnwonted multitude of those Acanzij, which were daily brought vnto the imperial citie by great troups. Wherfore fearing to be suddenly surprised, they banded themselues together, and openly stood vpon their gard: and by chance lighting vpon Alis Beg as he came from the court, (who was indeed their best D friend) after their barbarous manner, with many opprobrious & contumelious words, demanded of him, if he were not one of them who had conspired their destruction: and without more ado had presently slain him, had he not (as a well spoken man) with great protestations and oathes persuaded them, that he neuer consented to any such thing, or that they needed to feare any such thing from him: and so with much adoe rid himselfe out of their hands.

Baiazet seeing his purpose discouered, and that he could not without great bloudshed, and danger both to his estate and person, worke his will vpon the Ianizaries; by the counsell and aduice of them that saw further into the matter, to colour his former intention, commanded by open proclamation, That the Ianizaries and other his men of war (of whom he had a great E power now assembled at Constantinople) to be in readinesse against a certain prefixed day, to go with him into Moldauia: as if he had raised that power for that purpose only. But when the time was come that he should set forward, the Ianizaries put themselues in order of battell by themselues, and would in no wise joyne themselues with the rest of the armie, or receiue the Emperor into the midst of their ranks, as they had alwayes before accustomed; but furiously shaking their weapons at him, told him plainly, that he had sought their destruction; and bid him therefore if he thought it so good, to set his executioners to worke vpon them, whom he should find both readie and able to defend themselues. To pacifie their furie, Baiazet was glad to giue them good words, and to vse all the means he could (by his great Bassa's and other captains which were able to do any thing with them) to persuade them to be quiet; swearing vn-
F to them by the holy soule of his father (a solemne oath amongst the Turks) that he would not harme or wrong the meanest of them. So with much adoo they were at length appeased, and receiued Baiazet into the midst of them, as their woonted manner was.

Baiazet purposeth to destroy the Ianizaries.

This dangerous tumult so quieted, Baiazet set forward, and passing ouer Danubius, entered into Moldauia, where he first layd siege to a strong towne standing vpon the Euxine sea, called of the Turks Kele, but in antient time Achilleia, which was at length deliuered vnto him by G composition. From thence he went to Ac-girmen, otherwise called Asprocastron, which after a moneths siege was also deliuered vp by composition: which two strong places so woon, he returned againe to Constantinople.

Many great Princes sue to the Master of the Rhodes for Zemes.

Many great princes desirous of Zemes, labored by their Embassadors to haue obtained him of the Great Master of the Rhodes: first Baiazet his brother, fearing least he should at one time or other againe breake forth vpon him, or else set vp by the Christian Princes, trouble his estate, offered great sums of mony to haue had him deliuered into his hands: and Charles the French king purposing the conquest of Naples, (which he in few yeares after performed) and after that to haue inuaded Grecia, thought Zemes a most fit instrument for the furtherance of those his high designes, and was therefore wonderful desirous to haue had him. Matthias also H King of Hungarie (a fortunat Warriour against the Turke) perswaded that the hauing of him might be vnto him a great furtherance in the course of his victories, sought by all the meanes he could to haue obtained him. At which time also Innocentius the eight of that name, Bishop of Rome, no lesse desirous than the rest, to haue in his keeping so great a pledge of peace and war (the bridle of the Turks furie, together with the large pension he was sure to receiue yearly from Baiazet for the safe custodie of him) so wrought the matter by Lyonel Bishop of Corcordia, his cunning Legat, that the Great Master, fearing on the one side to be constrained by the great power of Baiazet, to grant that he had so often refused, and now so earnestly solicited on the other side by the Bishop, caused Zemes to be deliuered to him at Rome in the yere 1488: for which doing he was by the Bishop honoured with the honour and title of a Cardi- I nall. So Zemes to the great profit of the Bishop (who receiued from Baiazet a yerely pension of fortie thousand duckats) remained in safe custodie at Rome all the time of Innocentius, and also of Alexander the sixt his successour: vntill that the French King Charles the eight, passing thorow the heart of Italie with a strong armie against Alphonsus King of Naples, in the yeare 1495, and making his way thorow the citie of Rome, so terrified the great Bishop (who altogether fauoured and furthered the title of Alphonsus) that he was glad to yeeld to such articles and conditions as pleased the King: and amongst the rest, to giue in hostage vnto the King his graceless sonne Cæsar Borgia Valentinus, and also to deliuer vnto him Zemes his honorable prisoner, as shall be afterwards in place conuenient at large declared.

In the beginning of Baiazet his raigne, whilest he was busied against his brother Zemes in K Asia, Iohn Castriot the son of Scanderbeg, aided by the Venetians, after he had fortunatly ouer-throwne the Turke in a battell neere vnto Croia, recouered a great part of Epirus out of their possession. At which time also Iohn Chernouich, a Christian Prince of Albania, casting off the Turkish yoke imposed vpon him by the late Emperor Mahomet, suddenly tooke vp armes, and by the helpe of the Venetians valiantly repulsed the enemies out of that part of Albania; and so troubled Baiazet, that he was glad to suffer him peaceably to enioy all that he had by force recouered, and further to content himselfe with a small tribute for the rest.

1486. Baiazet highly offended with Abraham (whom some call Pyramet) the King of Carama-Baiazet inuadeth Caramania. nia, for aiding his brother Zemes against him; in reuenge thereof raised a great armie both in L Europe and Asia, and marching alongst Asia the lesse, through the countries of Phrygia, Mysia, Caria, Lydia, and Pamphilia, entered at length into Caramania. But the King of Caramania hearing before of his comming, and knowing himself too weake to meet him in field, fortified the strong cities and places of his kingdome, and retyred with his armie into the straits of the mountain Taurus, where it parteth Cilicia from Syria; wherein he was in more safetie than in any of his strongest holds. Baiazet finding no way to come to him, spent most part of the Summer in spoyling of the open countrey: but perceiuing his enemies could not so be drawne into the field, he laid siege vnto the famous citie of Tarsus, being the chiefe Citie of the champaine part of Cilicia (the natiue place of Saint Paul the Apostle) and in short time so battered the walls of his citie with his great ordnance, that he had made them faultable. The M Citisens considering the danger they were in, offered to deliuer vp their Citie, their libertie, Tarsus in Cilicia yeeldeth to Baiazet. liues, and goods reserued. Of which their offer Baiazet accepted, and most honourably performed his promise for their safetie; not permitting any of his soulders to enter the Citie, more than such as must needs for the guard of his person, and safe keeping of the citie. And for as much as Winter began now to grow fast on, he dispersed his souldiers into the Countrey

A trey villages round about, not suffering the countrey people to till or sow their land, or to doe any thing els which might turne to their profit or good; wherby they were inforced to yeeld themselues wholly to his deuotion. The Caramanian King seeing his people daily fall from him, & fearing to be at length forsaken of his soldiers also, in this his distres obtain'd aid both of men and mony from Caytbeius the great Sultan of Ægipt, and so with all the power he could make, tooke the field with the first of the next Spring, fully resolued to trie the fortune of a battel, although in strength and power he knew himself much inferior to his puissant enemy.

Baiazet glad to see his enemie so forward, speedily assembled his armie, and without delay offered him battell: which the Caramanian king refused not. So betwixt them was begun a A long and ter- fierce and terrible fight; which by the skilfull conduct of the leaders, and exceeding courage rible battell be-
B of the soldiers, was maintained the whole day with doubtfull victorie and great slaughter on twixt Baiazet both sides, new supplies still comming on in stead of them which were slaine. The day decli- and the king of ning, the Caramanian king (whose fatall destinie had now appointed him vnto his last worke) Caramania.
seeing his wearied soldiers rather ouerlaid with multitude, than vanquished by force, to begin to giue ground vnto their enemies; couragiously thrust forward with his guard and other valiant soldiers about him, with such furie, that he brake into the midst of his enemies battaile: where being known, he was forthwith enuironed by the Turks, and so hardly charged on eue-rie side, that hauing his horse slaine vnder him, he was enforced to fight on foot; where after he had with his owne hand slaine diuers of his enemies, he fell downe dead in the middest of them. His souldiers discouraged with his death, turned their backes and fled, and in flying C were for the most part either slaine or taken prisoners. After this victorie, Baiazet speedily ouerran all that large countrey, and without resistance in short time brought vnder his obeysance all the countrey of Cilicia.

There was at that time in that part of Cilicia which is called Trachea, and lieth toward the sea side, an antient Mahometan Prince who had vnder his command most part of that country, with the famous and populous city of Scandeloro, the chiefe place of his resiance. This prince had of long time liued betwixt the Christian Kings and the Kings of Caramania, as neuter, stil fearing the greater, but indeed louing neither: and had vntil then chiefly maintained his state by the allyance he and his ancestors continually held with the Kings of Cyprus and the grand Masters of the Rhodes. Against this poore Prince, the only one now left in Asia the lesse, not D subiect vnto the Turkish Kings, began Baiazet now to turne his forces; purposing before he proceeded any further, to make a ful conquest of the lesser Asia, and so to make all sure behind him. Of which his purpose the Prince hauing knowledge, and wisely weighing his own small power to withstand so puissant an enemy; offered by his Embassadors to deliuer vnto Baiazet his chiefe citie of Scandeloro, with all the rest of his territorie in Cilicia, vpon condition, that Baiazet should giue vnto him other possessions for it, in some other part of Asia the lesser, to the like value. Which his offer Baiazet accepted, and so became lord of all the sea coast, from the straits of Bosphorus, vnto the confines of Syria.

After he had thus conquered Cilicia, with a great part of the mountaine Taurus, he descended into Armenia the lesse, and in short time brought vnder his subiect on so much of that E countrey, as also of Cappadocia, as was sometime belonging to the Caramanian Kings. When Baiazet had thus slaine the Caramanian King, and subdued that most antient kingdome of the Turks, which had long and many times mightily contended with the glorie and power of the
keepe in obedience those new woon countries: and as a triumphant conqueror returned himselfe to Constantinople, where he was of his subiects joyfully receiued.

After that Baiazet had thus inlarged his Empire with the kingdome of Caramania, and was 1487.
now become an vnwelcome neighbour vnto the great Sultan of Ægypt and Syria; he began to swell in disdaine against that mightie Prince, for that he had giuen aid against him, first vnto his brother Zemes, and after that to the Caramanian King in these late wars: of which wrong F purposing to be reuenged, he shortly after appointed one Caragosa Bassa his lieutenant in Asia, with Ishender another of his great Captaines, with a strong armie to inuade Syria, then part of the great Sultans Kingdome. These two great Commanders well appointed for the purpose, when they were come to the vttermost parts of Cilicia, the new bounds of Baiazets Empire, were then to passe by the confines of Aladeules his kingdome, before they could passe the great great mountaine Taurus to come into Syria. This Aladeules commanded as King ouer the G rude and fierce people which dwelt alongst that great and rough mountaine, and was then in league with the Sultan. He hearing of the approch of the Turks armie, with a great number of his mountaine people lay in ambush in the straits whereby the Turks must needs passe, of purpose to intercept them. Ishender marching in the vauntgard with a great number of the voluntarie souldiers called Acanzij, as the manner of the Turks is, and fearing nothing lesse, than to be set vpon by the mountaine King, before he was aware was come into the midst of his enemies, and was by them so fiercely charged on euerie side for their places of aduantage, that he there lost most part of his men, and forsaken of the rest, which fought by flight to saue themselues, he with his two sonnes and others were taken prisoners: Michael-beg the eldest of the two being fast bound, was slaine by one of Aladeules his followers, whose brother he had slain H in that skirmish: his head being cut off, was by the commandement of Aladeules carried to his father Ishender, the more to grieue him: who disdainfully willed the messenger not to shew it vnto him, but to bid his master eat it if he would. With which answer Aladeules was exceed-dingly mooued; neuertheless pitying the old mans miserie, he shortly after set Iaxis-bey he yonger brother at libertie: but Ishender himselfe he sent prisoner vnto Caitbeius the great Sultan at Caire, where he remained in prison fiue yeares after. Caragoses the Bassa discouraged with the losse of so great a man, retyred with his armie backe againe into Cilicia, and from thence aduertised Baiazet what had hapned, by whom he was commanded to returne to Constantinople, as a man vnfit for so great an enterprise.

1488 The next Spring following, Baiazet constant in his former resolution for the inuasion of I Achmetes being discomfited, is taken prisoner & sent to Caire. Siria, sent Achmetes another of his Bassa's, with a far greater army than had Caragoses, against the Sultan: who was no sooner come to the further part of Cilicia, but he was there at a place called of the Turks, Tzucur Oua, encountred by the Ægyptians & Arabians, and there in a great battell ouerthrowne; wherein he himselfe fighting most valiantly, lost two of his fingers, and being taken prisoner was sent to Caire.

1489 Baiazet with this ouerthrow rather incensed than discouraged, made great preparation the next yeare against the Sultan both by sea and land, such as he had not before at any time made.
And when all things were now in readines, sent Alis Bassa (of some called Calibeus) and Cherse- ogles his sonne in law, two notable captains, with a great and puissant armie by land, against the Ægyptian Sultan: at which time he requested of the Venetians, with whom he was then in K league, That he might by their good leaue, as occasion required, refresh his fleet (then readie to put to sea for the inuasion of Syria, as he said) in their Island of Cyprus. Which his request was by the generall consent of the Senat denied, as a thing tending to the great danger of their State: yet wisely doubting lest Baiazet taking that deniall in euill part, should seeke to haue that by force, which he could not obtaine by request, they presently sent Francisco Priuli o their Admirall, to sea with thirtie gallies for the defence of that Island. He hearing that one fleet of the Turks gallies, lately come out of Hellespontus, lay houering at the Island of Sciros, expecting a far greater from the coast of Ionia; and carefully considering how secret and sudden the Turkish designements were, although it was giuen out, that al this great preparation was made against the Sultan: yet to prouide that they should not suddenly surprise the Isle, L he speedily sent sundrie companies of souldiers, especially archers, out of Creta into Cyprus, for the better defence thereof; but stayed himselfe with his fleet at the Island of Naxos, that so at hand he might be the readier to withstand whatsoeuer the Turks intended. But when he vnderstood that all their fleet was met, and now set forward, he hoysed saile, & held his course directly for Cyprus. In the meane time the Turkish fleet sailing alongst the coast of Lycia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia, kept on their course vntill they came vpon the coast of Syria: by which time Calibeus and Cherscogles were come with a mightie armie into Cilicia, neere vnto the mountaine Taurus.

Caitbeius the Egyptian Sultan hauing before had certaine intelligence of the great preparation that Baiazet had made against him, had before sent Vsbeg a most valiant and politicke cap- M taine, with a strong armie of his Mamalukes and other his most expert souldiers into Syria, to be readie at all times to withstand the Turkes. This worthie chieftaine vnderstanding of the comming of the Turks armie, thought it greater policie, to carry the calamities which always wait vpon great armies, into the enemies countrey, than to receiue it into his own bosom. And there-

A therefore although he knew himselfe to be for number far inferior vnto his enemies, yet supplying that want with the valour, courage, and assured confidence he had reposed in the approued and inuincible force of his Mamalukes, he expected not the comming of the enemie into Syria, but passing ouer the mountaine Amanus, and so descending into Cilicia, met him not far from Tarsus, in the same place (as it was thought) where Alexander the Great had long before in a great battell vanquished Darius.

These two puissant armies come from far out of diuers parts of the world, the one to finde A long and terrible battell betwixt the Turks and the Mamalukes.
the other, were no sooner come together, but that with like cherefulnesse they joyned battell; and that with such violence and furie, that the earth seemed to tremble vnder their feet, and a most present destruction threatned vnto them all: which terrible and cruel fight was maintained all that day with doubtfull victorie, and exceeding slaughter on both sides; the politique Generals with new supplies of fresh souldiers continually relieuing the most distressed parts of their battels; and they likewise as men prodigall of their liues, resolutely offering themselues to all dangers. When this most dreadfull fight had in this sort endured the whole day, and many thousands of valiant men of late aliue, lay now dead vpon the ground, the approc-hing night brake off the battell, and both the armies sore wearied and weakned (but especially the Turks) retyred to their camps, where they rested that night.

But the Ægyptians comming to their campe, found all their carriages with their prouision of victuals and other necessaries quite taken away and gone. Which thing (as some write) the bordering people of the country (for most part liuing vpon robbery) had done in time of the C battel, to please the Turks: or as some others report, they which had the charge thereof, terrified with the greatnesse of the Turks armie, and doubtfulnesse of the battell, fled away; and taking their way along the sea side, fel into the hands of the Turks which were put on shore out of the gallies, and so were of them spoyled. Howsoeuer it was, (for in so great vncertaintie I dare not affirme) certain it is, that the Egyptians were sore troubled with the losse of their pro-uision, fearing that if they should now stay longer in the countrey, they should forthwith be driuen to great extremities for want of necessaries. Wherefore when they had euill rested that night, the next day early in the morning they presented themselues in order of battell before their enemies, brauing them into the field, and daring them to battel. The Turks disdaining to see any prouder in field than themselues, after they had in goodly order ranged their battels, D set forward with ensignes displayd against their proud enemies. There began a most terrible and bloudie battell, fought with such desperat resolution, as if they had solemnly vowed, either to ouercome or die in the place where they stood. A man would haue said, that the former days furie had bin but a play in comparison of this: many valiant souldiers couered with their dead bodies the same ground whereon they liuing stood, when they receiued the first incounter of their enemies. Of both those great armies none was seen to giue ground, or once looke backe: the Turks Ianizaries, and the Ægyptians Mamalukes (the vndoubted strength of the greatest Mahometan Monarchs, souldiers for their valour much feared, and through the world renowned) there buckled together, and standing foot to foot spent the vttermost of their for-E ces one vpon another; as if they would in that battell haue made it knowne vnto the world, which of them were to be accounted the better souldiers. Whilest victorie stood thus doubt-full, and the day was now far spent, Vsbeg the Ægyptian Generall, with fifteene thousand valiant horsmen (whom he had receiued for that purpose) gaue a fresh assault vpon the Turks squadrons, with such force, that they had much adoo to keepe their order, and began now to giue ground; which was by and by made good again by other fresh men speedily brought on by the Bassa's. Then became the battell more fierce than before, euery man striuing to the vttermost of his power, to sell his life vnto his enemies as deere as he could. In which manner of fight all the rest of the day was spent, vntill that after the going down of the Sun, the darknesse of the night comming fast on, they were glad for lacke of light to breake off the battel, and to F retyre themselues into their camps, not knowing as yet who had got the better.

The Turks Bassa's taking view of the armie, and finding that of an hundred thousand fighting men which they brought into the field, there was scarce a third part left, and most of them also maimed or hurt; & doubting to be set vpon againe the next morning by their resolute enemies, fled away secretly the same night, leauing behind them for haste their tents well stored The Turkes flie away by night. with victuals and all other things needfull. The Ægyptians also hauing lost one half of their armie (which was at the first seuentie thousand) and wanting their necessarie prouision, were retyred also the same night into the mountaine Taurus, not knowing any thing of the flight of the Turks. And some of the souldiers passing quite ouer the mountaine without stay, into Syria, raised a report all ouer the countrey as they went, That the Sultans armie was ouerthrown, and that the Turks had got the victorie: so vncertaine was the true knowledge of the euent of that battel, euen vnto them that were present therein. The Ægyptian lying that night vpon the side of the mountaine, had speedie intelligence from Aladeules, of the flight of the Turks: which being also confirmed by his espials to be true, he presently came downe from the mountaine, and entred into the Turks campe, where he found plentie of victuals and of all other things needfull for the refreshing of his armie.

Aladeules the mountaine King, with the people called Varsacide, by whose confines the Turkes must needs in their returne passe, robbed and slew many of them in their disordered flight; and had so stopped the passages, that they were in flying ouertaken by the Mamalukes, and slaine with so great a slaughter, that of all that great armie of the Turks few remained aliue to carrie newes home. Calibeius and Cherseogles the Bassa's, were in that flight both taken prisoners, and afterwards presented to Caytbeius the Sultan, at Caire, with eighteene ensignes of the Turkes Sanzackes, which are great men amongst them, hauing euery one of them the regiment and commaund of some one prouince or other, and are in degree next vnto the Bassa's.

Neither was the fortune of Baiazet his nauie at sea, better than that of his armie at land: for as it lay at rode vpon the coast of Syria at the mouth of the riuer Orontes, which runneth by the famous citie of Antioch, his gallies were by tempest and rage of the sea put from their anchors, and in the sight of their enemies swallowed vp of the sea, or else driuen vpon the main, and there with the surges of the sea beaten in pieces. Baiazet not a little troubled with these losses both by sea and land, at length with much ado, by his Embassadors concluded a peace with the Sultan, vnto whom he restored all such places as he had before taken from him: for which the Sultan deliuered vnto him Calibeius, Cherseogles, Achmetes, and Ishender, with all the rest of the Turks prisoners, which he had in great number in his keeping.

Shortly after this peace was concluded betwixt these two great and mightie Princes, Caytbeius the Sultan died: who of a Circassian slaue, by many degrees of honour, and by the fauor of the Mamalukes his fellowes, obtained the rich Kingdome of Ægypt, which he right worthily gouerned to his immortall praise by the space of two and twentie yeares; commanding at one time the great and rich countrey of Ægypt, with all Affricke, as farre as Cyrene, Westward; and Iudea, with a great part of Arabia, and all Syria, vnto the great and famous riuer Euphrates, Eastward. In the latter end of his raigne he (ouercome with the importunitie of his wife Daltibe, an Arabian borne, a woman of an haughtie spirit) joyned his sonne Mahomethes, a yong man of about foure and twentie yeres old, with him in the fellowship of his kingdome; that so possessed of it his father yet liuing, he might the better enioy it after his death. Contrarie to the custom of the Mamalukes, who of long time had not vsed to haue their king by succession, but by their free election. Who grudging to be thus defrauded of their wonted choise, immediatly after the death of Caytbeius slew Mahomethes his son; and in a few moneths after, foure moe, who one after another without their good liking had aspired vnto the kingdome: neither could they be contented, vntill such time as that they had according to their wonted custome set vp a Sultan of their own choice.

About the same time that the aforesaid peace was concluded betwixt the two great Mahometane Princes Baiazet and Caytbeius, Charles the French King was making great preparation against Alphonsus king of Naples; giuing it out, That after he had recouered that kingdom, he would forthwith from thence inuade the Turks dominions in Grecia. Which great attempt the haughtie King was induced to take in hand, by the persuasion of diuers of his Nobilitie, but especially the solicitation of Lodouicus Sfortia Duke of Millan: whereby the whole state of Italie was in short time after sore shaken, and Sfortia himselfe, authour of those troubles, at last carried away by the French, miserably ended his dayes as a prisoner in France. Alphonsus the Neapolitan King doubting the greatnesse of the French King his enemie, entered into a confederation with certaine of the States of Italie, against the French, but especially with Alexander the sixt then Bishop of Rome: for the better assurance whereof, he gaue his his base daughter in marriage to Godfrey Borgia, the Bishops son, and made him prince of Carinula: his other son Frances he entertained also in great pay to serue him in his wars. And by his embassadour Pandonius Camillus, lately returned out of France, gaue Baiazet to vnderstand, what the French king had purposed against them both, requesting him to aid him with six thousand horsmen & as many foot against their common enemie, promising to giue them honorable entertainment during those wars. And to further the matter, Alexander the great Bishop sent George Bucciarde, a Ligurian, skilfull in the Turkish language, embassador to Baiazet, to declare vnto him with what great preparation, both by sea and land, the yong French king (desirous of honor and the enlargement of his kingdome) was about to inuade Naples; and then, with what great power (after he had dispatched his wars in Italie) he purposed to passe ouer into Græcia, and that he had to that end earnestly trauelled with him to haue Zemes his brother deliuered into his hands, whom he desired to vse as a most fit instrument for the troubling of his state and empire, by reason of his many friends: yet that his Holinesse (hauing the French in distrust as a proud and ambitious people, as also care full for the danger of the citie of Rome, and of the state of Italie in generall) had entered into a confederation with Alphonsus king of Naples, with their vnited forces to withstand that proud nation, both by sea and land; wanting nothing more for the accomplishment therof, than mony: by which means only, Baiazet might (as he said) prouide for the safetie of his kingdome in Grecia, if he would put to his helping hand, to furnish them with money for the entertainment of souldiers: forasmuch as the citie of Rome, and the kingdome of Naples, were the surest wals of that side of the Othoman empire; if he not altogether refusing the charge, would not spare for a little cost to maintaine the war rather in that forreine countrey, than to receiue it, brought home to his owne doore, concluding, That it were much more commodious and easie with his treasures to represse his enemie in a strange country a far off, than by dint of sword and plaine battell in his owne. A thing by experience well knowne, That they which haue neglected and set at nought remote dangers, for sparing of charge, haue afterwards bin inforced with greater danger to receiue the same into their owne bosomes, when as they were become desperat & past remedie. Baiazet, who both by his espials and often letters and embassadors from Alphonsus, knew all this to be true, gaue great thanks to the Bishop by his embassador, for that he sitting in so high place, did so friendly and in so good time admonish him, both a stranger & of a contrarie religion, of things of so great consequence: yet for answer, he willed him to returne again vnto his master with one Dautius his embassador, who should carrie with him both mony and other his secret resolutions concerning those matters. Among other things giuen him in charge, was an Epistle written in Greek, wherin the barbarous king with great cunning persuaded the Bishop to poison Zemes his brother, as a man of a religion altogether contrarie to his: for indeed of him alone for his great vertues Baiazet stood in feare and doubt, least hee should by some chance escape out of prison to the troubling of his state. For the performance of this his request, he promised faithfully to pay vnto the Bishop, two hundred thousand ducats, and neuer after so long as he liued, to take vp armes against the Christians. Otherwise than had his father Mahomet, and his grandfather Amurath done, who both as deadly enemies vnto the name of Christians, neuer ceased by continuall warres to worke their woe.

But George the Bishops embassador, and Dautius, trauelling towards Italie, and hauing now happily passed the Adriatike, as they were about to haue landed at Ancona were borded by Io. Roueres, brother to Iulianus the Cardinall (a man of great account in those quarters) and cleane quit of their treasure and whatsoeuer else they had aboord. Roueres pretending for the defence of the fact, That the Bishop did owe him a great sum of mony, due vnto him for his good seruice don in the time of Innocentius his predecessor, for which he now paied himselfe. Neither could the Bishop, much troubled with that iniurie, euer after recouer one part therof, although he threatned vengeance with fire and sword, and also sought for recompence of the Venetians, whom it concerned to saue the Turks harmlesse in those seas: for why, Roueres bearing himself vpon the French, which were now vpon comming, whose faction he followed, kept the mony, and set at nought the Bishops thundering curses and vain threats. Dautius himselfe, Baiazets embassadour beeing set on shore, was glad to goe on foot to Ancona; and so from thence passing vp the riuer Padus, came to Franciscus Gonzaga, duke of Mantua, of whom for (the antient friendship betwixt him and Baiazet) hee was courteously entertained and and furnished both with money and apparell, and so spoiled returned into Grecia, to carrie newes vnto his master how he had sped.

When Baiazet vnderstood by Dautius, the euill successe he had in his late iourny, he forthwith sent Mustapha one of the Bassaes of the court, vnto the great Bishop Alexander, with like instructions as he had before giuen to Dautius: who with better hap arriued in Italy, and came to Rome in safetie; where he forgot no part of that was giuen him in charge by his great Master. But amongst many other things, the life of Zemes was that he most sought for at the Bishops hands.

1495. At the same time, which was in the yeare 1495, the French king Charles the eight of that name, passing through the heart of Italie with a strong armie against Alphonsus king of Naples: and taking his way without leaue through the city of Rome, so terrified Alexander the Bishop who (as we haue before said) altogether fauoured, and as much as in him lay, furthered the cause of Alphonsus; that he was glad to yeeld to all such articles and conditions as it pleased him then to demand: not purposing in himselfe at all the performance of any of those things, which for feare he had with great solemnity promised, as the sequel of the matter afterwards declared. Amongst other things, he was inforced to giue vnto the king his graceless son Cæsar Borgia Valentinus (then one of the Cardinals) in hostage, for the performance of the other of his promises. Which disgrace the craftie old Bishop sought to couer, by gracing his son with the title of his Legat: and with him he was also enforced to deliuer Zemes the Turke, Baiazets brother, his honorable prisoner; who to the great profit of the Bishop and his predecessor, had remained in safe custodie at Rome about the space of seuen yeares. But Zemes with three daies after he was deliuered to the French, died at Caieta, being before his deliuerance poisoned (as it was thought) with a powder of wonderfull whitenesse and pleasant tast; whose power was not presently to kil, but by little and little dispersing the force thereof, did in short time bring most assured death: which pleasant poison, Alexander the Bishop, skilfull in that practise (corrupted by Baiazets gold, and enuying so great a good vnto the French) had caused to be cunningly mingled with the Sugar wherewith Zemes vsed to temper the water which he commonly dranke. His dead bodie was not long after sent to Baiazet, by Mustapha his embassador, who to the great contentment of his master, had thus contriued his death with the Bishop. Not long after, this dead body so far brought, was by the appointment of Baiazet, honorably interred among his ancestors at Prusa. Cæsar Borgia also the Bishops son, a little before giuen in hostage vnto the French king, deceiuing his keepers at Velitras, returned againe to Rome before the French king was come to Naples. This wicked impe come of an euil strain, not worth the remembrance but by way of detestation (the very monster of nature, if a man should well consider the course of his whole life) shortly after his escape, enuying at the honor of Candianus his brother, who then was Generall ouer the Bishop his fathers forces, which were at that time great: when he had one time merrily supped with his said brother, with their mother Vannotia, traiterously caused him to be vnawares murdred in the streets as he was going home, & his dead body to be cast into the riuer of Tiber. Then casting off his priestly habit with his Cardinals robes, he took vpon him the leading of his fathers army in his brothers stead, & gaue himselfe wholly to martiall affaires; a vocation best fitting his fierce and bloudy disposition: and with exceeding prodigalitie, wherwith he exhausted his fathers coffers and the treasures of the church, bound fast vnto him desperat ruffians and soldiers (especially Spaniards, his fathers countrey men) such as he knew fittest to serue for the execution of his most horrible deuises. Which manner of his proceedings, although they were such as all good men detested, yet did the old hypocrit his father winke therat, fearing (as it was thought) to be murdered of the viper, himselfe, when it should serue for his purpose. Now when he had thus strengthned himself, & that he was become a terror to all the nobilitie of Rome and the seigniories thereabout, he by the deuise and help of his father (who desired nothing more than to make him great) first draue the most honourable family of the Columnij out of the city, and afterwards out of Latium: and by most execrable trecherie, poisoned or killed the honorable personages of the great houses of the Vrsini & Caetani, taking to himselfe their lands & possessions. With like cruelty he strangled at one time four noblemen of the Camertes: & draue Guido Feltrius out of Vrbin. He took the city of Pisarum from Io. Sforția, who with much difficulty escaped his bloudy hands: & draue the Malatestaes out of Ariminum. The great lady Catherine rine Sforția he thrust out of Forum Liuij and Forum Cornelij, & shamefully led her in triumph through Rome. And neuer satisfied with bloud, which he without measure shed, he tooke the citie of Fauentia from Astor Manfredus, a yong gentleman of rare perfection: whom after the beastly tyrant had most horribly abused against nature, he caused to be cruelly strangled, and his dead bodie to be cast into Tiber. Hauing thus filled the measure of his iniquitie, and as a fretting canker, hauing either deuoured or driuen into exile most part of the Roman nobility, and purposing by the supportation of his father, to make himselfe lord and soueraigne both of the citie, and of all Latium, in the pride of his thoughts hee was by the hand of the most Highest attached and cast downe, and that by such meanes as he least feared: for being with his father at a solemne supper in the Vaticane, of purpose prepared for the destruction of certain rich Cardinals and some other honorable citizens, they were both poisoned by the fatall error of one of the waiters, who mistaking of a flaggon, gaue the poisoned wine to the accursed Bishop and his son, which was prepared for the guests; wherof the old Bishop in few daies after died. But his son who had drunke the same more delaid with water, although he died not of long time after, yet presently fel into such an extreme sickenesse, that he was not able to help himselfe, or to command his desperat followers, whereof he had great store: but lying sicke, in short time saw himselfe of them forsaken, and two of his enemies, Pius the third, and Iulius the second, one after another sitting in his fathers place. Of which two, Pius enioyed that pontificall dignitie but sixteene daies: and Iulius succeeding him, caused this Cæsar Borgia (who of right had deserued a thousand deaths) to be shut vp in the castle called Moles Adriani, from whence he set him at libertie vpon the deliuerie of certaine strong holds which were yet holden by his garrisons. After he had thus rid himselfe out of Iulius the Bishops hands, he fled to Ostia, and so by sea to Naples: where he was by the commandement of Ferdinand king of Spaine, apprehended by Gonsaluus the Great, and transported into Spaine, for feare least hee, being of a most troublesome nature, and much resorted vnto by his old fauourits, should raise some new stirs in Italie. He was no sooner arriued in Spaine, but he was cast into prison in the castle of Medina, where after he had lien three yeres he deceiued his keepers, and with a rope which he had gotten, let himselfe downe from an high tower of the castle: and so escaping, fled to the king of Nauar, whom he afterwards serued in his wars, and was in an hot skirmish against the kings enemies (wherein he had obtained the victorie) slaine with a small shot. Vnworthie after so many horrible villanies, to haue ended his days so honorably. His dead bodie was found stript, and so brought vnto the king vpon a bad beast, as if it had bin a dead calfe all naked; which was by his commandement honourably buried at Pamphilona.

But to return again from whence we haue something too long with this troublesome body gone astray. The French King hauing thus lost both his great hostages, Zemes the Turke by death, & the Cardinal Borgia by escape, held on his iourny towards Naples; & with wonderful successe preuailed as he went, all places yeelding vnto him without any great resistance. Alphonsus seeing himselfe destitute of such aid as he had in vaine requested both of the Turkish Emperour and of the Venetians, and now almost beset with his mightie enemie, to whom so many strong places had in shorter time bin deliuered than any man had before imagined; and withall considering with himselfe, how that he had lost the hearts of his subiects (the strongest defence of princes) for that most of the nobilitie, and especially the Neapolitanes, hated him for his too much seueritie in punishing the offenders in the late rebellion, wherein the princes of Same and Salerne were chiefe; and the common people were no lesse offended with the grieuous and heauie exactions, required of them for the maintenance of these wars, insomuch that their murmuring speeches came oftentimes to his owne hearing; as oftentimes it falleth out, That the hatred of the subiects against their Princes, which hath for feare of long time bin dissembled during their prosperitie, more franckly & fiercely breaketh out in their declining estate; for these causes, Alphonsus fearing to be forsaken of his people, as a man in despaire, with abundance of tears openly in the sight of al the Neapolitans, resigned his kingdom of Naples to his son Ferdinand, when as he had as yet scarcely raigned one whole yeare after the death of Ferdinand his father: and with foure gallies passed ouer to Mazerea, a city of Cicilia. His son Ferdinand a prince of rare perfection and singularly graced with all the vertus of true nobilitie, and thereto dearly beloued of all the people, was to the wonderfull contentment of the Neapolitans with great ioy & acclam[illegible] as saluted king; and so hauing performed and furnished both with money and apparell, and so spoiled returned into Grecia, to carrie G newes vnto his master how he had sped.

When Baiazet vnderstood by Dautius, the euill successe he had in his late iourny, he forthwith sent Mustapha one of the Bassaes of the court, vnto the great Bishop Alexander, with like instructions as he had before giuen to Dautius: who with better hap arriued in Italy, and came to Rome in safetie; where he forgot no part of that was giuen him in charge by his great Master. But amongst many other things, the life of Zemes was that he most sought for at the Bishops hands.

who (as we haue before said) altogether fauoured, and as much as in him lay, furthered the cause of Alphonsus; that he was glad to yeeld to all such articles and conditions as it pleased him then to demand: not purposing in himselfe at all the performance of any of those things, which for feare he had with great solemnity promised, as the sequel of the matter afterwards declared. Amongst other things, he was inforced to giue vnto the king his graceless son Cæsar Borgia Valentinus (then one of the Cardinals) in hostage, for the performance of the other of his promises. Which disgrace the craftie old Bishop sought to couer, by gracing his son with the title of his Legat: and with him he was also enforced to deliuer Zemes the Turke, Baiazets brother, his honorable prisoner; who to the great profit of the Bishop and his predecessor, had remained in safe custodie at Rome about the space of seuen yeares. But Zemes within I three daies after he was deliuered to the French, died at Caieta, being before his deliuerance poisoned (as it was thought) with a powder of wonderfull whitenesse and pleasant tast; whose power was not presently to kil, but by little and little dispersing the force thereof, did in short time bring most assured death: which pleasant poison, Alexander the Bishop, skilfull in that practise (corrupted by Baiazets gold, and enuying so great a good vnto the French) had caused to be cunningly mingled with the Sugar wherewith Zemes vsed to temper the water which he commonly dranke. His dead bodie was not long after sent to Baiazet, by Mustapha his embassador, who to the great contentment of his master, had thus contriued his death with the Bishop. Not long after, this dead body so far brought, was by the appointment of Baiazet, honorably interred among his ancestors at Prusa. Cæsar Borgia also the Bishops son, a little before K giuen in hostage vnto the French king, deceiuing his keepers at Velitras, returned againe to Rome before the French king was come to Naples. This wicked impe come of an euil strain, not worth the remembrance but by way of detestation (the very monster of nature, if a man should well consider the course of his whole life) shortly after his escape, enuying at the honor of Candianus his brother, who then was Generall ouer the Bishop his fathers forces, which were at that time great: when he had one time merrily supped with his said brother, with their mother Vannotia, traiterously caused him to be vnawares murdred in the streets as he was going home, & his dead body to be cast into the riuer of Tiber. Then casting off his priestly habit with his Cardinals robes, he took vpon him the leading of his fathers army in his brothers stead, & gaue himselfe wholly to martiall affaires; a vocation best fitting his fierce and bloudy L disposition: and with exceeding prodigalitie, wherwith he exhausted his fathers coffers and the treasures of the church, bound fast vnto him desperat ruffians and soldiers (especially Spaniards, his fathers countrey men) such as he knew fittest to serue for the execution of his most horrible deuises. Which manner of his proceedings, although they were such as all good men detested, yet did the old hypocrit his father winke therat, fearing (as it was thought) to be murdered of the viper, himselfe, when it should serue for his purpose. Now when he had thus strengthned himself, & that he was become a terror to all the nobilitie of Rome and the seigniories thereabout, he by the deuise and help of his father (who desired nothing more than to make him great) first draue the most honourable family of the Columnij out of the city, and M afterwards out of Latium: and by most execrable trecherie, poisoned or killed the honorable personages of the great houses of the Vrsini & Caetani, taking to himselfe their lands & possessions. With like cruelty he strangled at one time four noblemen of the Camertes: & draue Guido Feltrius out of Vrbin. He took the city of Pisarum from Io. Sforția, who with much difficulty escaped his bloudy hands: & draue the Malatestaes out of Ariminum. The great lady Catherine

Hauing thus filled the measure of his iniquitie, and as a fretting canker, hauing either deuoured or driuen into exile most part of the Roman nobility, and purposing by the supportation of his father, to make himselfe lord and soueraigne both of the citie, and of all Latium, in the pride of his thoughts hee was by the hand of the most Highest attached and cast downe, and that by such means as he least feared: for being with his father at a solemne supper in the Vaticane, of purpose prepared for the destruction of certain formed all the ceremonies belonging to his coronation, returned presently to his armie. By G this time the French King with all his forces was entred far into the kingdome of Naples; and hauing taken by assault certaine cities which trusted too much to their owne strength, strucke such a generall terrour into the mindes of the Neapolitanes, that they thought no place now strong enough to abide his batteries, or power sufficient to incounter his forces. Ferdinand the yong king with his armie had taken the straits of the forrest of S. Germane, thereby to impeach the further passage of the French king. But whilst he was there busied, he was suddenly aduertised, that Fabritius Columna with a great power of Frenchmen had by the Appenines broken into Campania, and so was marching towards him: wherefore doubting to be shut vp betwixt two strong armies of the enemies, he retired speedily to Capua, a strong citie scituat vpon the H riuer Vulturnus; purposing there by meanes of that deepe riuer, to stay the French from passing farther. But whilest he lay there, newes was brought vnto him, That all the citie of Naples was in an vprore, and that the citizens were all vp in armes, as men in doubt which way to turne themselues. Ferdinand not a little troubled with these bad news, commended the charge Ferdinand departeth from Capua to pacifie an vprore at Naples. of his armie and the defence of the citie of Capua to his chiefe captaines, and rid himselfe in post backe againe to Naples.

It is a strange thing to tell, what a sudden alteration ensued vpon his arriuall there: for suddenly all the tumult was appeased, euery man laid downe his armes, and welcomed him with a generall gratulation: for he was a man of a great and inuincible courage, and of so comely a personage, as might easily win the hearts of his subiects; insomuch, that when he earnestly re- I quested them, that they would not traiterously betray him to his barbarous & cruell enemies, being their naturall king, or rather their brother borne and brought vp amongst them: they all with one consent answered, That they would spend their liues and goods in his quarrel, so long as he should keepe his armie whole, & defend the city of Capua: but if it should so chance that the Aragonians should be ouerthrowne, or els for feare abandon that city, and the French King, as victor, to approch the citie of Naples, he should do both against reason and equitie, if by exacting fidelitie and allegeance of his subiects, apprehended with so iust a feare, he should so expose that noble citie with the fruitfull countrey thereabout, to be spoiled and destroied by a mercilesse and cruell enemie. Whilest Ferdinand was thus busied in appeasing and confirming his wauering subiects at Naples, the French king had taken diuers cities, and was come before Capua. The citizens of Capua although they were alwaies well affected to the Ara- K gonian Kings, yet seeing the French King as a most violent tempest to beare downe all before him, began now to consult amongst themselues of yeelding vp the city; whereunto they were the more prickt forward, by the sudden reuolt of the great captain Triualtius with his followers; as also by the departure of Verginius and Petilianus, two great and famous commanders, who seeing themselues forsaken of Triualtius, fled with their companies vnto the citie of Nola. In this discomfiture of King Ferdinands armie, the Frenchmen had entered into the suburbs of the citie: which thing Gothfredus and Gaspar (two valiant German captaines) beholding, sallied with their companies out of the citie, of purpose to abate the pride of the French, and to confirme the doubtfull citizens. These worthie captaines, when they had with exceeding va- L lour repulsed the French, and thought to haue againe returned into the citie, could not be suffered to enter, but were by the citizens shut out of the gate, in danger to haue had their throats cut by the enemy. In which perplexity they were glad vpon their knees to intreat the cowardly citizens standing vpon the wals, not in such traiterous manner to betray their friends ready in their defence to bestow their liues: and with much intreating, at length obtained of those heartlesse men, that they might by ten and ten in a companie be recieued in at one gate of the citie, and so put out at another, farthest from the danger of the enemie: in which sort when they had passed through the citie, they tooke the way towards Naples: and vpon the way met with the king at Auersa, vnto whom they declared all that had happened in his absence at Ca-pua: who although he saw his armie dispersed, and all things now desperat, yet went he on forward, and came to the very gates of Capua, and there called vpon diuers of the chiefe men of M the citie, requiring to be let in. But when he saw there was none to giue him answer, & an ensigne of the French king displayed vpon the wall, in token that the citie was become French, he returned to Naples: where he found the gates now shut against him, and all the citizens vp againe in armes, and not willing to receiue any of the souldiers which came from Capua, more

A more than the king himselfe; for flying fame preuenting his return, had filled euery corner of the citie with report, That all the chiefe captains of his army were either gone ouer to the e-nemie, or els for safegard of their liues fled; That the whole army was broken vp, and Capua yeelded to the French. Wherefore the Neapolitans framing their fancies according to the condition of the time, began now also to fawne vpon the good fortune of the French, and to haue king Ferdinand in contempt: which he well perceiuing, and fetching a compasse farther off from the citie, came vnto the castle, whereinto he was receiued with his followers by his faithfull captains therein before left. But prouidently foreseeing that he could not there long stay, but that he should be besieged by his enemies both by sea and land, he commended the keeping of that peece vnto Alphonsus D'analus, a most valiant captain, and departed himselfe B with 20 gallies well appointed vnto Ænaria, an Iland not far from Naples, hauing in it a commodious harbor and a strong castle: where fortune, neuer firme but in miserie, seemed againe to deride the poore remainder of his honor: for comming thither, the captain of the castle, vn-worthily named Iustus, forgetting his duty towards his soueraigne, of whom he had before receiued many extraordinarie fauours, most traiterously now in his so hard distresse shut the gates of the castle against him at his landing, and vnkindly refused to receiue him. With which vnexpected ingratitude, the poore king was wonderfully perplexed & almost abashed: yet with earnest intreatie & ample commemoration of the benefits and preferments which both his father and himselfe had in times past bestowed vpon him, he preuailed so much with this vnthankful man, that he was content to receiue him into the castle, so that he would come C but himselfe alone: of which his offer, when no more could be got, the king seemed to accept.
So the captain hauing opned a port to receiue him in, was in the very entrance therof suddenly stabd to the heart with a dagger by king Ferdinand and slain in the midst of his armed soldiers: which was done with such a countenance & maiesty, that the warders with their weapons in their hands, dismaid with his look, forthwith at his commandement opened the gate, and recived him in with all his followers. Whereby it appeareth, That in the countenance of princes resteth a certaine diuine maiestie, in all fortunes aboue the common course of nature: which is of power to daunt the hearts of most disloial traitors in the performance of their vn-natural treasons. The next day after the departure of king Ferdinand from the castle of Naples, Charles the French king was receiued into the citie, with such pompe, triumph, and acclama-D tion of the Neapolitans, as if they had euen then by the benefit of that forraine king, bin restored to perfect liberty, & deliuered out of some long & hard bondage. Shortly after, the castle of Naples, with all the strong places thereabout were yeelded vnto the French, and embassa-dors sent from all the princes & people of that kingdome, yeelding themselues into the power of the French king. Then Ferdinand seeing all lost and gone, departed from Ænaria, where he lay expecting the euent of his hard fortune, and sailed into Cicilia. Thus the house of Aragon in lesse than fiue moneths, lost the kingdome of Naples, about 63 yeares after that it was first taken from the French by Alphonsus the elder, this Ferdinand his great grandfather.

A most resolued act of king Ferdinand

Charles the French king receiued into Naples.

The report of the great preparation made by the French for this war, had long before filled the eares of them which dwelt in any part of the Turks dominions in Europe; but when E they saw the French ensignes displayed vpon the wals of the castles, and strong townes along the coast of Calabria and Salerne, such a sudden feare fell vpon the Turkes garrisons alongst the coast of Epirus and Macedonia on the other side of the Adriatike, ouer against that part of Italie, that many of them forsooke their charge: the Christians in those places, as also in Gre-cia and Peloponesus, beginning then to lift vp their heads in hope of their deliuerance, and to make the best preparation they could to ioine with the French against the Turks: but especially the rough and wild people inhabiting the high mountaines called Acrocherauni in the borders of Epirus, who presently tooke vp armes, refusing to be any longer tributarie vnto the Turkish Emperour.

F This prosperous and speedie successe of the French King in the conquest of Naples, filled the minds of most of the Christian princes, as also of the Turkish Emperor, with a doubtfull expectation, whither his greatnesse would grow: many being of opinion, that he couertly affected the empire of Rome, and to make himselfe the sole monarch of Italie. Which conceit no little troubled both the great Bishop Alexander, and Maximilian then Emperour. Baiazet also feared much, least hee should vpon the sudden turne his forces into Epirus or Grecia, to his

his no small disquiet. And Ferdinand, the aduised King of Spaine, was no lesse carefull for the safetie of Silicia. Lodouicus Sfortia also (shortly after created Duke of Millan, the chiefe occasion of the French Kings comming into Italie, and a great aider of him in those warres) began now to consider better of the matter, and to stand in doubt of the King, whom he well perceiued to make small reckoning of his word or promise, so that he might thereby enlarge his dominions. And the Venetians, who in all these wars had stood looking on as neuters (in hope that when the Arogonians and French had with long wars, which they vainly imagined, well weakened one another, that they might then at their pleasure share out something for themselues) were now in doubt with the rest of the States of Italie to lose some part of their owne territorie: for now there was no Prince or state in Italie able to oppose themselues against the French, but stood all as it were at his deuotion.

Wherefore the aforesaid Princes, namely Maximilian the Emperour, Ferdinand King of Spaine, Alexander Bishop of Rome, the state of Venice, and Lodouicus Sfortia, Duke of Millan, for the more assurance of their estates, by their embassadors speedily sent from one to another, concluded a strong league among themselues; whereof the chiefe capitulation was, That if any of these confederates should vpon their owne accord make war vpon any other Prince, they should doe it vpon their owne charges: but if any of them should chance to be inuaded by any other, that then euery one of these confederats should of their owne charge send foure thousand horse and ten thousand foot in aid of their confederat so inuaded, vntill the warres were ended: which league was to indure for twentie yeres. The fame of this league was welcome to many other Princes, but especially to Baiazet, who now feared nothing more, than the forces of the French, and had therefore offered vnto the Venetians, to aid them both by sea and land against the French, if their affaires should so require. This league so much pleased not other Princes, but it troubled the French king more, as of purpose made against him; although it was by the confederats pretended to be made onely for their owne safetie. Wherfore he with all expedition placed his best captaines with strong garrisons in all the cities and strong holds of the kingdome of Naples, and left Mompenser his viceroy in the city of Naples, and with the rest of his armie returned into France; purposing by the way as he went to terrifie the dissembling Bishop, so if it were possible to draw him from the league; and afterwards to deale with Sfortia and the rest as he might. But when he was come neere vnto Rome, the Bishop for feare fled out of the citie to Perusium, intending from thence to haue fled to Venice, if the French king should haue further pursued him. Charles deceiued of his purpose, in peaceable manner entered the citie, and there stayed three dayes, and so departed; vsing violence against none, but against such as were well known to be of the Aragonian faction. From Rome he marched to Pisa; and so with much paine passing the Appenines, was at the riuer of Tarrus, not far from Parma, set vpon by Franciscus Gonzago Duke of Mantua, Generall of a great army which the Venetians and Sfortia had raised vpon the sudden to haue stopped his passage: in which battell he was in great danger to haue been taken or slaine, and there lost his tents, with all the rich spoile gotten in the rich kingdome of Naples: yet hauing at length with great slaughter valiantly repulsed his enemies, he afterwards returned in safetie home.

Ferdinand recouereth his kingdome of Naples from the French, and dieth.

About the same time that this battell was fought at Tarrus, the yong king Ferdinand, lately driuen out of his kingdome by the French King, returned againe out of Cicilia to Naples: where he was ioyfully receiued of the Neapolitans, and by the help of his friends (but especially of the great Gonsaluus, sent in his aid by Ferdinand king of Spaine) in lesse than a yeares space recouered the kingdome of Naples againe from the French: and then dying without issue, left the same vnto his vncle Fredericus. Wherin the vncertaintie of worldly honors, the chiefe felicitie of ambitious minds, is wel to be noted; wher as in that one kingdom the chiefe gouernment was six times changed in lesse than the space of three yeares: for first, Ferdinand the elder dying, left that kingdome vnto his sonne Alphonsus, at such time as the French King was making preparation for those wars: Alphonsus despairing of his owne forces, resigned the kingdome to his son Ferdinand, when he had scarcely raigned fully a yeare: Ferdinand in lesse than three moneths was driuen quite out of Italie by Charles the French king: Charles possessed of the kingdome, in short time after was againe dispossessed by the same Ferdinand: Ferdinand hauing with much trouble thrust out the French, died within lesse than a yeare: After whom succeeded Fredericus his vncle, no lesse vnfortunat than the rest: and Charles the French King

A king himselfe liued not long after, but died suddenly as he came from playing at Tennise, being then but seuen and twentie yeares old, leauing the flourishing kingdome of France, with the troublesome title pretended to the kingdome of Naples, vnto Lewis his successor, who liued with great trouble to conquer the same, and with greater griefe to lose it againe.

The death of Charles the French king. 1496

But to returne againe to the course of our Historie, from whence the great occurrents of that time (not altogether impertinent to our purpose) haue a little too far led vs. Baiazet deliuered of two great feares, first by the death of his brother Zemes, and after by the casting out of the French out of Naples; began now to turne his forces vpon the Christians, and by his lieutenant Bali-beg Sauzacke of Silistra, inuaded the countries of Podolia and Rassia, being part of the Polonian kingdome, where the Turks did great harme, and carried away many prisoners. But comming again the second time, and making such like spoile as before, they stayed so long, that the cold of Winter (which in those countries is verie extream) was now come on: and in their returne as they were about to haue passed through Moldauia, they were by Stephanus Prince of that Countrey, denied both passage and victuals, and forced to take the [illegible] long st the sea coast: where many of them straggling from their Armie, were by the way cut off and slaine by the Moldauians; and the rest, what by the extreamitie of the cold, what for want of food, and foulenesse of the way, perished: so that of that great Armie verie few returned home. The Turks histories report, That in this expedition were lost fortie thousand Turks. 1497

He sent also Cadames one of his Bassa's into Illyria; who spoyling that country, with a part of Croatia, was encountred by nine thousand Croatians and Hungarians neere vnto the riuer Moraua, vnder the leading of Countie Bernard Francopaine; where after a cruell and bloudie fight, the Christians were put to the worse, and aboue seuen thousand of them slaine; the rest saued themselues by flight through the mountaines and woods. Of the Christians that were lost, many were drowned in Moraua, chusing rather so to end their dayes, than to fall into the hands of their cruell enemies. This ouerthrow was imputed to the Generall, who would needs giue the Turks battell in plaine field, although he was earnestly entreated by Countie Io. Torquatus to haue kept the straits of that country, whereby he might haue had great aduantage of the enemie. Torquatus himselfe hauing lost all his horsemen in that battell, and his horse killed vnder him, fought valiantly on foot, vntil he was by the multitude of his enemies oppressed and slaine. The Bassa to giue Baiazet a sure testimonie of the victorie, caused all the noses of the slaine Christians to be cut off and put vpon strings, and so by waggon sent them as a barbarous Present to Constantinople. After the death of Charles the French King, Lewis the twelfth of that name hauing obtained that kingdome, wrot himselfe also Duke of Millan, as discended of one of the daughters of Io. Galeatius first Duke of Millan: in which his supposed right hee was fully resolued to make warre vpon Sfortia then Duke of Millan. And for his better successe in those wars, sought by all meanes he could, to draw some other of the Princes and States of Italie into the fellowship of that intended war; but aboue all others the Venetians, as most commodious for his purpose: with whom he made a firme league, and for the ayd they were to giue him, couenanted that they should haue for their share the citie of Cremona, with all the pleasant countrey about Abdua, then part of Sfortia his dominion; which was afterwards accordingly performed.

Sfortia vnderstanding of this compact made against him, and knowing himselfe farre too weake of himselfe to stand against so puissant enemies; attempted first to set Maximilian the Emperor, with the States of Germanie, vpon the French King. But that not sorting to his desire, he sought to agree with the King, by offering to hold his dukedome of him, by paying him a yearely tribute. After he had thus in vain proued all the means he could deuise, to haue appeased the French King, and prouided for his owne safetie; he by his Embassadors sent of purpose, certified Baiazet of the confederation betwixt the French King and the Venetians, and that their purpose was after they had oppressed him, and some other of the States of Italie, then with their vnited forces to inuade his dominions: and that therefore it were good for him in time to looke vnto it, and to giue ayd against those which would in short time become his most dangerous enemies. By this means the Duke was in good hope, so to busie the Venetians by bringing the Turke vpon them, as that they should stand the French in small stead. At which time also the Embassadors of Florence did what they could to pricke forward the Turke Turke to make wars vpon the Venetians, for the malice they bare against them for protecting them of Pisa against the oppression of the Florentines.

Baiazet perswaded by the Embassadours, and calling to remembrance the iniuries before done him by the Venetians; first by giuing ayd to Iohn Castriot the son of Scanderbeg, and Iohn Chernouich another Prince of Epirus, (whereby he lost a great part of that countrey, and was also further enforced to yeeld to such conditions as altogether stood not with his honor) and againe, by denying to giue his fleet leaue to put into their harbours of Cyprus, in the time of his wars against the Sultan of Ægypt: all which he was glad then to endure, for feare lest that his brother Zemes (then liuing) should by their means be set vp against him; promised now to doe what the Embassadors had requested: glad in his minde that the discord of the Christian Princes had presented vnto him so fit an opportunitie of reuenge.

Hereupon he made great preparation both by sea and land against the Venetians, and vpon the sudden caused Scander Bassa his lieutenant in Illyria, with twelue thousand horse to breake into the countrey of Friuli, part of the Venetian territorie vpon the frontiers of Italie. The Bassa as he had in charge, passing ouer diuers great riuers, at length entred the countrey, burning and destroying all before him as far as Liquentia, carrying away with him all the poore countrey people prisoners. But when he was come to the banks of Tiliauentum, and vnderstood that he came too late to pleasure the Duke of Millan (for why, the French with the Venetians had before without resistance driuen him quite out of Italie and Germanie) he there, with more than barbarous crueltie put foure thousand poore prisoners to the swoord; and so hauing filled the countrey with mourning and with bloud, returned from whence he came, loaded with the spoyle of that rich countrey.

At the same time also, Baiazet put to sea such a fleet as none of his predecessours had before set forth; and with a great armie in person himselfe marched alongst the sea coast of Morea, in such sort, as that his armie by land, and his fleet at sea, as neere as they could, kept euen pace the one within sight of the other. Neither were the Venetians vnmindfull of themselues, but set forth a strong fleet vnder the charge of Anthonie Grimani their Admirall; in number far inferior to the Turks, but for equipage, strength, skilfull mariners, and all other manner of warlike prouision, much superior. For which cause the Turks, although defied and braued by the Venetians, yet durst not at the first joyn with them in battell, but stil kept alongst the coast of Morea, not daring to put further off into the sea. In this their course the Venetians troubled them exceedingly, somtimes making shew as if they would haue constrained them to fight, & otherwhiles giuing them chase, neuer departing far from them, wisely accounting it right good seruice, if they could but keepe that hugie fleet from landing in Italy, or other place of the Venetian territorie. Most men were in good hope, that if those great fleets should haue joyned in battel, the Venetians should haue had a notable victorie; for that the enemie as afraid kept so dangerous a course, and so neere the maine. The longer they thus sailed, the more was the State of Venice offended with their Admiral, that he contrarie to all expectation, delayed to fight, and stil suffered the dangerous enemie to approch neerer and neerer their territories: and there were none which had not rather he should haue set all vpon the hazard of one battell, than to protract by delay a long and doubtfull war. Whilest all mens minds were thus in expectation of some great exployt to be done vpon the enemie, newes came to the citie, that the Turks fleet had put into the hauen Sapientia in the Island Sphraga, to water, and was there embaied by the Venetians. This report was of most men joyfully receiued, as if the victorie had bin alreadie assured: and so much the more, for that it was vainly supposed, that it would be gained without any great losse. But others which better knew the place, deemed of the matter far otherwise, saying, That the place wherein the enemie lay was such, as that he might safely at his pleasure depart thence. Yet forsomuch as the Turks fleet was more subiect vnto danger in putting out of the harbor, than in the wide sea, there was no man but was of opinion, That the Venetian Admirall would set vpon them as they should come forth againe. Whilest men were thus diuining too and fro, and the Venetians attending the comming forth of the enemis fleet, it fortuned that Andreas Lauredanus, and Albanus Armerius (two valiant gentlemen) but a little before come from Corcyra, of purpose to be present at the battell, were the first that began the fight; and with their two nimble Ships (after they had changed a few bullets) boorded a tall Ship of the Turks, being of such beautie and burthen, that she seemed rather a Ca-

A stle than a ship, wherof one Baruch of Smyrna (a notable pirat) was captain: who after a long & cruell fight, perceiuing that he must either yeeld, or by force be taken, desperatly set fire on his own ship, by the rage whereof both she and the Venetian ships fast grapled vnto her, were all three together burnt downe to the water. Many of the men (to shun the violence of the fire) leapt ouer boord into the sea, where some of them were taken vp by other ships, and some perished. Some few other of the Venetian fleet couragiously assailed the Turks at their comming out, and doing great harme, put the Turks whole fleet in no small feare. But the most part of the Venetian gallies lay looking on a far off, vnto whom the other before in fight with the Turks, after they had done what they could, retyred also. But by that they had done, it appeared plainly, that the Venetian Admirall that day let slip out of his hands a most notable victorie, if he as a resolute man had with his whole fleet charged the enemie.

After this fight the Turks held on their course, still keeping Morea on the right hand, whom the Venetians still followed: at length the Turks fleet was come to the entrance of the gulfe of Patras, where the Venetians againe faintly setting vpon them, suffered them to recouer the gulfe; with no lesse dishonour than they had before let them escape at the port Sapientia: for the Venetians hauing the aduantage of the place, and better appointed for fight at sea, might easily (as it was supposed) haue gained the victorie, if the commanders (but especially the Admirall) had been so forward in the seruice as became men of their place. But many of them afraid to fight lay aloofe, so that Dauthes the Turks Admirall (who perceiuing himselfe too weake, had purposed to run his gallies on shoare, and so to haue fled to the armie at land, if he had felt himselfe ouercharged by the Venetian Fleet) had now contrarie to his expectation recouered the gulfe he desired, though not without losse of some of his gallies. Within this gulfe standeth the antient city of Naupactum (now called Lepanto) then subiect to the Venetians, whither Baiazet was then come by land with his armie; and now by the comming of his fleet into the gulfe, layd hard siege vnto the citie both by sea and land. They of the citie seeing themselues on euery side beset with their enemies, without any great resistance fell to composition with Baiazet, & so yeelded vnto him the citie, which the Turks hold at this day.

Lepanto yeelded to the Turk.

Grimanus the Venetian Admirall returning to Venice, was for all his euil seruice (or rather for that he, according to his milde nature, had not vsed seueritie against such captaines as refused to fight) cast into prison: and although he was a man mightily befriended, yet was hee by a publique Decree banished into one of the Absytides, Islands vpon the coast of Liburnia. From the first foundation of the city of Venice was neuer man impugned with more spight, or defended by greater friends: but common hatred preuailing, he was neuertheless exiled. Thus Baiazet hauing made a roade into the Venetian territory by Scander-Bassa, and taken from them the citie of Naupactam, with the country therabout, returned with victorie to Constantinople.

The next yeare following, which was the yeare 1500, Baiazet put to sea a greater and stronger fleet than he had the yeare before; and himselfe in person with a puissant armie of an hundred and fiftie thousand men entred by the strait of Corinth into Peloponesus, and marching through the country, came and incamped before the strong citie of Methone (now called Modon) then vnder the gouernment of the Venetians: at which time his great fleet met him there also by sea, as he had before appointed. When he had thus beset the citie both by sea & land, & with long and continuall batterie made three great and faire breaches in the walls, he gaue vnto the same two terrible assaults, and that with such desperat furie, that many of them which went first vnto the breach, ouerthrowne by the presse of them which followed, were trodden to death. Yet neuertheless the citie was both times valiantly defended by the citisens & garrison soldiers: so that when he had done what he could, he was glad to retyre from the wals, hauing filled the towne ditches with the bodies of his slain Turks. The Venetian Admirall Triuisanus lying at the Isle of Zacynthus (but far too weake to fight with the enemie) in the beginning of the siege sent Valerius Marcellus and Baptista Polanus, with two gallies full of men and munition in relief of the besieged; and now doubting their further wants, sent Io. Maripetrus, Alex. Cothius of Corcyra, & Cachuris of Hydruntum, with three other great gallies, with men, munition, and such other things as he thought needful for the defence of the citie. These three resolute captaines comming with a full winde, and packing on all their sailes, brake thorow the Turks fleet lying in their way, and ranne themselues aground vnder the walls of the towne:

towne: for they of the town had so barred the hauen for feare of the enemie, that they could not that way possibly get in. The Citizens and souldiers joyfull of the comming of this fresh supplie, and withall fearing lest the Gallies should be set off againe from them by the enemie, came running by heapes from all parts of the citie, towards the sea, to receiue this new come ayd: which was done with such a confused disorder, that diuers places of the citie towards the land were left without defendants, as if there had beene no enemie neere. Which the Ianizaries quickly perceiuing, presently entred by those forsaken places with little or no resistance. Then the Citizens all too late began to make head: for the Ianizaries alreadie entred made way for the rest of the armie, which swarming into the citie, slew without pittie all that came in the way, as well Grecians as Venetians, with all the souldiers but euen then newly landed out of the three gallies. In this slaughter, Anthonius Fabrius and Bardella (gouernors of the towne) with Andreas Falco Bishop of Methone, in his Pontificalibus and his Mytre on his head, were slaine: none escaped their furie, but such as were for their strength reserued for seruile labour, or for their beautie, to the Victors lust: and of these a thousand bound fast together in long ropes, were brought to Baiazets Pauilion, and there in his sight by his commandement cruelly murthered. The Cities of Corone and Pylus (now called Nauarrinum) sometime the dwelling place of old Nestor, terrified with the taking of Methone, yeelded themselues by composition to Baiazet. This citie of Chrisseum, now knowne by the name of Caput S. Galli, was taken also by Cherseogles, Baiazet his sonne in law. All these were Cities belonging to the Venetians. Nauplium was also besieged by Haly Bassa, but yet still defended by the Venetians. Baiazet hauing new fortified the citie of Methone, and stored it with new Inhabitants, left in it a strong garrison, and so with victorie returned to Constantinople.

Methone taken by the Turks.

Corone, Pilus, and Chrisseum yeelded to the Turks.

1501. At this time Triuisanus the Venetian Admirall died, of griefe of mind as some supposed; in whose place the Senat sent Benedictus Pisaurius, a noble and valiant gentleman, who with the Venetian fleet followed the enemie, then departing from the siege of Nauplium, pursuing them euen vnto the straits of Hellespontus, still cutting off such as stragled or tarried behinde the rest of the fleet: by which meanes he tooke aboue twentie of their gallies, and in his returne tooke from the Turks the Island of Ægina, and landing in diuers places of the Turks dominions, left vnto them the wofull remembrance of his being there. Afterwards meeting with Gonsaluus, surnamed the Great (sent by Ferdinand King of Spaine, to ayd him against the Turks) at Zacynthus, he inuaded Cephalenia (which Triuisanus his predecessour had in vaine attempted the yeare before) and layd hard siege to the citie; which was for a space valiantly defended by the Turks, yet at length by the good conduct of Gonsaluus it was by force taken, when as Gisdare the gouernor thereof, with his garrison of Turks had before fought it out euen to the last man. The citie being taken, all the whole Island yeelded forthwith to the Venetians.

Pisaurius hauing taken Cephalenia, repaired the citie, and leauing a strong garrison for defence of the Isle, departed to Corcyra; where he was aduertised, that the Turks were rigging forth a great fleet against the next Spring, whereof some part lay in the Bay of Ambracia, not far from Corcyra; some at Eante, and the rest within the straits of Hellespontus. Wherefore purposing to do some exployt vpon those gallies which lay in the bay of Ambracia, to auert the mind of the enemie from perceiuing of that he had secretly with himselfe intended, he sent the greatest part of his fleet vnto the Island of Neritos, who suddenly landing should put the Inhabitants in feare. The captaines sent about the businesse, cherefully put in execution what the Admirall had commanded, and by their sudden landing raised such a tumult, that all the countries thereabout were filled with the expectation of that which should ensue thereof. The Bay of Ambracia is so straitned on either side with the mountains of Epirus, that the entrance thereof is but halfe a mile ouer: but by and by opening it selfe into a great wideness, and running vp into the land, maketh a most pleasant and safe harbour for ships and gallies to ride in. Pisaurius with a faire wind comming thither with eight gallies wel appointed, when the Turkes thought him to haue beene at Neritos, and entring the strait, rowing farther into the Bay, burnt one of the Turkes great Gallies, to the terrour of all them that dwelt round about the Bay, and carried away with him eleuen more, laded with munition and victuall, through the strait; the Turks in vaine fretting thereat, and doing what they could with their their great ordnance from shore to haue sunke him in going out of the Bay. But hauing done what he came for, he returned with his prey againe to Corcyra. Not long after he also recouered the castle of Pylos in Morea: which as it was suddenly gotten, so was it as suddenly lost; for Camalia, a notable Pirat of the Turks, who had bin abroad seeking after purchase, putting into that harbor by chance, took three gallies there left by the admiral for defence of the place, and so terrified the faint-hearted captaine, that he fel to composition with the Pyrat, to yeeld him the castle, so that he and his soldiers might in safetie depart: which the Pyrat granting, had the castle deliuered vnto him, which he could not with far greater strength haue possibly woon. So was Pylos for feare twice in one yeare yeelded vp vnto the Turkes, and was both times the death of the cowardly captains which gaue it vp, being both beheaded by the commandement of the Admirall. About the same time, Pisaurius attempted to haue burnt other of the Turks gallies lying in the riuer Eante, vpon the coast of Macedonia: but not with so good successe as before; for the Turks, made more carefull by the losse they had but a little before receiued at Ambracia, did now more vigilantly looke vnto their gallies: so that when Pisaurius had in certain small vessels, made of purpose for that seruice, embarked two hundred resolute soldiers to haue gone vp the riuer to haue fired the gallies, they were by the way after they had entred a good way into the riuer, encountred by the Turks, and enforced to returne. But before they could get out of the riuer, the wind rose so contrarie, with such a stiffe gale ful in the mouth of the riuer, that the mariners ouermastered with the violence of the weather, when they had done what they could, and spent all their strength, were driuen ashore, some on the one side of the riuer, and some on the other, and so fell into the hands of their enemies, of whom it booted not to craue mercie.

Pylos taken 2d the Turkes, and againe yeelded vnto them.

About this time Baiazet tooke also the antient and famous city of Dyrrachium, now called Durazo, from the Venetians; before ruinous, and almost quite abandoned by the inhabitants, as a place of danger, and not to be kept now that the Turk had got all the country round about it. The Venetians sore prest with these wars so long maintained against the Turke, had many times prayed ayd of other Christian Princes, and were well holpen by the Spaniard in the taking of Cephalenia: and now Lewis the French King, vpon a good deuotion to that war, sent the Lord Rauestein with seuen tall ships and fifteene gallies well appointed out of Prouince and Genoa, to aid the Venetians his friends. This fleet departing from Naples, where they had by the way put in, and passing about Italie, and so through the Ionian sea, came to Melos one of the Cyclades; at which Island Pisaurius with his fleet in short time arriued also: from whence they by mutual consent departed together to inuade the Island of Lesbos; and being there safely arriued, landed their Forces, and laid siege vnto the strong Citie of Mytilene, where by the furie of their artillerie they in short time had made a faire breach in the wall. In the time of this batterie, whilest the breach was in making, Pisaurius with part of his fleet sailed to Tenedos; for it was reported, that certain of the Turks gallies were then comming for that place out of Hellespontus. Which report, as some write, was of purpose giuen out by the French, thereby to draw the Venetian Admirall from the siege, that so in the meane time they being in good hope to take the towne in his absence, might themselues carrie away the honour thereof, together with the rich spoyle. Others fauouring the French, blame the Venetian Admirall, as if he had of purpose departed, enuying at the honor of the French. Which is hardly to be beleeued in so honorable a personage, and in an action so much concerning the good of his Commonweale. Howsoeuer it was, the breach being made, in his absence was by the French presently assaulted: although that Paulus Palatesius the Venetian Vice-Admiral, earnestly requested the French Admirall to deferre the assault for a while, and to expect the returne of Pisaurius. Which his counsell the French Admirall gaue him the hearing of, but yet went forward with the assault. The French men after their manner furiously assailing the breach, were valiantly repulsed by the Turks; so that in the breach was made a deadly and most terrible fight, many falling on both sides. Yet for all that, the Citie was manfully defended by the Turks, and the French men were enforced to retyre. The French Admirall hauing taken this repulse, commanded all things to be carried aboord, purposing to haue forsaken the siege, and so to haue departed: when in the meane time the Venetian Admirall returned, and with much adoo persuaded the French to stay. Whereupon the batterie was againe begun with greater furie than before, and now the Leaders were consulting of a fresh assault to be giuen, when suddenly newes was brought, That the Turks fleet was comming to G relieue the citie: and thereupon the assault was for a time deferred, and the batterie continued. But those Turks which came, being in number but few, were for most part by them in the gallies taken and cast ouer boord; some few that got to land, saued themselues in the woods and desart places of the Ile. By this time the citie was againe made saultable, and the Venetians with great courage assailed the breach, and had twice gained the top of the rampiers, from whence they were againe both times beaten down by the Turks, the French all the while looking on. Many valiant men were there slaine and hurt, and in the end the Venetians were glad with losse to retire, as had the French done before. Whilest this was in doing, a pinnace came to the fleet with newes, That the Great Master of the Rhodes was comming with his gallies to the siege: whereupon the Admirals determined to maintaine the siege vntil his comming. H

The siege of Mytelene broken vp.

But the next day after, the French Admirall changing his purpose, shipped his men, and hoysing saile departed to Chios: and sailing thence towards Italie, was ouertaken with a most terrible tempest, wherein the Admirall Gallie with two others were lost, with eight hundred good souldiers; the Admirall himselfe with aboue fortie others were by chance contrarie to all hope saued, and with much danger with his weather-beaten fleet recouered the hauen of Tarentum. The Venetian Admirall thus forsaken of the French, and seeing the time past wherein he expected the comming of the Great Master of the Rhodes, brake vp the siege and departed from Lesbos to Chios, and from thence to Paros, where he found the Master of the Rhodes with his Gallies; vnto whom he complained greatly of the inconstancie of the French, imputing it vnto them, that the citie of Mytilene was not woon. Neither were they I 1502. behinde with him, but in euery place where they came, layd the fault as much or more vpon him. From Paros the Venetian Admirall tooke his course to the Island of Melos, where he found one Rhichius an arch Pyrat of the Turks, who by force of tempest was driuen on shore, and by the sudden comming downe of the Island people taken: him (for that he had exercised exceeding crueltie vpon certain Christians that he had taken) Pisaurius caused to be fast bound to a spit, and with a small fire to be rosted to death. From Melos he returned to Corcyra, and there wintered.

The next Spring, Pisaurius with certaine gallies which Alexander Bishop of Rome had sent vnto him, vnder the command of Iacobus P. saurius bishop of Papnia, sailed to Neritos, now called S. Maura, which is an Island parted from the firme land with a little fret of the sea, long time before that way let in by the Corinthians. Here Pisaurius suddenly landing his men, surprised the Island, and with wonderfulll celeritie and industrie cast vp two great trenches, in such sort, and to so good purpose, that three thousand of the Turks horsemen comming at a low water ouer that narrow strait which parteth the Island from the Maine, were with losse repulsed and forced to retyre. Whereupon S. Maura the chiefe citie was forthwith deliuered vnto Pisaurius, with the rest of the Island.

Neritos taken by the Venetians.

The Venetians wearie of this long and chargeable war against so mightie an enemie, sent Lodouicus Manetius their Embassador to Baiazet, to treat with him for peace: but Baiazet stood vpon such hard points, that nothing could at that time be concluded. Yet Manetius so discreetly vsed the matter, that Baiazet sent with him at his returne to Venice, his Embassador, to L propound vnto the Senat such conditions as it pleased him to grant them peace vpon. This Embassador had audience in the Senat twice, where he in the name of his Master propouuded such proud and vnreasonable conditions, that they were by the Senat rejected, and so he himselfe dismissed and sent backe againe.

1503. The yere following, the Venetians sent an Embassador to Baiazet, who moued with the pitifull complaints of his owne subjects, for the daily harms they receiued from the Venetians alongst the sea coast, as also for want of trade, and fearing also some troubles like to arise in his kingdom in Asia (as indeed there did, not long after) yeelded himselfe more willingly to heare of peace, than before. This Embassador called Zacharias Phrisius, was well heard of Baiazet, and after long suit had brought the matter he came for into some good tearmes; and being M honourably rewarded by the Turkish Emperour, returned home, carrying with him vnto the Senat farre more reasonable conditions of peace than had at any time before beene by Baiazet propounded. Hereupon the Venetians shortly after sent Andreas Gritti (an honourable Senatour) a man well knowne to Baiazet both for his famous traffique in former time at Constantinople,

A stantinople, and also for that in these late warres he was taken prisoner at the winning of Methone, and his life spared at the intercession of Cherseogles (Baiazet his son in law) and afterward ransomed: he in the name of the state from whence he came, concluded a peace with Baiazet. The capitulations whereof were, first, That the Venetians should deliuer vp the Islands of Neritos and Leucadia, reseruing vnto themselues the Island of Cephalenia onely: Then, That Baiazet should restore all such goods as had been taken from the Venetian Merchants, in these late warres: And that it should be lawfull for them (as they were wont) safely to trafique into the Euxine sea, and to Constantinople; and there to haue their Consull or Gouernour as they had had in former time: And last of all, That the Venetian territorie should bee certainely knowne, and separated from the Turkes by certaine bounds and limits. These conditions were

A peace concluded betwixt Baiazet and the Venetians.

B solemnly agreed vpon, and confirmed both by Baiazet and the state of Venice: and so a firme peace concluded in the yeare 1503, after the warres had continued betwixt them about the space of fiue yeares.

The same yeare Baiazet assembled a great and puissant army of his best and most approued souldiers, as well in Asia as Europe, which met together at Sophia, purposing (as it was thought) to haue inuaded Hungarie: but worthily doubting the successe of that war against so warlike a nation, he changed his purpose, and leauing Achmetes Bassa with his Asian souldiers at Sophia, turned himselfe with the rest of his armie into Albania (to reduce those rebellious people againe to his obeysance) and had before sent a fleet of gallies to stop the passages of that countrey alongst the sea coast. But the country people vnderstanding of his comming, fled into the

C high and rough rocks and mountains, from whence they did the Turks great harme: who neuertheless with incredible labour and aduenture, mounted those difficult places; and killing an exceeding number of those mountaine and sauage people, carried all the women and children they could light vpon, away with them prisoners: and with fire and sword made all the countrey desolate. After which spoile done, Baiazet returned with his armie to Manastirum; and departing thence, vpon the way met with a Deruissar (which is a phantasticall and beggarly kind of Turkish monks, vsing no other apparell but two sheep-skins, the one hanging before and the other behind) a lustie strong fat fellow, attired after the manner of his order, with a great ring in each eare: who drawing neere vnto Baiazet, as if he would of him haue receiued an alms, desperatly assailed him with a short Scimitar which he had closely conueyed vnder his hypocritall habit. But Baiazet by the starting of the horse whereon he rid (being afraid

Baiazet in danger to haue slain by a Deruissar or Turkish monke.

D at the sudden approch of the hobgoblin) partly auoided the deadly blow by the traitour entended, yet not altogether vnwounded: neither had he so escaped the danger, had not Isbender Bassa with his horsemans mase presently struck downe the desperat villain as he was about to haue doubled his stroke; but being now strucke downe, he was foorthwith rent in peeces by the souldiers. This treacherous and desperat fact so much moued Baiazet, that he proscribed all them of that superstitious order, and banished them out of his empire.

After so many troubles, Baiazet gaue himselfe vnto a quiet course of life, spending most part of his time in studie of phylosophie, and conference with learned men: vnto which peaceable kind of life, he was of his owne naturall disposition more enclined than to wars; al-

Baiazet by nature peaceable.

E beit that the regard of his state, and the earnest desire of his men of war, drew him oftentimes euen against his wil into the field. As for the ciuile gouernment of his kingdome, he referred it wholly vnto his three principal Bassaes, Alis, Achmetes, and Iachia, who at their pleasure disposed of all things. After he had in this quiet and pleasing kinde of life to his great contentment passed ouer fiue yeares, of a little neglected sparke suddenly arose such a fire in Asia, as was hardly after with much bloud of his people and danger of that part of his Empire quenched: the reliques wherof yet troubleth those superstitious people at this day. Which thing was brought to passe by the craftie deuise of Chasan Chelife, and Schach Culi his boy (whome some call Teckel Scachoculis, and others Techellis) two hypocriticall Persians: who flying into those countries, and with the counterfeit shew of feigned holinesse hauing procured to themselues a great name amongst those rude people, with a number of windie headed followes (filled with the noueltie of their new doctrine) raised first such a diuersitie of opinions about the

F true successors of their vntrue Prophet, and afterwards such a rebellion amongst the people, as that the one yet remaineth, and the other was not in a good while after with great bloudshed appeased.

But

Hyſmael his behauiour in the time of his exile

Hyſmael alſo liuing in exile, moſt earneſtly embraced that new ſuperſtition which Haider his father had before taught in Perſia, but with far better fortune and ſucceſſe. For as ſoone as he was grown to mans eſtate, he following his fathers maner of life, and being by nature wonderfull eloquent, comely of perſon, exceeding wiſe, and of an inuincible courage, was of the rude vulgar people accounted of more like a god than a man: ſo that hee grew to be of great fame and power amongſt thoſe barbarous people with whom he liued. And not the baſe and vulgar ſort only, but diuers noblemen alſo, and others of good reputation, once allured with the noueltie of his doctrine, the more to manifeſt their good will towards the author of their ſect, after they had forſaken their old ſuperſtition, ceaſed not (as the manner of men is) to commend him in the higheſt degree of vertue and honor. And he himſelfe as yet but a youth, altogether bending his wit to the ſetting forth of himſelfe, making ſemblant of more than was indeed in him, obtained, as if it had bin againſt his will, riches, honor, fame, and authoritie; of all which things, he as a notable diſſembler ſeemed to make no account or reckning: neither were there ſome wanting which would ſweare, that Haider his father (as he was an excellent Aſtronomer) calculating his natiuitie, ſhould ſay, That he ſhould prooue a great propher, and the author of true religion, who ſubduing the greateſt part of the Eaſt, ſhould become as glorious both in matters of religion and martiall affaires, as was Mahomet the Great Prophet himſelfe. Which report being bruted abroad amongſt the vulgar people, greatly increaſed his authoritie, and gaue them occaſion to talke of wonders. Not long after, Hyſmael was firſt by the admiration or rather aſſentation of his friends and followers, and afterwards as if it had bin by a generall conſent, ſyrnamed Sophos; which amongſt thoſe people ſignifieth a Wiſe man, or the Interpreter of the gods. Theſe proſperous beginnings, with the troubled ſtate of the Perſian kingdome, encouraged him to take in hand great matters: for his vncle Iacup the Perſian king was long before dead, beeing together with his ſon poyſoned by his adulterous wife: which thing he preſently perceiuing, enforced her to drinke of the ſame cup; and becauſe he would be ſure that ſhe ſhould not eſcape, with his owne hand ſtrucke off her head, and immediatly after died, with his ſonne. After whoſe death great troubles aroſe about the ſucceſſion: and diuers great men one after another aſpired to the kingdome, which they enioyed not long. And amongſt the reſt Eluan-Beg (whom Iouius calleth Aluantes) at that time ſtood in no ſure poſſeſſion of the kingdome, being mightily impugned by his brother Moratchamus.

Hyſmael returneth into Armenia, and recouereth his inheritance.

Hyſmael taking hold of this opportunitie, armed diuers of the moſt able men of his followers, and receiuing ſome ſmall aid from his poore old friend Pyrchales, entered into Armenia, and there partly by the fame that ran of him, and partly by the good will of the people, rather than by any force, recouered his fathers inheritance, whereunto the remembrance of his dead father did not a little further him. He encouraged with this good beginning, daily grew ſtronger and ſtronger, by the continuall repairing vnto him of ſuch as hauing once receiued the doctrine of Haider, were glad of long (for feare of perſecution) to diſſemble the ſame: but now hauing got an head and chiefetaine to cleaue vnto, began openly to ſhew themſelues againe, and in great number to reſort vnto him, in hope of the good ſucceſſe of their religion, not ſo happily begun by his father.

Sumachia taken by Hyſmael.

His power thus daily increaſing beyond his expectation, he laied ſiege vnto Sumachia, a citie in the confines of Media, which he tooke by force and ſacked: and with the ſpoile therof both inriched and armed his ſouldiers, which before were for moſt part naked men. The taking of this citie wonderfully increaſed both his fame and courage, as oftentimes it falleth out, That hautie minds, couragiouſly attempting high exploits, by the good euent of their firſt attempts make way vnto the full of their ſtately deſires. So after this, Hyſmaels thoughts were not ſo low, as to thinke of the taking of this or that little citie; but how he might now compaſſe the great citie of Tauris, the very ſeat of the Perſian kings, and afterwards the kingdome it ſelfe. Whereupon repoſing no leſſe confidence in his own good fortune, than the valour of his ſouldiers, he marched with his armie directly to the city of Tauris, & that with ſuch expedition, that he was come before it before any ſuch thing was feared, much leſſe prouided for. Eluan the Perſian king was then at Tauris, and had but a little before fought a great battell with his brother Moratchamus for the kingdome: and hauing vanquiſhed him, draue him out of Armenia and Perſia; and afterwards, as it commonly falleth out in the winding vp of ciuile warres, had cauſed diuers of the chiefe citizens of Tauris, which had taken part with his bro-

Hyſmael commeth to Tauris.

A brother againſt him, to be ſeuerely executed, filling the eies of their friends with the horrible ſpectacle of their diſmembred bodies, and the hearts of moſt men with ſorrow and heauines: whereby he had ſo alienated the minds of the citizens from him, that now vpon the approch of Hyſmael, they were all readie to forſake him: of which their diſpoſition Hyſmael was beforehand informed, and vpon the good hope thereof had haſted his comming. Eluan the Perſian king thus ouertaken on the ſudden, had not time to raiſe ſuch forces as might ſuffice either to encounter his enemie, or defend the citie; wherefore deſpairing of his owne ſtrength, and iuſtly fearing the reuolt and furie of the diſcontented citizens, as a man diſmaid, ſuddenly fled out of the citie. After whoſe departure the gates were preſently ſet open to Hyſmael. For the citizens which in thoſe troubleſome times (wherin the two brethren contended for the kingB dome) had ſuffered great calamitie, choſe rather in that preſent danger to receiue a conqueror of ſo great fame as was then Hyſmael, than to their vtter deſtruction to oppoſe themſelues againſt him in the quarrell of their cruell king: and the rather, for that they ſaw a generall ſecurity and open way to preferment, propoſed vnto all ſuch as ſhould receiue the reformed religion of this new conquerour.

Hyſmael entering the citie, ſlew certaine of the kings guard which were not yet departed, and then vtterly raſed the ſtately tombe wherein his vncle Iacup was after the manner of the Perſian kings royally buried. And to mittigat the ſorrow he had ſo long conceiued of his fathers death, and with reuenge to appeaſe his angrie ghoſt, he cauſed the tyrants bones to bee digged vp and ſcattered abroad, and the memoriall of his name to bee quite raſed out of all C places of the citie.

Hyſmael taketh the city of Tauris, and defaceth the tombe of his vncle Iacup.

Although Hyſmael was thus poſſeſſed of the regall citie of Tauris, and had thereby made a way for the obtaining of the whole kingdome, yet he knew that ſo long as Eluan liued, his conqueſt was not vnto him aſſured: and therefore to the vttermoſt of his power he augmented his armie with new ſupplies taken vp in that populous citie, whom he furniſhed with armour and weapons taken out of the kings armourie. In the mean time newes was brought vnto him, that the Perſian king before fled into the fartheſt part of his kingdome, was now comming from Scyras with a great armie againſt him; and that Moratchamus his brother, forgetting in this common danger all former quarrels, had raiſed a great armie about Babylon in Aſſyria, in ſhort time to ioyne with his brother.

D Hyſmael neuertheleſſe nothing terrified with the report of the great preparation of the two brethren againſt him, to the intent he might ſeeme to vndertake this war by the appointment of God, and vpon a greater aſſurance than vpon his own ſtrength, reſolued to go againſt them. And ſo after he had muſtered his armie, & in beſt manner he could prouided all things neceſſarie, he ſet forward from Tauris; vſing no other perſuaſion to encourage his ſoldiers, but that they ſhould all as became reſolute men, make haſt & follow him whom God had giuen them for a chiefetain and leader, vnto a moſt aſſured victory. The Perſian king was at the ſame time ten daies journey from Tauris, when Hyſmael with incredible celeritie preuenting the fame of his comming, was come to the mountaine Niphates, which parteth Armenia from Aſſyria: which mountaine, Eluan purpoſing ſhortly to paſſe ouer with his populous armie, had ſent beE fore his ſcouts to diſcouer the ſtraight paſſages, and a multitude of pioners to make the wayes more commodious for his great armie to paſſe. Which thing Hyſmael vnderſtanding, and politickly conſidering that it ſhould be much for his aduantage, if he ſhould firſt himſelfe paſſe ouer thoſe great mountaines, and ſo vpon the ſudden ſet vpon his enemies then lying in ſecuritie, and fearing nothing leſſe than ſuch a deſperat attempt: vpon that reſolution aduanced his enſignes vpon the mountains; and hauing with ſmall reſiſtance diſcomfited them which kept the paſſages, came downe the ſame mountaines like a tempeſt, and furiouſly aſſailed the king, then lying in his campe on the other ſide at the foot of the mountaine: vpon the approch of whom ſuch a hurly burly was raiſed in the kings camp, that what for the confuſed tumult of the ſoldiers, & fearfull outcries of the multitude of baſe people which followed the camp, the F king could ſcarcely giue order vnto his captains what he would haue don, or yet incourage his ſouldiers, or put them in order of battell. So that Hyſmael giuing a fierce onſet with his Armenian ſouldiers, there was ſuddenly begun a moſt terrible and bloodie battell. Neither did that day the fortune of Hyſmael faile him, whoſe courage and proweſſe neuer failed: for aſſailing the Kings battell of footmen, with three ſquadrons at once, hee had ouercome them and put them them to flight before that the horſmen could arme themſelues and mount their horſes, which were for moſt part vnſadled and vnbridled at his comming. The king, who had nothing either feared or foreſeen this ſo ſudden a miſchiefe, but had vainly perſuaded himſelfe, That the very fame of his comming with ſo huge an army, would ſo terrifie his enemies, as that he ſhould find none either at Tauris, or in all Armenia, that durſt make reſiſtance; was glad now to run to and fro to encourage his ſouldiers, to ſtay his diſcomfited battels, yea and to come to handie blowes himſelfe. But when neither his captains nor ſouldiers could put in execution his ſudden directions which he was inforced to giue in that imminent danger, being at once ouercome with ſhame and deſperation, he reſolutely thruſt himſelfe into the head of his battell, and there valiantly fighting was ſlain. Whereupon the Perſian horſemen, the greateſt ſtrength of the Kings armie, hauing now no king for whom they ſhould fight, betooke themſelues to flight, after whom followed the archers, and all the reſt of the kings armie.

When as Hyſmael had with leſſe loſſe than a man would haue thought ſo great a victorie could haue bin atchieued, poſſeſſed the enemies tents, he made no great purſuit after them, for that he thought it more requiſit to refreſh his ſouldiers throughly wearied and almoſt ſpent with long trauell and late fight: wherefore for certaine dayes he repoſed himſelfe with his armie in thoſe his enemies forſaken tents. Afterwards, when he had receiued Embaſſadours from diuers places, yeelding their cities and towns, and that the fauor of the people generally inclined to him, together with the victorie; he marched with his armie to Scyras; where hee was of the citizens who had before heard of the victorie ioyfully receiued, & his army relieued with all things he could deſire. Hyſmael there entertained with the greateſt honours that the fearfull citizens could poſſibly attribute to him, did oftentimes preach vnto them of the truth and excellencie of his fathers doctrine, and withall gaue out ſtrait proclamations, That he would account all them for his enemies, which did not within the ſpace of thirtie daies renounce their old ſuperſtition, and receiue this new found veritie (as he would haue it.) Wherfore, foraſmuch as on the one ſide were propoſed moſt certain rewards, by the happy courſe of his victories, & on the other, was threatned exile and torture to ſuch as ſhould obſtinatly perſiſt in their opinion; in ſhort time he drew all the vulgar people to embrace his new doctrine. And afterwards hauing paied his ſouldiers with the riches of that great citie, he gallantly furniſhed both his old and new ſouldiers that wanted armor, with moſt excellent armor and furniture: for in that citie, one of the greateſt and moſt famous of the Eaſt, were many ſhops full of all kind of armor, which the armourers with wonderfull cunning vſed to make of yron and ſteele & in the juice of certain hearbs, of much more notable temper & beautie than are theſe which are made with vs in Europe; not only head-peeces, curiaſſes, and complete armors, but whole capariſons for horſes, curiouſly made of thin plates of yron and ſteele. Departing from Scyras, he tooke alſo the great citie of Sapha ſuppoſed to haue beene the citie in antient time called Suſa, and Sultania, which for the wonderfull ruines of the huge buildings, is deemed to haue bin the antient and famous citie Tigranocerta. Theſe great matters quickely diſpatched, and hauing in euery citie placed Gouernours of his owne ſect, he paſſed ouer the riuer Tygris into Meſopotamia, of purpoſe to expulſe Moratchamus the late kings brother, out of Babylon, who was yet in armes, and had intended (as is before ſaid) to haue paſſed into Armenia, to haue ioyned his forces with the king his brother: but now terrified with his brothers calamitie (who together with a moſt puiſſant armie, and the ſtrength of the Perſian kingdom, was in one day fallen from the height of ſo great a fortune) thought it not beſt to trie his fortune in the field againſt ſo fortunat an enemie, but forthwith to withdraw himſelfe into the remoteſt places of that large kingdome, and from thence to expect ſome better fortune. For he wel knew that he was not able to withſtand his victorious enemie, now leading after him a moſt puiſſant army, who not long before had with a ſmal power vanquiſhed & ſlain his brother in a great battel. Hyſmael now by the greatnes of his fame and forces, & as it were by the fauor of God himſelf, become a terror to all the princes of the Eaſt, entred into Meſopotamia after the flight of Moratchamus, & receiued all that great pronince into his ſubiection, euery man as it were ſtriuing who ſhould firſt by his ſpeedy ſubmiſſion purchaſe the fauour of the victorious conqueror. To be briefe, Moratchamus already terrified, & repoſing no great hope in himſelf, or his own power, neither deeming it for his ſafetie to ſhut vp himſelf within the wals of any ſtrong city, truſt vp his things of greateſt price, & with his wiues & children fled into Arabia.

Hyſmael goeth againſt Moratchamus.

This

A This Moratchamus is he whom ſome Hiſtoriographers called Mara Beg, and is in the Turks Hiſtories called Imirſa Beg, who (as they report) afterwards marrying the daughter of Baiazet, and recouering part of the Perſian kingdome, was ſuddenly murthered by ſome of his Nobilitie, whom he purpoſed ſecretly to haue put to death, if they had not preuented the ſame by murthering of him firſt. Hyſmael hauing victoriouſly ſubdued a great part of the Perſian kingdome, & filled all the Eaſt part of the world with the glorie of his name, returned out of Aſſyria into Media, & tooke in ſuch cities and ſtrong holds as were yet holden by the garriſons of the late Perſian king. And afterwards returning into Armenia, made wars vpon the Albanians, Iberians, and Scythians, which dwell vpon the borders of the Caſpian: for that thoſe nations, in antient times tributaries vnto the Perſian Kings, taking the benefit of the long ciuile
B wars wherewith the kingdome of Perſia, and all the Eaſt countries with the ruin of the kings houſe, had been of late turmoyled; had neither payed any tribute for the ſpace of foure yeres, nor ſent any honourable embaſſage, as they were woont, and as was expected, eſpecially in ſo great a victorie and alteration of the State.

Hyſmael hauing thus obtained the Perſian kingdome, in ſhort time became famous through the world, and was juſtly accounted amongſt the greateſt Monarchs of that age. But nothing made him more to be ſpoken of, than the innouation he had made in the Mahometane ſuperſtition: for by his deuice and commandement a new forme of prayer was brought into their Mahometane Temples, far differing from that which had been of long time before vſed. By reaſon whereof, Ebubekir, Homer, and Oſman, the ſucceſſors of their great Prophet Mahomet,
C before had in great regard and reuerence, began now to be contemned, and their writings nothing regarded; and the honour of Hali exalted, as the true and onely ſucceſſor of their great Prophet. And becauſe he would haue his ſubjects and the followers of his doctrine knowne from the Turks and other Mahometans, he commanded that they ſhould all weare ſome red hatband, lace, or riband vpon their heads; which they religiouſly obſerue in Perſia vntil this day: whereof they are of the Turks called Cuſelba's, or Red heads. And in ſhort time he had ſo vſed the matter, that he was wonderfully both beloued and reuerenced of his ſubjects; inſomuch that his ſayings were accounted for diuine Oracles, and his commandements for Laws: ſo that when they would confirme any thing by ſolemne oath, they would ſweare by the head of Hyſmael the King: and when they wiſhed well to any man, they vſually ſayd, Hyſmael grant
D thee thy deſire. Vpon his coyne which he made both of ſiluer and gold, on the one ſide was written theſe words, La illahe illalahu Muhame dunreſul allahe: which is to ſay, There are no gods but one, and Mahomet is his Meſſenger. And on the other ſide, Iſmaill halife lullahe; which is to ſay, Hyſmael the Vicar of God.

Hyſmael exceedingly beloued and honored of his ſubiects.

Whileſt Hyſmael was thus wreſtling for the Perſian Kingdome, Chaſan Chelife and Techellis (whom we haue a little before declared to haue bin brought out of the mountains and deſarts, into the countrey villages, and afterwards into the cities; and to haue filled the countries of Armenia and a great part of the leſſer Aſia with the noueltie of their new doctrine and opinions, firſt phantaſied by one Giunet Siech, and afterward reuiued by Haider Erdebil, Hyſmael his father) hauing gathred a great armie of ſuch as had receiued their doctrine, inuaded the Turks
E dominion. For after that Techellis (this cold Prophet) had with wonderful felicitie in the preſence of many prognoſticated of things to come; and Hyſmael the Sophi (of late a poore exiled and baniſhed man) was thought to haue grown vnto the higheſt type of worldly honors, not by mans helpe, but by vprightneſſe of life, and the fortunat paſſage of an vndoubted religion: ſuch a deſire of receiuing that new ſuperſtition poſſeſſed the minds of the people in generall, that the cities and townes thereabouts were now full of them which in token of their new profeſſion had taken vpon them the wearing of the red hat, the knowne Cogniſance of the Cuſelba's. Firſt they met together at the citie of Taſcia, at the foot of the mountaine Antitaurus, or as the Turkiſh hiſtorie reports, at the citie of Attalia, to the number of 10000, vpon a great Faire day; where they layd hands vpon the chiefe Magiſtrate of the citie, and execu-F ted him, ſetting his quarters vpon foure of the higheſt towers of the citie: and further perſuaded by theſe new maſters of this new ſuperſtition, to take vp armes in defence of themſelues and of their ſincere religion (as they termed it) in caſe that any violence ſhould be offered them by the irreligious Turks; they all ſwore, neuer to forſake their Captaines for any diſtreſſe, or yet refuſe any labour or aduenture for the honor of their moſt holy religion (as they would haue it) in defence whereof they had alreadie vowed their soules and bodies. These ringleaders of rebellion, seeing the minds of their frantick followers so wel prepared for their purpose, and reposing a great confidence in their valour and resolution; and withall considering that the mony which was bountifully brought in vnto them by the country people, partly for deuotion, partly for feare, was not sufficient to maintain so great a multitude, gaue leaue by publike proclamation to their vnruly followers, to forrage the country round about them, & to liue vpon the spoile of them which would not receiue their new found doctrine. Whereupon they diuiding themselues into diuers companies, and ranging vp and down the country, brought into the campe abundance of cattell, and other such things as the countrey yeelded: and forthwith (their multitude still increasing) they entred into Lycaonia, a populous & fruitfull countrey, where they refreshed themselues many days, roaming vp and down to the great grieuance and terrour of the people; and brought such a feare vpon the whole countrey, that they which dwelt in open dorps and villages, were glad to flie with their wiues, children, and goods, into the strong citie of Iconium: for proclamations were in many places set vp in the names of Chasan Chelife and Techellis, wherein many both spiritual and temporal blessings were in most ample manner proposed to al such as should forthwith take part with them, and follow that their new doctrine alreadie established in Persia: but vnto such as should obstinatly perseuer in their old superstition, after they had once drawn their sword, was threatned vtter destruction without hope of pardon of life. So that all the inhabitants therabouts, terrified with the terrour of this proclamation, some for feare of death, some vpon inconstancie, some for safegard of their goods and possessions (dearer vnto them than any religion) some other indebted, infamous, in danger of law, beside many fugitiue seruants, dayly resorted to these new masters. Not long after, whilst the Turks were making preparation for the suppressing of this dangerous rebellion, certaine troupes of horsemen sent from Hysmael, came in good time to these new prophets: for Hysmael in fauour and furtherance of that new superstition, had a little before by fit messengers exhorted them to proceed couragiously in their so religious an enterprise, and to joine martiall force vnto the religion they professed: promising further, not to be wanting vnto them at their need, but to send them skilfull Leaders, and from time to time to furnish them with coyne for the maintenance of that war. All this Hysmael did openly in despight of Baiazet, of small beginnings to sow the seed of greater war. For he bearing an old grudge against Baiazet for the former wars betwixt the Turks & the Persians, as also for their disagreement in matters concerning their superstition, and prickt forward with the heat of youth, desired nothing more in the greatnesse of his power, and prosperous successe of his affaires, than to haue occasion to make war with the Turkish king: for which purpose he sent his Embassadors vnto the State of Venice, to joine with them in league and amitie, in such forme and sort as they had long time before, by Catarinus Zemes, Barbarus, and Contarenus their Embassadors, concluded with Vsun-Cassanes the great Persian king his grandfather. The chiefe things that he requested of the Venetians, was, That they would send him out of Italie by the way of Syria, men skilfull in the casting of great ordnance, and with their fleet to trouble Baiazet by sea: promising in the meane time himselfe to fill Asia the lesse with his army by land, and so to giue a faire occasion vnto them, to recouer by sea all such places as they had before in the late wars lost vnto the Turks vpon the coast of Peloponesus and Grecia.

Hysmael sendeth embassadors vnto the Venetians, to ioyne in league with thē against Baiazet

The Venetians hauing with all courtesie entertained the Embassadours, gaue them answer, That they would neuer be forgetfull of the antient league and amitie they had made with the Persian king; the remembrance whereof was vnto their State a thing most pleasant: and that they were wonderfull glad, that the new king was an enemie vnto the Turke, and had them in such regard, as to participat to them the causes of that war: and further to promise vnto them those things, which if his grandfather Vsun-Cassanes, or his vncle Iacup would haue performed, he should not now haue had need to make wars with the Turkish Emperor. But such was the alteration of things & times, that as the Persian kings then liuing at home in peace, thought it not good to stir whilest Baiazet was busie in Europe; so now their State standing in far worse condition and fortune, could not performe that which they heartily wished, and most of all desired; for that they thought it not good to break the league which they had not long before made with Baiazet the Turkish emperor: especially then, when sundrie warlike nations of Europe conspiring together, and diuers mightie kings prouoked with no iniurie, but only enuying

ing at their happie estate, made wars vpon them; yet neuertheless were in good hope, that God would stand in their iust defence, and still preserue their state, which no enemies power had for the space of 700 yeares and more been able to ouercome. Wherefore they should shew vnto their King, that they would as occasion should serue, and as it should stand with the good of their State, do their vttermost deuoire to make him vnderstand, that nothing was deerer vnto them than the friendship of so great a King: nor any thing more honorable, than by mutuall counsell and combined forces to assaile the Turke their common enemie.

Shortly after, the Embassadors (hauing obtained nothing more than the hope of a league to be in time concluded, and being honourably rewarded) returned with their gallies to Cyprus, and so from thence to Syria, where they had secret conference with Petrus Zenus (the son of Caterinus Zenus, a man famous for his embassage vnto Vsun-Cassanes into Persia) gouernour of the Venetian Merchants at Damasco. Which thing Baiazet hauing intelligence of, and of the passage of the Persian Embassadors that way, complained grieuously both by his Embassadors and letters vnto Campson Gaurus Sultan of Ægypt, That he dealt not as a friend and confederat with him, in suffering these Embassadors so to passe throughout the middest of Syria, vrge the Christians their common enemies, to stirre them vp to war. Whereupon all the Venetian Merchants which were at Tripolis, Aleppo, Damasco, Berytus, and Alexandria, and especially Zenus himselfe, were forthwith apprehended by the commandement of the great Sultan, and carried in bonds to Caire, where they were many times inforced in chaines to answer vnto such things as were layd to their charge, and after they had by the space of a yeare endured the manifold despights of the proud Mamalukes, hardly obtained to escape with life and libertie.

The two seditious Prophets, Chasan and Techellis, well strengthned with the ayd of the Persians, were now come vnto Iconium the most famous citie of Lycaonia; and wasting all the countrey before them, drew a great multitude of people to receiue their new doctrine. For the repressing of which outrages, Orchanes and Mahomethes, two of Baiazet his nephews (who in stead of their fathers Alem Schach and Tzian Schach, the sons of Baiazet before dead, gouerned those countries) gathered togither their forces, and disdaining to suffer such disgrace by such a rabble of rascal people, in the sight of so famous a city, came into the field to giue them battell. But they in their youthfull heat making too much hast, and joyning battell in a place of disaduantage, were by the rebels ouerthrowne and put to flight. Neither would these ringleaders in that victorie haue forborne to haue assailed Iconium, but that they wanted Artillerie and engines of war requisit for the besieging of cities.

Orchanes and Mahometes nephewes vnto Baiazet I. ouerthrowen by Techellis.

Corcutus also, one of the sonnes of Baiazet, hauing at the same time leuied a conuenient Armie about Thiatyra, Sypilus, Magnesia and Phocea, durst not further stir or set forward against the rebels, although they lay dispersed about the countrey fast by him. These new prophets with ensignes displaied, marching from countrey to countrey through the heart of the lesser Asia, entered at length into Bythinia, where neere vnto the riuer Sangarius they met with Caragoses Bassa the Viceroy of Asia, comming against them with a great armie well appointed, which he had a little before raised vpon the bruit of the comming of these rebels; and had also commanded Achometes (whome the Turks call Achmetes) the eldest son of Baiazet then liuing, gouernor of the great countries of Capadocia and Pontus, to raise his power, and to follow at the backe of the rebels: who if they should hap to be put to the worse, would neither be able to retyre, neither to keepe the field, being so shut vp betwixt two so great armies. But Techellis by his speedie comming frustrated these designes of the Viceroy; for marching with all speed, he was vpon Caragoses before he was well aware of his comming, neere vnto the mountaine Hormynus, as he was then taking vp of more soldiers, and daily expected the comming of others, as if he had been going against some puissant enemie. The Viceroy seeing the Rebels approch, although he had before not purposed to haue encountered them before he had raised far greater forces; thought it not now to stand with his honor, to refuse to giue them battell, although his armie for most part consisted of the rude countrey peisants, taken vp vpon the sudden out of Paphlagonia, Galatia, Pontus, and Bythinia, raw souldiers, and for most part vnarmed: as commonly they are which in those countries are pressed against their wils out of the townes and villages, and are of the Turks called Asapi, who of the Ianizaries are scarcely accounted for men. But his greatest confidence he reposed in the approoued valour of his antient horsemen, by whose means he doubted not, in safetie to retyre out of the battel, and to saue himselfe if any thing should fall out otherwise than wel; making no great account of the common souldiers, more than by them if he could, to weaken the force of the rebels: who on the other side (their greatest force consisting of footmen) had no hope to saue themselues by flight, but only by plain valour and dint of sword. Which Techellis wel considering, exhorted his soldiers to remember into what countrey they were come, and that there was no cities of refuge, no new power, no other gods of defence to flie vnto, if they should not that day play the men: Wherefore let vs couragiously (said he) set forward against our enemies, and by victorie defend our liues, together with the truth of our religion, for which we haue vowed both our soules and bodies. He had scarcely sayd thus much, but that his whole Armie, in token of cherefulnes, gaue a most terrible shout, and without further stay set vpon their enemies. The Viceroy had placed his footmen in the maine battell in the middle, and his horsemen in the wings, thereby to haue compassed in his enemies: but Techellis had set all his footmen in one great square battell, and his Persian horsemen for a refuge. But the Viceroy his fresh-water souldiers could scarcely abide the sight of Techellis his armie; for in the front of the battell stood souldiers throughly armed, and all the rest of his armie with red hats vpon their heads, as if they had bin imbrued with bloud, which wonderfully terrified the Bassa's cowardly and vnskilfull souldiers: so that hauing endured the fight scarcely halfe an houre, they all turned their backs and fled. The Turkish horsemen which had valiantly assailed the rebels armie on both sides, although they had slaine many with their arrowes and lances, and somewhat disordred the battell, for that the footmen were inforced to leaue their places, and to presse still on forward against them; yet when Techellis his soldiers (hauing ouercome the footmen, and diuiding themselues into diuers squadrons) began with their long pikes to kill their horses, and to lay hardly vnto them, they likewise betooke themselues to flight also. Then the Persian horsemen (which all this while had stood still as lookers on) left their standings, and following the chase slew many of the Turks in their disordred flight: and following fast on, inclosed the Viceroy as he was staying of his horsmen, and could not for the thicknesse of the dust well discerne his enemies; so that he had bin there taken, if he had not been speedily rescued by his guard, and so deliuered from that danger. The rest of the Turks horsmen saued themselues by flight. In this battel seuen thousand of the Turks footmen were slain, and all their ensignes taken, with great store of prouision.

The battell betweene caragoses & Techellis.

After which victorie, Chasan and Techellis resting their armie one day, marched to the citie of Cutaie, neere vnto the mountain Horminius: this citie is scituated as it were in the midst of Asia the lesse, and is the seat of the Turkish Emperors Viceroy in Asia; as Sophia in Mœsia is for his other Viceroy in Europe: for it was reported, that the country people had for feare of the present war conueyed thither the greatest part of their wealth; and the rebels well knew, that the Viceroy himselfe with his chiefe horsemen were fled thither also: neither doubted they, but that all the army might be greatly inriched by the wealth of that citie, if they should without delay imploy their whole forces for the gaining thereof, their enemies now altogether discouraged with their late ouerthrow. Techellis also deeming that enterprise of so much worth as whereon to gage his whole forces, comming before the city, placed such field pieces as he had before taken in the battel, & his archers in such fit places as might most anoy the defendants: afterward he caused scaling ladders to be set vp, and proclamation made thorow all his camp, That the whole spoile of the citie should be the soldiers if they could take it; with promise of greater rewards to them that should first recouer the top of the wals. Filled with this hope, the rebellious multitude approched the wall, fearing neither enemies force, multitude of shot, or danger of death; striuing who should first mount the ladders, & some climbing one in the necke of another, so to get vp by the ruins of the wal. The defendants in the meane time from aboue casting down vpon them great stones, timber, fire, scalding water, lime, sand, and such like without measure: wherewith although many were ouerthrowne and crusht to death or spoiled, yet others presently stept vp in their place; neither was any of them seen, for feare of the present danger to shrinke back or be discouraged: for the Viceroy on the one side, and Techellis on the other, were both eye-witnesses of euery mans valour in that hot seruice: the one prickt forward with doubtfull hope, for feare to be enforced to giue ouer the assault so begun; and the other with the due regard of his honor, life, and state, all subiect to that danger, Techellis besiegeth Caragoses the Viceroy, in the citie of Cutaie.

A ger, and therefore in person himselfe performed all the parts of a worthie chiefetain and couragious souldier. But at length the defendants wearied with the fierce assault of the enemie, and for most part wounded, Techellis continually sending in fresh men, and withdrawing such as were hurt, by plaine force brake into the citie in two places ouer the heapes of the dead bodies: and hauing repulsed the defendants, burst open one of the gates, and thereby brought in his whole armie. Then began a miserable slaughter of the soldiers and poore citisens in euery house and corner of the citie. At which instant the Palace (whither the Viceroy had retyred himselfe with his familie) was also taken: the Viceroy himselfe with his wiues and children were there also taken prisoners, and the stately Palace built with marble, in a trice consumed with fire.

Caragoses the viceroy, with his wiues and children taken by Techellis in the citie of Cutaie.

B The rich citie of Cutaie, the seat of the great commander of the Turkish Empire in Asia, thus taken by Techellis, and his whole army both beautified and inriched with the spoile thereof; he persuaded himselfe, that it was now no hard matter for him to take the citie of Prusa also, the antient seat of the Turkish Kings in Bythinia, and so to endanger the whole state of the Turks Empire in Asia, if he should now without delay carrie the terrour of himselfe thither, before the Turks could in that countrey make head against him, or the citisens be able in so sudden a feare to make any sufficient prouision for the defence of themselues and their citie; and so in the course of his good fortune to vse the courage and cherefulnesse of his souldiers. Wherefore appointing a day when he would set forward, he commanded all things necessary to be made readie for the taking of that rich citie, being neither strongly walled, neither furnished with any good garrison for the defence thereof.

C But whilest he was making this preparation, a new armie, lately shipt ouer the Hellespont from Callipolis into Asia, inforced him to change his former determination. For Baiazet awaked at the name of Techellis, & the fame af the new superstition now generally receiued in Persia, had long before giuen commandement to his sonnes, nephewes, and the Viceroy of Asia, That they should with all carefulnes prouide, that that part of his kingdome took no harme thereby. But after he saw Techellis of a poore hermit become a great captaine, and [illegible]kt also with the Persian King, and al his dominions in Asia in danger of some great alteration; he sent Alis Bassa with his Europeian armie. This Alis an Eunuch, borne in Macedonia (yet for his courage comparable with the greatest captaines) had for his many and worthie deserts, in the Baiazet sendeth Alis Bassa out of Europe, against Techellis.

D time of the great Emperour Mahomet, Baiazet his father, got vnto himselfe both the honour and name of a most famous Chieftaine. He hauing made choice of the principall horsemen of Epirus, Macedonia, Seruia, Illyria, and Thracia, and joyning vnto them seuen thousand Ianizaries (the most assured hope of the Turks in all their expeditions) passed ouer from Callipolis into Phrygia, and vpon the way directed his letters vnto Achomates and Corcutus, Baiazet his sonnes, and to all the other Sanzacks and Gouernors of the Turks prouinces in Asia, That they should with as much speed as they could, raise their forces and meet him in Galatia. But Techellis aduertised of his comming, thought it best for him to depart out of Pontus, and to retire to some place of more safetie, lest by longer staying he should be inclosed by his enemies, re-

E pairing thitherwards on euery side; or else vpon some great disaduantage to joyne battell: for he saw, that if he stayed neuer so little, he should finde no safe passage or place of refuge to retyre vnto, hauing left such large and spacious Countries, so many enemies Cities, so many great riuers, so many discontented people behind him; all which the first fauor of the vulgar sort, and speedie course of his victorie, had a little before layd open vnto him. Wherefore calling together his Captaines and most expert men of war to consult vpon the matter, it was generally thought to be a point of meere madnesse, or else of extreame necessitie, with so small a power of vnskilfull souldiers, without any sufficient strength of horsemen, to joyne battell with such an enemie as better knew the countrey than he, and far exceeded him both for number and expertnesse of his souldiers. Wherefore Techellis trussing vp his rich prey he

F had before gotten, began now with speed to retyre backe againe with his followers through Galatia. But the Bassa hauing intelligence almost euery houre by letters and espials, both of the retyring of Techellis, and the way he held, passed ouer the riuer Sangarius, and coasting the countrey, came and incamped betwixt the cities of Cutaie and Ancyra, which way it was supposed the enemie would passe. Where when he had there a while rested his wearied souldiers, and was certainly aduertised that the rebels had taken another way, he set forward againe, and after fiue dayes march in the plaines of Galatia, ouertooke the straglers of the enemies, G who wearied or wounded, were not able to hold way with the armie: all whome the Bassa commanded to be cruelly put to the sword. And Techellis to terrifie the great Bassa, or at least-wise with a most horrible spectacle to stay his pursuit, caused Caragoses the viceroy, whom he had carried along with him in chains, to be cruelly impaled by the highway side, vpon a sharp stake set fast in the ground, and so left him sticking for the Turks to wonder at. But Alis Bassa nothing dismaied with the horrible death of so great a personage, held on his way with more hast than good speed, exhorting his soldiers patiently to endure the painfulnesse of the long march, and to straine themselues to take reuenge of those rebellious theeues and robbers, who destroying the countrey before them, spared not so much as the Turks children, and the temples of their religion; and so the day following came into the plaines of Ancyra. The same H day also Achomates came vnto the Bassa with ten thousand souldiers. Alis Bassa perceiuing that he could not possibly with his whole armie ouertake his enemies, marching with greater speed before him, and grieued at the heart to see them escape out of his hand, resolued to proue if he could with his horsemen ouertake them: whereupon leauing his footmen with Achomates, he himselfe with eight thousand horse following the enemie vpon the spur, ouertooke the rereward of their armie at the mountain Olyga, a little from the citie of Ancyra, vnto whom he gaue an hot skirmish.

The battell betwixt Alis Bassa and Techellis.

Techellis which a little before had taken a fit place for his campe, vpon the rising of the hil, although he saw his men faint with long trauell and the scortching heat of the Sun, yet quickly perceiuing that he should haue to do only with horsemen, and that in a place of aduantage; I turning his army, and orderly placing his soldiers, as the ground and the shortnesse of the time would giue leaue, valiantly receiued the impression of the Turks, and with their long pikes and arrowes at the first repulsed them: so that it seemed they would neither haue giuen ground vnto the bragging horsemen, neither haue done any thing not beseeming their former victories, had not Alis Bassa sent 1000 Carbines, who in troupes orderly following one another, deliue-red their shot as thicke as haile vpon the enemy: with which storme many of them being slain, and moe wounded, their ranks began to be somewhat disordred: whereupon the other horsemen breaking in, with great slaughter ouerthrew the vauntgard of Techellis battell; in which conflict Chasan Chelise himselfe was slain. Techellis always at hand where most need was, euen in the midst of the slaughter of his men set in order a new battell of his most readie and best K armed soldiers, the only remedie in so great a distresse; and bringing them on into the front of the battell, opposed them against the horsemen, now (as they thought) in possession of the vi-ctorie; commanding them by little and little to retyre vnto the mountaine, to the intent that they might seeme to do that by commandment of the Generall, which they were like enough to haue done of themselues for feare: hoping that it would so come to passe, That the Turkes finding the disaduantage of the place, would leaue so hardly to assaile them. But the Bassa encouraged with the first successe of the battell, exhorted his soldiers to vrge the victorie, now almost as good as gotten, & not to giue the enemie space to recouer the strength of the mountain, but valiantly to charge them, and with a little short pains that day to end all that warre, to the honor of Baiazet their soueraigne, and worthie commendation of themselues in generall.

In this sort encouraging them, he with a troupe of his best horsmen (to animate the rest, and to L shew his own valour) brake through the enemies battel: which thing he in the same heat, with more courage than discretion, attempting to perform the second time, was inclosed by his enemies and slaine: vpon whose fall the fortune of the battell was in a moment changed; for the Turks, which erst fought couragiously, hauing beaten backe and almost ouerthrown their enemies, now dismaied with their Generals death, began to fight but faintly, & by little and little to giue ground, and at last turning their horses about, fled. On the other side Techellis his soldiers, who but a little before had reposed greater hope in the strength of the place and the mountain, than in their weapons and valour, now incouraged with new hope, and taking heart in the faint charge of their enemies, began to thrust forward, and with a most terrible noyse M crying victorie, put to flight the Turks horsemen, before wearied with long trauell, when as they had by the Generals rashnesse lost a notable victorie almost alreadie gained. Techellis although he knew that the enemie could neither refresh his horses, nor yet with any assurance keepe the field, if he should haue pursued him; yet hauing lost many of his best soldiers, & the rest

A rest of his armie sore weakened with trauell, fasting, and fighting, determined to refresh his wearied followers vpon the mountain Olyga. From whence after a few daies he marched ouer the riuer Halys vnto the citie of Tascia, his old dwelling place, and so to the citie of Celenis, which the riuer Marsya (much spoken of by the Poets) runneth thorow, and is now called by the name of Maras, but as then the regall seat of the mountaine king Aladeules. The Turkes horsemen hauing thus in some small sort rather reuenged the iniuries done by the rebels, than obtained any victorie, returned to Achomates, who was then comming on with the footmen.
Not long after, Baiazet vnderstanding of the death of Alis Bassa his Generall, sent Ionuses Bas- sa, a warlike captaine, and of great experience (borne in Epirus) in his stead. Who as soone as he had receiued the charge of the armie from Achomates, marching forthwith into Cappadocia, and keeping the way on the right hand towards the mountaine Antitaurus, came in few daies vnto the citie of Tascia, the place of Techellis his abode: where burning and destroying the countrey all about, he came and encamped with his armie at the foot of the mountaine.
The Bassa had in his armie about fortie thousand horse and foot, well appointed, with many field pieces, and plentie of victuals which he brought with him, for feare of want in that bare countrey. Techellis terrified with his comming, hauing of late receiued no aid from Hysmael the Persian king, and wanting also great artillerie, and besides that seeing his soldiers greatly both diminished and discouraged with the late battell at Olyga; determined not vpon so great disaduantage to meet his enemie in the plain field, but to keepe the rough mountains and thicke woods, hoping that if he could be able any time to keepe those strong places, he should either C receiue some aid from Hysmael, or by the heat of the Turks leaders take them at some notable aduantage. In the meane time many notable skirmishes passed betwixt the souldiers on both sides: for the Turks fetching a compasse oftentimes about the mountains, and seeking for the best passages, by the easie rising of the hils, came to skirmish with their enemies: and Techel- lis his souldiers on the other side, sallying many times out of the woods and abrupt places of the mountains, valiantly assailed the Turks. After they had a long time in this sort, as if it had bin in disport, rather proued their forces one vpon another, than done any great matter; the Turkes prying into euery corner, at length perceiued two waies whereby their whole armie with ensignes displayed might without any great difficultie bee brought vnto the top of the mountaine, and so into their enemies strength. The Bassa hauing well viewed and considered D the places, caused the Ianizaries at one instant to march vp to the mountaine by one of the aforesaid waies, and the rest of his armie by the other: who with soft pace climing vp the steepe mountaines, with their targuets defended themselues as well as they could against their enemies darts and shot. For Techellis his souldiers hauing before taken the high mountaines and places of aduantage, cast downe vpon the Turks great stones and shot without number, as if it had beene out of some strong forts. But the Turks bending certaine small field peeces against the places which most anoied them, easily draue them from their standings; the harque-busiers still following their ensignes, shrouded close vnder the targueters, and deliuered their deadly shot as showers of raine vpon their enemies. Whose desperat approch Techellis perceiu-ing, caused a retreat to be sounded, and with all his armie retired farther off into the higher E mountaines and rougher woods. The night following, perceiuing that by the euill successe of the former skirmish he had lost a great part of his credit and strength, he with great silence forsooke the woods, and passing quite ouer the mountains fled into Armenia, then part of the Persian kingdome. Neither did the Turks perceiue their departure vntill it was light day, and that their scouts entring the thick woods, and finding the enemies baggage, with some wounded souldiers not able to flie, brought newes vnto the Bassa of the enemies departure, and of his speedie flight into Armenia. Which thing, when he by them that were taken, vnderstood to be certainely true, fretting and chafing like a mad man, that he had not presently vpon the enemies retreat beset the wood round, he sent his horsemen forthwith to pursue them: but all in vaine, for Techellis was by direct and knowne waies gone into Armenia. Some few strag-lers not able to make so much hast as the rest, were ouertaken by the Turkes horsemen, and F brought backe to the Bassa.

Ionuses Bassa sent by Baiazet, Generall of his armie against Techellis.

Techellis thus put to flight, Ionuses caused strait inquisition to be made through all the cities of the lesser Asia, for all such as had professed the Persian religion: and them whom he found to haue borne armes in the late rebellion, he caused to be put to death with most exquisit torments, ments, and the reſt to be burnt in their foreheads with an hoat yron, thereby for euer to bee G knowne; whom together with the kinsfolkes and friends of them that were executed, or fled with Techellis, he caused to be transported into Europe, and to be diſperſed through Macedonia, Epirus, and Peloponeſus: for feare leſt if Techellis now fled into the Perſian Kingdome, ſhould from thence returne with new forces, they ſhould alſo againe repaire vnto him, and raiſe a new rebellion. This was the beginning, courſe, and ending, of one of the moſt dangerous rebellions that euer troubled the Turkiſh empire: wherin all, or at leaſtwiſe the greateſt part of their dominions in Aſia, might haue beene eaſily ſurpriſed by the Perſian King, if hee would thorowly haue proſecuted the occaſion and oportunitie then offered.

The remainder of Techellis his followers, flying into Perſia, by the way lighting vpon a Carauan of merchants laden with ſilkes and other rich merchandiſe, tooke the ſpoile thereof: H for which outrage comming to Tauris, the captaines were all by the commandement of Hyſmael executed, and Techellis himſelfe to the terrour of others burnt aliue.

Techellis burnt at Tauris.

The next yeare (which was the yeare 1509, the fourteenth day of September) chanced a

The terrour whereof was ſo great, that the people generally forſooke their houſes and lay abroad in the fields: yea Baiazet himſelfe, then very aged and ſore troubled with the gout, for feare thereof remoued from Conſtantinople to Hadrianople; but finding himſelfe in no more ſafetie than before, he left the citie and lay abroad in the fields in his I tent. This earthquake indured by the ſpace of eighteene daies, or (as the Turkes Hiſtories report) of a moneth, with very little intermiſſion; which was then accounted ominous, as portending the miſerable calamities which ſhortly after happened in the Othoman family. After this earthquake enſued a great plague, wherewith the citie was grieuouſly viſited, and for the moſt part vnpeopled. But after that the earthquake was ceaſed, and the mortalitie aſſuaged, Baiazet cauſed the imperial citie to be with all ſpeed repaired, and to that purpoſe gaue out commiſſions into all parts of his dominions for the taking vp of workemen: ſo that there were once in worke eightie thouſand workmen, who in moſt beautifull manner in the ſpace of foure moneths againe repaired the ruines of that great citie.

Baiazet had by his many wiues, eight ſonnes and ſix daughters, which liued to be men and K women growne: and the ſons all Gouernors in diuers prouinces of his large empire: whom the Turkiſh Hiſtories reckon vp in this order, Abdullah Zelebi, Alem Scach, Tzihan Scach, Achmet, Machmut, Corcut, Selim, and Muhamet. Yet Antonius Vrſius a Genoway, who long time liued in Baiazet his court, and (as he of himſelfe writeth) waited in his chamber at the time of his death, reckoning vp the ſonnes of Baiazet, maketh mention but of theſe ſix, Sciemſcia, Alemſcia, Achomates, Mahometes, Selymus, and Corcutus: naming the forenamed by names ſomething differing from the other. Sciemſcia the eldeſt, Gouernor of Caramania, for his towardlineſſe moſt deerely beloued of his father, died of a naturall death before him, and was of him and his ſubiects greatly lamented. Alemſcia died in like manner, of whoſe death as ſoone as he was aduertiſed, by mourning letters written in blake paper with white characters (as their manner of writing is, in certifying of heauie news) he caſt from him his Scepter with all other tokens of honor, and cauſed general mourning to be made for him in the court, & through all the citie of Conſtantinople, by the ſpace of three daies; during which time all ſhops were ſhut vp, all trading forbidden, and no ſigne of mirth to be ſeene: and for a certaine ſpace, after the manner of their ſuperſtition, cauſed ſolemne ſacrifices to be made for the health of his ſoule, and 7000 aſpers to bee giuen weekely vnto the poore. His dead bodie was afterward with all princely pompe conueyed to Pruſa, and there with great ſolemnitie buried. Tzihan Gouernour of Caria, and Mahomet Gouernor of Capha, vpon their fathers heauie diſpleaſure, were by his commandement both ſtrangled,

Of his other foure ſons, Achmet, otherwiſe called Achomates, Machmut, or Mahometes, Cor- M cut, or Corcutus, and Selymus: the ſecond (namely Mahometes) was of greateſt hope and expectation, not giuen to ſenſualitie or voluptuous pleaſure, as Achomates his eldeſt brother, neither altogether booki ſh as was Corcutus, nor yet of ſo fierce and cruell a diſpoſition as Selymus: but of ſuch a liuely ſpirit, ſharp wit, bountifull diſpoſition, and princely carriage of himſelfe,

A ſelfe, that in the iudgement of moſt men, he ſeemed already worthie of a kingdome. Which immoderat fauor of the people, cauſed his elder brother Achomates, yea and Baiazet alſo himſelfe, to haue him in no ſmall iealouſie, as if he had affected the empire; and was in ſhort time the cauſe of his vntimely death: which thing he nothing doubting, haſtned (as fatal things are) by ſuch meanes as he leaſt feared might haue procured any ſuch mortall diſtruſt or danger.

Moſt of Baiazet his children were by diuers women, yet Achomates and this Mahometes were by one and the ſame mother: for which cauſe, Mahometes tooke greater pleaſure in him than in any his other brethren, although it were anſwered with like loue againe. Achomates was Lord and Gouernor of Amaſia; and this Mahometes, of Magneſia; who deſirous to ſee the manner of his brothers life and gouernment, diſguiſed himſelfe with two of his familiar and faithfull friends, as if they had bin religious men, of that Order which the Turks call Imalier.
B [Theſe men are for moſt part comely perſonages, born of good houſes, who in cleanly attire made after an homely faſhion, do at their pleaſure wander vp and down from towne to town, and countrey to country, noting the diſpoſition and manners of the people; wherof as fitteth beſt their purpoſe, they make large diſcourſes afterwards to others: they commonly carrie out with them ſiluer cymbals, wheron they play moſt cunningly, and thereunto ſing pleaſant and wanton ditties: for which idle delight, they receiue mony of the people, as an alms giuen them of deuotion. Theſe are the common corrupters of youth, and defilers of other mens beds; men altogether giuen to eaſe and pleaſure, and are of the Turks called, The religious brethren of Loue: but might of right, better be tearmed, Epicurus his hogs, than profeſſors of C any religion at all.] Mahometes and his two conſorts, as men of this profeſſion, trauelled vp and downe the countries of Pontus and Capadocia (where Achomates commanded) and ſo to the citie of Amaſia; receiuing for their merrie glee by the way as they went, the almes and deuotion of the fooliſh countrey people. And being at the length come to Amaſia vpon a ſolemne holiday, they awaited the comming of Achomates to the church: who paſſing by, ſtaid a while liſtening attentiuely vnto their pleaſant and alluring harmonie; which was for that purpoſe moſt curiouſly and skilfully before deuiſed, and by them both with their inſtruments and voices performed. When they had ended their muſicke, and according to the manner of their idle profeſſion expected his deuotion; Achomates being a man of a ſpare hand, commanded fiue aſpers to be giuen them in reward [which is about ſix pence of our mony.] Mahome-
D tes diſdaining his brothers baſe reward, as a ſigne of his miſerable diſpoſition, would in no wiſe diſcouer himſelfe, as he had before determined; but taking horſe, returned with ſpeed to Magneſia: from whence he wrot taunting letters vnto his brother Achomates, ſcoffing at his good husbandrie (no praiſe to a prince) and in contempt ſent him backe againe his fiue aſpers; which thing Achomates tooke in ſo euil part, as that he was neuer afterwards freinds with him. The report of this fact was in ſhort time diſperſed throughout all parts of the Turkiſh empire, diuers men diuerſly deeming of his purpoſe therein.

Not long after Mahometes had in this ſort plaid with his brother Achomates, he attired him- Mahometes diſguiſed as a ſeafaring man, commeth to Conſtantinople, and ſo to the court.
ſelfe with certaine of his truſtie followers as if they had been ſeafaring men, and with a ſmall barke came to Conſtantinople, and there landing as aduenturers from ſea, tooke diligent view
E both of the imperiall citie, and of the citie of Pera ſtanding oppoſit againſt it, curiouſly noting how all things were by his fathers appointment ordered and gouerned. It hapned whileſt he was thus ſtaying at Conſtantinople, that Baiazet had appointed a ſolemne aſſembly of all his chiefe Baſſaes at the court; which Mahometes was deſirous to haue the ſight of, as alſo of the faſhion of his fathers court: but as he with his companions preſſed to haue entred in at the court gate, they were by their baſe apparel taken of the porters to haue bin rude mariners, and ſo by them kept out. Wherefore conſulting what to do in that caſe, he went and preſently bought a moſt beautiful Chriſtian captiue boy, and the next day comming again to the court with two of his companions (as if they had been aduenturers at ſea) requeſted to be let in, for that they had brought a preſent for the Emperour. So finding meanes to be admitted to the preſence of F Baiazet, one of his conſorts (as if he had bin a ſea captain) boldly ſtept forth, & with due reuerence offered the preſent vnto the Emperor; which he thankfully tooke, and in token thereof gaue him his hand to kiſſe, and commanded a rich garment wrought with gold to be giuen vnto him, with two others of leſſe value vnto Mahometes and his fellow, ſuppoſed to be the ſaid captaines followers: who all th[illegible]ile ſtood a farre off, as if it had been for reuerence of the

Emperour, but indeed for feare to be discouered. As these counterfeit guests were returning G from the court in their garments of fauour, they hapned to meet with three courtiers which knew Mahometes; who dismounting from their horses, had done him honour and due reue-rence, as to the sonne of the great Emperor, had he not by secret signes forbidden them, as one vnwilling to be knowne. When he had thus seene his father, the court, and the imperial city, he went againe aboord, and so with speed returned to Magnesia.

The report of this his doing, had in short time filled both the citie and the court, and was at last brought to Baiazets eares: which raised in his suspitious head many a troublesom thought, greatly fearing, that in these slie practises lay hidden some secret and desperate conspiracie, dangerous to himselfe and his other children. Wherefore after long discourse had with the three great Bassaes then of his secret counsell, concerning the matter, to rid himselfe of all H feare, hee resolued in any case to take him away. And therefore caused them in his name to write vnto Asmehemedi, a gallant courtier, and alwaies neere vnto Mahometes, to poyson him with a secret poison, for that purpose inclosed in those letters sent vnto him: with promise of great rewards and preferments for that his seruice, to be afterwards receiued from the Emperor: charging him withall, that if he could not effect the matter, he should so conceale it, as that Mahometes should haue no distrust thereof, the least suspition whereof, would tend to his vtter destruction. This Asmehemedi for somvnkindnes bare a secret grudge against Mahometes, which Baiazet knowing of, made choise of him the rather: and he on the other side, partly to perform the old tyrants command, and partly to reuenge his owne priuat wrong, vigilantly awaited all Mahometes poi-soned by Asme-hemedi. oportunities to bring to effect that he had in charge. At length it fortuned, that Mahometes ha- I uing disported himselfe in his gardens of pleasure, and being thirstie after his exercise, called for drinke: Asmehemedi alwaies at hand, in a gilt boule fetcht him such drinke as he desired, whereinto he had secretly conueied the deadly poison sent from Baiazet. Mahometes hauing drunke thereof, in short time began to feele himselfe euill at ease, and presently sent for his physitians: who thinking that he had but something distempered himselfe with drinking too much cold drink in his heat, perceiued not that he was poisoned, vntil that within six daies after, he died. Of whose death Baiazet aduertised, could not abstain from mourning, although he himselfe had bin the onely author thereof: and the more to manifest his heauinesse, commanded all the court to mourne with him, and praiers to be made in their temples after their superstitious maner, and almes to be giuen to the poore for the health of his soule. His dead bo- K medi the traitour in reward of his vnfaithfulnesse towards his master, was by the commandement of Baiazet cast into prison, and neuer afterwards seene, being there (as it was thought) secretly made away.

Now had Baiazet but three sonnes left, Achomates, Selymus, and Corcutus. Achomates Gouer-nour of Amasia, was a man both politick and valiant: but much giuen to pleasure and delight: him Baiazet and most part of the great men of the court fauoured aboue the rest of his brethren; except such as were before corrupted by Selymus. Corcutus for his milde and quiet nature, was of most men beloued, but not thought so fit for the gouernment of so great an empire; especially by the Ianizaries and souldiers of the court, for that he was (as they thought) alto- L gether drowned in the studie of Phylosophie, a thing nothing agreeing with their humor. Yet might Baiazet seeme to do him wrong, if he should not according to his promise again restore him vnto the possession of the empire, which he had almost thirtie yeares before receiued ■ his hands; as is before in the beginning of his life declared. But Selymus being of a more hautie disposition than to brook the life of a subiect vnder the command of either of his brethren, and altogether giuen to martiall affaires, sought by infinit bountie, feigned courtesie, subtil po-licie, and by all other means good and bad, to aspire vnto the empire. Him therefore the Ianizaries with all the great souldiers of the court, yea and some of the chiefe Bassaes also (corrupted with gifts) wished aboue the rest, for their lord and soueraigne: desiring rather to liue M vnder him which was like to set all the world on a hurly burly (whereby they might increase their honor and wealth, the certain rewards of their aduentures than to lead an idle and vnprofitable life (as they tearmed it) vnder a quiet and peaceable Prince.

Whilest men stood thus diuersly affected towards these princes of so great hope, Baiazet now far worne with yeares, and so grieuously tormented with the gout that hee was not able to

A to helpe himselfe: for the quietnesse of his subiects and preuenting of such troubles as might arise by the aspiring of his children after his death, determined whilest he yet liued (for the auoiding of these and other such like mischiefes) to establish the succession in some one of his sonnes; who wholly possessed of the kingdome, might easily represse the pride of the other.
And although he had set downe with himselfe, that Achomates should be the man, as wel in respect of his birth-right, as of the especiall affection he bare vnto him; yet to discouer the disposition of his subiects, and how they stood affected, it was giuen out in generall termes, That he meant before his death to make it knowne to the World, who should succeed in the empire, without naming any one of his sonnes; leauing that for euery man to diuine of, accor-B ding as they were affected: which was not the least cause, that euery one of his sonnes with like ambition began now to make small account of their former preferments, as thinking one-ly vpon the Empire it selfe.

First of all Selymus, whom Baiazet had made Gouernor of the kingdom of Trapezond, rig- 1511.

the blacke sea) to the citie of Capha, called in antient time Theodosia, and from thence by land came to Mahometes king of the Tartars called Præcoponses, a mightie prince, whose daughter he had without the good liking of his father before married: and discouering vnto him his intended purpose, besought him by the sacred bonds of the affinitie betwixt them, not to shrinke from him his louing son in law in so fit an opportunitie for his aduancement: And withall shewed vnto him, what great hope of obtaining the Empire was proposed vnto him C by his most faithfull friends and the souldiers of the court, if he would but come neerer vnto his father (then about to transfer the empire to some one of his sons) & either by faire means to procure his fauor, or by entering with his armie into Thracia, to terrifie him from appointing either of his other brethren for the successor. The Tartar king commending his high de-uise, as a kind father in law with wonderfull celerity caused great store of shipping to be made readie in the Pontick sea, and Mœotis, but especially at the Ports of Copa and Tana, vpon the great riuer of Tanais, which boundeth Europe from Asia; and arming fifteene thousand Tartarian horsemen, deliuered them all to Selymus, promising forthwith to send him greater aid if he should haue occasion to vse the same. These things being quickly dispatched, Selymus passing ouer the riuer Borrysthenes, and so through Valachia, came at length to Danubius, and D with his horsemen passed that famous riuer at the citie of Chelia: his fleet he commanded to meet him at the port of the citie of Varna, called in antient time Dionysiopolis, in the confines of Bulgaria and Thracia: he himselfe still leuying moe men by the way as he went, pretending in shew quite another thing than he had indeed intended: which the better to couer, he gaue it out as if he had purposed to haue inuaded Hungarie.

But Baiazet a good while before aduertised, that Selimus was departed from Trapezond, and come ouer into Europe, maruelling that he had left his charge in Asia (the rebellion of Techellis and the Persian war yet scarce quieted) and that vpon his own head he had entertained forreine aid to make war against the most warlike nation of the Hungarians; and farther, that with his armie by land, he had seized vpon the places neerest vnto Thracia, and with a E strong nauie kept the Euxine sea; he began to suspect, as the truth was, That all this preparation was made and entended against himselfe: for the craftie old fire had good proofe of the vnquiet and troublesome nature of his son, especially in that without his knowledge he durst presume to take a wife from amongst the Tartars, and afterwards with no lesse presumption of himselfe raise an armie both by sea and land: whereby he easily perceiued, that he would neuer hold himselfe contented with a small kingdome, so long as he was in hope by desperat aduenture to gain a greater. Yet thinking it better with like dissimulation to appease his vio- Baiazet sendeth h embassadors to Selymus.
lent & fierce nature, than by sharpe reproofe to moue him to farther choller, he sent vnto him embassadors to declare to him with what danger the Turkish kings had in former times taken vpon them those Hungarian wars: for example wherof he needed not to goe no further than F to his grandfather Mahomet the Great, who many times to his exceeding losse had made proofe of the Hungarian forces: wherefore he should do wel to expect some fit opportunitie, when as he might with better aduise, greater power, & more sure hope of victorie, take those wars in hand. Wherunto Selymus answered, That he had left Asia, inforced thereunto by the iniuries of his brother Achomates, and was therefore come ouer into Europe, by dint of sword and

and the helpe of his friends, to win from the enemies of the Mahometan religion a larger and better prouince for that little barren and peaceable one which his father had giuen him, bordering vpon Hiberia and Cholchos, bare and needie people, liuing as connies amongst the rocks and mountaines. As for the Hungarians, whom they thought to be a peo ple inuincible, and therfore not to be dealt withall, he was not of that base mind to be daunted with any danger, were it neuer so great: and yet that in his opinion the war was neither so difficult or dangerous, as was by them pretended; forasmuch as the antient prowesse of that warlike nation was now much changed, together with the change of their kings; and their discipline of war not onely much decayed, but almost quite lost, after that Vladislaus, farre vnlike in policie and prowesse, had succeeded the renowned Mathias in that kingdome. Neither had he (as he said) from his cradle learned to be afraid of death, or of the common chances of war, as knowing that neither God nor man would be wanting to him, who with an honourable resolution did aduenture vpon vertuous and worthie attempts: and that therefore hee was fully resolued for his owne honor (which his father had in some sort blemished by the immoderat aduancement of his brethren) either to die honourably in the field in battell against the enemies of the Mahometan religion, or else gloriously to extend the bounds of the Turkish empire: and that he would not (though one of the yongest in the Othoman familie) be accounted inferiour to any of his brethren in vertue and prowesse. Thus was the Hungarian war neuer by Selymus entended, notably by him pretended; and with no lesse dissimulation by Baiazet dissuaded. The Embassadours, although Selymus in all his speeches shewed no token of peace: yet in his fathers name presented vnto him diuers gifts, thereby if it might be to appeale his fierce and cruell mind. Vnto his old gouernment they adioyned Samandria, which the Hungarians call Schenderouia, a strong citie of Seruia vpon the borders of Hungarie, with many other strong towns in the same countrey: they gaue him also threescore thousand duckats, beside a thousand garments of cloth and silke: with good store of prouision wherewith to relieue and content the souldiers by him entertained; least that they drawne farre from home in hope of spoile, should take it in euil part if they should be sent away emptie handed. Selymus in a happie time hauing receiued these gifts, returned the embassadours vnto his father, with more doubtfull answer and vncertaine hope than before: yet changing nothing in himselfe of his former resolution, secret messengers and letters from his friends in the court stil whetting him forward (too much alreadie inflamed with desire of soueraignetie) persuading him to make hast and to repose his greatest hope in his quicke speed; for that they vnderstood, that about the time of his setting forward, his brother Achomates was comming with a great power, being sent for out of Capadocia by his father.

Presents giuen to Selymus by his fathers embassadours.

Baiazet would appoint his successour whilest he yet liued.

In the mean time Baiazet, moued the rather with the feare of Selymus, resolued vpon that, whereof hee had long before in his mind deeply considered, and now said openly, That hee would appoint his successor, who in stead of himselfe, spent with yeares and sickenesse, should bring with him the flower of youth and strength of bodie, fit to gouerne so great an empire. But when those things were propounded vnto the souldiers of the court by the foure great Bassaes (who in all things both of peace and wars had next place vnto the Emperor himselfe) it was forthwith gainesaied by those martiall men, crying aloud with one voyce, That they would know no other Emperor but Baiazet, vnder whose conduct and good fortune they had now serued aboue 30 yeres: and therfore would not suffer him to liue a priuat life in obscuritie, who with so many victories and strong cities taken, had brought the Othoman empire vnto that height of renowne and glory. They said moreouer, that there was in him yet strength enough, if he would but with the reuerend honor of his age retain the maiestie of his place, & the glorie he had gotten with his long and happie raigne, and most famous victories: and that of his children, such a one should vndoubtedly in his due time succeede in the empire, as of right ought: only they wisht, that the old Emperor might in the meantime liue in health with a long and happie raign: neither needed he (as they said) to feare that after his death any controuersie should arise among his sons about the succession; for that the Othoman progenie vsed to attain the imperiall seat, according to the old custome of their ancestors the Othoman kings, by right and order only, and not by corruption or faction. But if he would needs vpon his own priuat good liking, or as it were by new adoption, proceed to make choice of such a one as the people & the men of war (his most loiall & faithfull subiects) could not so wel like of, it would be

be an occasion of much more trouble, and happely the means to bring in that confusion of the State, which he thought thereby to eschew. For then, beside the dislike of the people, the other brethren would neuer endure so notable an iniurie, or euer be at quiet, vntil they had (as men wrongfully cast off and disinherited) by strong hand and endangering of all, recouered their honour lost by the headstrong will of their aged father.

The souldiers thus before instructed by the friends and fauourites of Selymus, (who with mony and large promises had corrupted their captains and chiefe officers) spake these things frankly, to haue deterred the old Emperor from his purpose. But he thinking that they had (as he himselfe did) especially affected Achomates his eldest son, (for that they had generally protested, That they would against all iniuries defend his honour, vnto whom the empire should of right appertaine) said he would make choice of Achomates, if it should stand with their good liking. But the chiefe of the soldiers (who corrupted by Selymus, had together sould both their faith and themselues) cunningly commended Achomates, and seemed wonderfully to like of him; yet to accept of him for their Soueraigne, Baiazet yet liuing, they said was not agreeing with the antient custome of the Othoman kings, neither for the behoofe of the men of war, neither yet good for the state of the Empire; forasmuch as neither his brethren Corcutus and Selymus, neither the soldiers of the Court, could patiently endure the least touch of the suspicion of infidelitie; which they must needs do, if he as a suspicious father should doubt either of the loue or loyaltie of his most dutifull sonnes, or of the faith or constancie of his most faithfull seruants, whereof he had made so many trials. Besides that, it seemed vnto them all vnreasonable, that by the odious preiudice of that fact, the souldiers should be left defrauded of the rewards vsually granted vnto them during the time of the vacancie of the Empire, arising of the spoile taken from them which are of religion different from the Turks. For it is a custome, that immediatly vpon the death of the Turkish Emperor, all the Iewes and Christians which dwell at Constantinople, Pera, Hadrianople, Thessalonica, and Prusa, especially merchants, exposed vnto the iniuries of the Turks, are by the Ianizaries and other souldiers of the court, spoiled of all their wares and goods, and become vnto them a prey: neither wil they giue their oath of allegeance vnto the new Emperor, vntill he haue granted vnto them all that prey, as a bountie, and haue solemnly sworne by his own head (the greatest assurance that can by oath be giuen amongst the Turks) freely to pardon all the offenders, and for euer to forget all the outrages before committed. When Baiazet saw his men of war thus generally to oppose themselues against the translation of the empire to Achomates, he of purpose to corrupt the minds of them which were before alreadie corrupted, promised to giue them fiue hundred thousand duckats if they would stand fauourable to Achomates, and accept him for their Soueraigne: which masse of money his customers and receiuers vndertooke to leuie of the same merchants strangers and Iews, and to pay it as Baiazet had promised. Yet the ouerthwart frowardnesse of these men of war ouercame the good fortune of Achomates, although the reward promised were great: for why, they had in their martial minds conceiued far greater rewards and preferments, if in stead of a peaceable and quiet Prince, a monstrous tyrant of restlesse nature (as was Selymus) might by their help and means aspire to the Empire. Thus Baiazet driuen from his hope, thought it best for the present to dissemble the matter; and concealing his griefe, with patience to put vp that dishonour, vntil a fitter opportunitie were offered for the effecting of that he so much desired.

Baiazet seeketh to prefer Achomates vnto the Empire.

Selymus aduertised from his friends, with what affection and fastnesse the souldiers of the court had in the secret fauour of him openly withstood the earnest desire of Baiazet, for the preferment of Achomates; because he would no longer frustrat the expectation of his fauourits by lingring and delay, or seem to distrust the readie good wils of the men of war towards him, left the borders of Hungarie, & with his armie marching through Thracia, incamped at length vpon the rising of a hill not farre from Hadrianople, from whence the neighing of his horses might easily be heard, and his tents from the high places of the city discouered. From thence he sent a messenger to his father then lying in the citie, to certifie him, That for as much as he had not of many yeares before seene him, he was now therefore desirous to come vnto his presence to visit him, before he crossed the seas backe againe by his appointment to Trapezond: and the rather, because it might chance that he should neuer see him againe, being now become both aged and diseased: besides that, it much concerned (as he would haue had him to beleeue)the quietnes of his kingdom in Asia,and the vnitie of his children, if the controuersies betwixt him & his brother Achomates, which could not safely be committed to messengers, might by themselues be discouered him to their father, as an indifferent hearer and decider thereof. Wherefore he humbly besought him to appoint him a time and place to giue him audience in,and not to denie him leaue to come and kisse his hands; which thing his ancestours neuer refused to grant to their poore friends, much lesse to their children. Baiazet who a few days before vnderstanding of the comming of Selymus,& throughly seeing into his deuices,had called vnto him certain of his Sanzacks or chiefe captains,with their select companies out of the neerest parts of Grecia,and had also set strong watch and ward through the city: fearing lest vnder the colour of parle,his souldiers attending about his person, corrupted by Selymus and his friends (who euen then loded with gifts and promises, were secretly vpon the point of reuolt) should be quite drawn away from him,and so he himselfe at length be either by open force oppressed,or secret treacherie circumuented,thought it best to cut him off at once from al hope of conference or accesse vnto his presence. Wherefore seriously blaming him,that he had vpon his own head brought his armie into another mans prouince, that he in armes required audience, and last of all, so insolently abused his fathers lenitie and patience; he by the same messenger sent him farther word, That he should not presume to approch any neerer vnto him,or expect any thing appertaining to peace: who guarded with forrein power had without his fathers leaue entred into armes,and spoiled the countries of his friends: and that therefore he should do wel,with all speed to retyre out of Thracia,yea and out of Europe also, and disbanding his forces,againe to retyre himselfe vnto his owne charge in Pontus; in which doing he should find greater fauor & kindnesse with him his father,than euer he had before: but if he would needs proceed in the course by him begun,that then he would no more take him for his sonne,but for his enemie,and before it were long, sharply chastise him for his malapett insolencie,little differing from vnnatural treacherie. The messenger with his answer dismissed,it was not long after, but that Baiazet was by his espials aduertised, that Selymus the night following was risen with his armie,and marched directly towards Constantinople; whither he was sent for by his friends,in hope that vpon his approch with his army,some sudden tumult and vprore would to his auaile arise in that so great and populous a citie. Whereupon Baiazet fearing lest in staying at Hadrianople,he might lose the Imperial citie of Constantinople,early in the morning by breake of the day departed from Hadrianople towards Constantinople. Vpon his departure Selymus peaceably entered the citie of Hadrianople,the Citizens fearing,that if they should haue made any resistance,their vnseasonable faithfulnesse towards Baiazet might haue turned to their vtter destruction. Selymus after he had a while refreshed his armie with the plentie of that citie, according to his former determination set forward again,of purpose by long & speedie marches to haue preuented his fathers comming to Constantinople. Baiazet was yet scarcely come to Chiurlus, or rather Tzurulum,an antient ruinous citie almost vpon the mid way betwixt Hadrianople and Constantinople,when warning was giuen him of them that followed his armie, that the forerunners of Selymus were at hand, cutting off the straglers of his armie,and with hot skirmishing stayed and troubled his reereward. The aged Emperor more mooued than terrified with the strangenes of the matter,because his marching should not seeme as if it were a flight or chase, commanded his standard to be set vp,and al his armie to make a stand,of purpose that if Selymus should come on to giue him battell,he might finde him in readinesse. The great captaines and noblemen then present with Baiazet,whether it were for old acquaintance,or vpon some new inclination of their affection,or else vpon hope of new allyance and preferment,wishing well vnto Selymus,and therefore indirectly and cunningly fauouring him, seemed not to like of Baiazet his resolution, to bee so farre mooued (as they said) with the youthfull heate and lightnesse of his sonne, as to seeke reuenge by battell, whereas the victorie it selfe could yeeld him nothing but sorrow; but the ouerthrow threatened destruction both to himselfe and all them that were with him: the imminent euent thereof seemed to be so much the more dangerous and feareful, by how much he was at that time inferiour vnto his sonne both in warrelike prouision and number of men. Wherefore it were good for him (they said) to moderate his anger,and not now in the winding vp of his life to make too much haste by a miserable death in a wofull battell to staine the whole glorie of his former life. There was (as they would haue persuaded Selymus ouertaketh his father.

The chiefe men about Baiazet, secretly fauour Selymus,& dissuade him from giuing him battell.

A suaded him)but one only course to be taken, full of wholsome policie and safetie; & that was, That he should with such speed as he had begun, march on forward to Constantinople, that so Selymus excluded out of the citie, (his chiefest hope) and then not knowing which way to turne himselfe,should either of his own accord,or for feare of his fathers greater forces,think of return; and so with his rascal followers more honestly perish by the hands of them whose countries he had spoyled,and vpon whom he must of necessitie liue in his returne, than by the sword of his father. The author of this counsel was Mustapha, the most antient Bassa of those which being in greatest authoritie about the Emperor,are only of his priuie Councel,& sway all matters of importance concerning either peace or warre: he then vpon an vnthankfull and malicious mind loathing Baiazet,as one that had too long raigned,hated him also for certaine priuat displeasures conceiued of the emulation of the other yonger Bassa's by him promoted; and secretly bare great affection to Selymus,both in condition and fauor resembling his grandfather the Great Mahomet,by whom he was brought vp himselfe,and him of all the sonnes of Baiazet he thought most worthy of the Empire. This Mustapha was borne in the town of Seres neere vnto Amphipolis) the son of a Greeke Priest,a man of a slie, craftie, and subtill wit, alwayes subiect to corruption: which diseases of mind were in him wel to haue bin discouered by his froward looke and squint eyes,the certaine notes of a nature to be suspected. Next vnto this Mustapha was Bostanges Bassa,born of the honorable house of the Ducagina in Ætholia,and thereof called Ducaginoli; a man for his couetousnesse,ambition,and treacherie, infamous; as the foule and miserable end of his life afterwards declared. Vnto this man,Selymus had by secret promise betrothed one of his daughters, now marriageable, as a reward of his corrupt faith. By which sleight he had also allured Aiax (Aga or captaine of the Ianizaries, and great Master of the houshold) to promise his aid for the obtaining of the Empire; whereunto hee said he was by destinie called: and by his means drew other inferior captains secretly to fauor his quarrell; vnto whom he spared not to promise whatsoeuer might please their humours. Yea the captaines almost generally either corrupted with reward, or for feare following the inclination of the greater commanders,of themselues leaned that way. Of all the rest, onely Cherseogles Bassa (whom the Turks histories call also Achmet Hertezec-Ogli) a faithful,constant, and vpright man,free from all double dealing and deceit,a fast and assured friend vnto Baiazet his father in law,was of opinion,That the immoderat pride and insolency of Selymus,was euen there by force of armes and strong hand forthwith to be oppressed, before he should approch any neerer vnto the Imperiall Citie, for feare of raising some further trouble or tumult there, than were well to be appeased; which was the thing that Selymus his friends most of all desired. Neither was it to be thought (as Cherseogles said) that the naked Tartarian horsemen, although they were in number moe, would euer be able to abide the first charge of Baiazet his well armed Pensioners. As for the Ianizaries, of whose approoued faith and valour tried in many dangers,he had before had good experience; there was no doubt but that they would now to the vttermost of their power defend the person and honour of their aged and victorious Emperor,who had of long time so well of them deserued; and also to reuenge his quarrel vpon disobedient Selymus who neither fearing God the iust reuenger of such vngracious dealing,neither the infamie of men,had most vnnaturally lift vp his sword against his father,wickedly to depriue him of life,of whom he had receiued life. Wherefore he persuaded him,in his owne iust quarrell to goe forth vnto his souldiers with cheerefull countenance, and putting them in remembrance of the benefits they had from time to time most bountifully receiued at his hands, as also of their allegeance and dutie; to make them to vnderstand, that reposing his trust in their fidelitie and valour, he had resolutely set downe with himselfe, in that place before he went any further, by their fairhfull hands to chastise the presumptuous insolencie of his vnnaturall sonne, together with his rebellious Followers.

Cherseogles Bassa the only great man faithful to Baiazet,persuadeth him to giue battell to Selymus.

But now that we are fallen into the remembrance of this Cherseogles, it shall not be amisse, both for the honor of the man,and the great loue he alwaies bare vnto the Christians,to step a little out of the way,to see the cause why he being a Christian borne,turned Turke. For he was not (as almost all the rest of the great men about Baiazet were) of a child taken from his Christian parents,and so brought vp in the Mahometan religion; but being now a man grown, turned Turke: yet so,as that he neuer in heart forgot either the Christian religion or loue toward the Christians; a thing not common among such renegates. He being the sonne of one

Cherſeogles, a ſmall Prince of Illyria neere vnto the blacke mountain; and going to be married vnto a ladie whom he moſt entirely loued, and vnto whom he was alreadie betrothed, honorably diſcended of the houſe of the Deſpot of Seruia; his intemperat father with luſtfull eye beholding the young ladie of rare feature and incomparable beautie, deſired to haue her for himſelfe: and regarding more the ſatisfying of his own inordinat deſire, than his own honor, or the fatherly loue of his ſonne, tooke her in marriage himſelfe; all his friends labouring in vaine to diſſuade him, and with open mouth crying ſhame of ſo foule a fact. Wherefore the young man, mooued with the indignitie of ſo great an iniurie, and driuen headlong with diſpaire, fled firſt to the Turks garriſons which lay not far off, and from thence to Conſtantinople; where the fortune of the man was to be wondred at: For being brought before Baiazet, who with cheerefull countenance entertained him, for that he was honorably diſcended, and well liked both of the man, and of the cauſe of his reuolt; ſmiling vpon him, ſaid, Be of good cheere Noble Youth, for thy great courage is worthie of farre greater fortune than thy fathers Houſe can affoord thee; now in ſtead of thy Loue wrongfully taken from thee by thy father, (the Kinſewoman of a poore exiled Prince) thou ſhalt haue giuen thee in marriage the daughter of a great Emperour, of rare and ſingular perfection. And not long after abjuring his religion, and changing his name of Stephen, to Achomates and Cherſeogles, he married one of Baiazet his daughters, a Princeſſe of great beautie; and deſerued to haue a place amongſt the Baſſa's of greateſt honour in the Court. Yet ſtill retaining the remembrance of his former profeſſion, with a deſire to returne thereto againe: inſomuch that he kept in his ſecret cloſet the image of the Crucifix, which he ſhewed to Io. Laſcaris, as to his truſtie friend, as he himſelfe reported. This man at ſuch time as the citie of Modon was taken by the Turkes, and a multitude of poore Chriſtian captiues cruelly put to death in the ſight of Baiazet, by earneſt entreatie ſaued the Venetian Senatours there taken: and afterward by earneſt ſute deliuered Andreas Gritti, being priſoner at Conſtantinople, and condemned to die; who not many yeares after was choſen Duke of Venice. He was the chiefe means wherby the Venetians to their great good obtained peace of Baiazet. He alſo by his great authoritie, and of his own charge redeemed innumerable Chriſtians from the ſeruitude of the Turks, and ſet them at libertie. Neither is his kindneſſe towards the furtherance of good learning to be forgotten: for at ſuch time as the foreſaid Io. Laſcaris the notable & learned Grecian, by the appointment of Leo the tenth, ſought antient works of famous writers, he procured the Turkiſh Emperors letters patents, that he might freely at his pleaſure ſearch all the Libraries in Grecia, to the great benefit of good letters. Now Baiazet encouraged by this mans perſuaſion (as is aforeſaid) and hearing as he lay in his pauilion, the alarme of the enemie, with the tumult and clamour of his owne ſouldiers as if they had been men afraid; and ſundrie meſſengers alſo at the ſame time comming vnto him with newes, That Selymus with his Tartarian horſemen had almoſt incloſed the rereward of his armie, and already taken ſome of his baggage: grinding his teeth for verie madneſſe and griefe of minde, with teares trickling downe his hoarie cheekes, got him out of his pauilion in his horſelitter, (for he was at the ſame time ſo troubled with the gout, that he was not able to ſit on horſebacke) and turning himſelfe vnto the Penſioners and Ianizaries ſtanding about him, as their manner is, ſaid vnto them, Baiazets ſpeech to the ſouldiers and Ianizaries of the court.

Will you, Foſter children, valiant Souldiours, and faithfull keepers of my perſon, who with great fortune haue ſerued me in field aboue the ſpace of thirtie yeares; and for your faithfull and good ſeruice haue both in time of peace and warre, of me receiued ſuch rewards, as by your owne confeſſion and thankeſgiuing farre exceeded your owne expectation, and the meaſure of our Treaſures: Will you, I ſay, ſuffer the innocent Father to be butchered by his graceleſſe Sonne? And your old Emperour, tormented with age and diſeaſes, to be cruelly murthered by a companie of wilde Tartars, little better than arrant Rogues and Theeues? Shall I be now forſaken in this my heauie old age and laſt act of life? And ſhall I be deliuered vnto myne enemies, by them, by them, I ſay, who many yeares agoe with great faithfulneſſe and inuincible courage defended myne honour and right againſt my brother Zemes? and haue many times ſince, not onely valiantly defended this Empire againſt moſt warrelike Nations, but alſo moſt victoriouſly augmented the ſame? But I will not ſo lightly beleeue that which to my no ſmall griefe is brought vnto myne eares, concerning the reuolting of myne Armie: neither if I did beleeue it, am I ſo fearefull as to be therewith diſcouraged, or to ſeeke to make ſhift for my ſelf.

For

For to what purpoſe ſhould I thinke of flight? as though I could in any other place find more faithfulnes or ſurer defence than with you? And concerning your ſelues, what ſhould be your hope by this ſo infamous treacherie? If any of you (for I cannot beleeue that you are all ſo mad) without regard of faith, of worldly ſhame, or the feare of God, haue pollnted your minds with the pernitious conceit of ſo foule a treaſon; doe you thinke to gaine greater rewards and preferments by your treacherie and villanie, than by your fidelitie and conſtancie? There be many which carefull of my perſon, perſuade me to reſerue this my ſicke and feeble bodie vnto my better fortune, and to commit my ſelfe to flight, ſo rather to ſaue my life with ſhame and infamie, than to end my dayes with honour and glorie: Which is ſo far from my thoughts for the apprehenſion of any feare to doe, that I will to the contrarie forthwith giue the fierce enemie battell; and in this my laſt danger make proofe of all your fidelitie and valour, and of euery one of your good wils in particular: and ſo by conduct of the Higheſt, either defeat the power and breake the ſtrength of this graceleſſe man, or elſe hauing raigned aboue thirtie yeares an Emperour, end my dayes together with them which ſhall vnto the end continue with me in their faithfulneſſe and loyaltie, although I ſhould be moſt ſhamefully and diſhonourably betrayed and forſaken of ſome of myne owne Guard: which thing though lying fame would make me beleeue, yet will I not feare it vntill I ſee the proofe thereof.

The common fort of the Ianizaries, vnto whom the great Commanders and captaines corrupted by Selymus, had not for their leuitie and multitude communicated their purpoſe of transferring the Empire to Selymus, began to crie out as if it had beene with generall conſent, That he ſhould not doubt to joyne battell with his enemies, and ſo to make proofe of their conſtant fidelitie and woonted valour. Which was done with ſuch a cheerefulneſſe and deſire expreſſed by great ſhouts, clapping of hands, & clattering of armor, that it ſeemed they would play the parts of reſolute ſouldiers, and that as guiltleſſe men they tooke it grieuouſly to be once ſuſpected of treaſon or infidelitie. Others alſo who ſecretly and in heart were well affected to Selymus, for faſhion ſake followed them with like crie: but eſpecially the great commanders both of the armie and of the Emperours Court, now changed their affection, whether it were for ſhame of the fact, or for feare of diſcouering themſelues out of ſeaſon, is vncertaine. Wherefore according to the manner of ſuch men, which through their mutabilitie and miſchieuous diſpoſition, fearing to be conuinced and diſcouered, adde vnto the preſent a ſecond and new treaſon or treacherie, to couer the former: ſo Muſtapha and Boſtanges (not daring now to ſhew themſelues for Selymus) to make a great ſhew of their feigned loyaltie towards Baiazet, departed themſelues out of his pauilion, to encourage the ſouldiers, and to martiall the battell.

The commō ſort of the Ianizaries faithfull to Baiazet, deſire battell.

The battell betwixt Baiazet and Selymus.

Baiazet ſicke in his chariot, by the aduice of Cherſeogles the faithfull Baſſa, placed his battel in this order: The Sanzacks (which are the gouernours of prouinces) with their horſemen, in number about 6000 he ſet in the front of the battell: the Spachi-oglans & Siliphtars, which are the chiefe horſemen of the court, and as it were the Emperors Penſioners, were placed as two wings on each ſide of the great ſquadron of the Ianizaries; in the midſt whereof was old Baiazet himſelfe. Other 4000 horſemen (ſeruants to the great men of the court) were left in the rereward, and to guard the baggage. Theſe ſlaues (for ſo indeed they are) for their apparell and furniture, yea and valor alſo, are little inferior to their maſters, by whom they are ſo ſumptuouſly maintained both for ſtrength and oſtentation. The battell thus ordered, Baiazet commanded the trumpets to ſound, and a red enſigne in token of battell to be diſplaied. On the other ſide, Selymus placing his Tartarian horſemen in both wings, and his Turks in the midſt, in manner of a halfe moone, for that he in number of horſemen far exceeded his father, did almoſt on euery ſide incloſe him, and ſo charge him. The Tartars when they were come within 100 paces of their enemies, caſting themſelues (after the manner of their fight) into great rings, emptie within in manner of a crowne, and ſo running round, that they might both backward and forward deliuer their arrowes, caſt vpon their enemies whole ſhowers of ſhot, as if it had bin haile, to the great annoyance of the Turks: when as in the meane time the other Tartarian archers further off, ſhooting their arrows not right forth, but more vpright towards heauen, which falling directly downe, ſore gauled the Turks horſes alſo. But the old ſoldiers (taught by the example of their captaines) ſerred cloſe together, and caſting their targets ouer their heads, as if it had been one whole roofe or penthouſe, receiued their arrowes with leſſe harm, and haſted with as much ſpeed as they could to come to handie blows. The penſioners alſo also at the same instant brauely charged the middle of Selymus his battell, where his Turkish horsemen stood: and Aiax captaine of the Ianizaries, drawing out 700 readie harquebusiers out of the squadron of the Ianizaries, with them assailed the hindmost of one of the wings of the Tartars: and the foure thousand seruants left in the rereward, as desirous as the rest to shew their forwardnesse, with great slaughter repulsed the other wing of the Tartars, which came to haue spoyled the Turks carriages. This fierce battell betwixt the father and the son, with doubtfull euent endured from noone vntill the going down of the Sun: Selymus in many places still restoring his declining battel, and fighting himselfe, as for an empire. But after that the Tartars, hardly charged by the harquebusiers, were not able to abide the shot, especially their horses, being with the vnwoonted noise thereof wonderfully terrified, and so carrying backe their riders whether they would or no, began to flie; the rest of the horsemen could neither by commandement, threatning, or wounds, be inforced to stay, but turned their backs and fled. The footmen also whom Selymus had attyred and armed after the manner of the Ianizaries, being forsaken of their owne horsemen, were now by Baiazet his horsemen compassed about and almost all slaine.

Selimus his army discomfited.

Selymus his armie thus ouerthrown, and himselfe hardly beset, was by certain troups of his Turkish horsemen which yet stayed with him, deliuered from the present danger; and being wounded, was mounted vpon a fresh horse, & so with all the speed he could fled after the Tartars. But doubting to be pursued and ouertaken by his fathers speedie horsemen, he changed his horse, and tooke another of a wonderfull swiftnesse: and so reseruing himselfe to his future fortune, with a few of his followers fled to Varna, and from thence by sea to Capha.

The estimation Selymus had of his horse wherby he escaped from his father.

The horse whereon Selymus fled was all cole blacke, called Carabulo (that is to say, a blacke cloud) whom Selymus as a good seruitour euer after exempted from all seruice; and had him in such estimation, that couered with cloth of gold, he was as a spare horse without a rider led after him in all his great expeditions, first into Persia, and afterwards into Ægypt, where he died at Caire, and there to the imitation of Bucephalus, Great Alexanders horse, had a monument erected for him: wherein Selymus shewed himselfe more kind than to his owne brethren, whom he cruelly murthered, and hardly affoorded to some of them so honourable a Sepulture.

In this battell, of fortie thousand which Selymus brought into the field, escaped not aboue 8000, but they were either slain or taken prisoners. Of Baiazet his armie were lost about 700, and 3000 hurt with Tartarian arrowes: which losse he presently reuenged, with extream crueltie, causing all such as were taken prisoners to be without mercie put to the sword in his sight; whose heads were layd together by heapes, and their dead bodies, as if they had beene towers. Of this notable battell betwixt the father and the son in the yeare 1511, Chiurlus, called in antient time Tzurulum, before an obscure old ruinous citie, (or as Ionius calleth it, a village) became famous: but much more afterwards by the fatal destinie of Selymus; who not many yeares after, strucken with a most loathsome and incurable disease, ended his dayes in the same place with an vntimely and tormenting death; God (as it is to be thought) with reuenging hand in the same place taking iust punishment for his former disloyaltie towards his father, as shall hereafter in due time and place be declared.

Three dayes Baiazet lay still in the same place where he had obtained the victorie, till such time as all his soldiers were againe returned from the chase of the enemie: after that, he held on his way to Constantinople, and there bountifully rewarded his soldiers. In the mean time Achomates hearing of all the trouble which had happened betwixt his father and his brother Selymus, with the euent thereof, came with an armie of twentie thousand from Amasia, thorow the Countreis of Galiatia and Bythinia, vnto the citie of Scutari, called in antient time Chrisopolis (though some suppose it to haue beene the famous citie of Chalcedon) which citie is scituated vpon the strait of Bosphorus, directly against the Citie of Constantinople. In this place Achomates encamped his armie, neere vnto the sea side, expecting what course his father would take after so great a victorie. For beside the prerogatiue of his age, and the especiall loue of his father towards him, the generall affection of the vulgar people, with the good opinion he had of himselfe, had alreadie filled his mind with the hope of the Empire. Wherefore he ceased not night and day to send Messengers ouer that narrow strait, to Constantinople; and most earnestly to solicite Baiazet his father, in so fit an occasion to make haste haste to dispatch what he had so long before determined, concerning the resignation of the empire. He also importuned his friends and familiars in best maner he could to commend him to his father, and in most ample sort to extoll his graue purpose for translation of the empire; and to doe the vttermost of their deuoire, that seeing God and good fortune had iustly ouerthrowne the rash attempt and force of his brother Selymus, he by their good means might the sooner obtaine the empire, whereof he was the vndoubted heire.

Baiazet, who of himselfe and according to his old good liking was altogether desirous of the preferment of Achomates, was by their persuasions easily intreated to hasten the performance of that he had before determined for the transferring of the empire. And making no great secret of the matter, commanded certaine gallies to be made ready for the transporting of Achomates from Scutario to Constantinople. But the great Bassaes with the soldiers of the court (the secret fauorits of Selymus) vnderstanding the matter, began againe openly to resist and impugne his purposed determination, and to alledge the same reasons they had before at Hadrianople alleaged; in fine they said plainely, That they would by no meanes suffer him so far to disable himselfe as an insufficient man to resigne the empire, who of late had with so valiant and couragious an heart fought for the honour of his crowne and dignitie; and that therefore so long as he liued, they would acknowledge no other soueraigne but Baiazet: yet for all that as they meant not thereby to cut off Achomates his hope, so neither ought he to distrust the good will of the men of war; but that he being a man of most approued and known valour, might in due time with their generall good liking enioy his right, which should then without all question be due vnto him as the eldest sonne of their Emperor. They said moreouer, that they had in the late battel against Selymus sufficiently declared what minds they were of, both towards their Emperour and Achomates, and what confidence they were to repose in the fidelitie of their souldiers, who to manifest their faithfulnesse and loyaltie, had not refused to offer themselues vnto the hazard of a most vnequall battell, yea their liues vnto death it selfe. O foule dissimulation, the couert maske of all mischiefe, vnder which, meere treacherie is here pretended for great loyaltie, the aged Emperour too too much flattered, Achomates shamefully deluded, and (the man that might not as then without some addition of disgrace be named) Selymus, euen bloudie Selymus, secretly sought for aboue all men to be preferred!

Baiazet by this offwardnesse and insolencie of the souldiers againe disappointed of his purpose, or else (as some thought) delighted with the sweetnesse of soueraignetie: for that after the late victorie he seemed (as one growne young againe) neither to feele himselfe old or vnable still to gouerne so great an empire; sent word to Achomates, how the matter stood, and that he should forthwith depart from Scutari to his old charge at Amasia, from whence he would againe call him at such time as he had with new bountie won the minds of the souldiers, and procured the good liking of other the great men in court, whereby so great a matter and not vsuall, might the better and with more securitie be effected.

Achomates thus deceiued of his hope and expectation, grieuously complaining that he was so mocked of his father, and contemned of the soldiers of the court, began to mix his new request with words of heat and discontentment, and to inueigh against his father, for making him a by-word (as he termed it) and a laughing stocke vnto the world, after he had taken the paines to come so far, and that by his speciall appointment. But if he proceeded so to doat, and to make so great reckoning of the souldiers of the court, that in respect thereof he neither regarded his promise, nor that was right and iust; he would himselfe by force of arms take vpon him the defence of his own honor and right, so lightly esteemed by his father, and reuenge the disgrace offered vnto him by others.

Whereunto Baiazet answered by the Cadelescher (which is a man of greatest place and authoritie amongst the Turks in matters concerning their superstition, and therfore of them honored aboue others, as the sacred interpreter of their law) that he did neither well nor wisely without iust cause to falinto so great rage and choller, as by his speech and force to thinke to extort that good which was only by loue and loialtie to be gained: whereas all things should be surely kept for him, and the empire vndoubtedly descend vnto him, if by vntimely hast he did not marre that hope which he ought by sufferance and patient expectation to cherish: he might (as the Cadelescher told him) learn by that late example & fortune of his brother Selymus, what might be for his own good and welfare; and that it was a thing of far more danger,

desperatly to thrust himselfe headlong into such an action as he could not possibly see the end of, than moderating by reason his hot passions, to expect with patience the opportunitie of time, and fitnesse of occasion, with the alteration of matters, all tending to his good. G

Achomates inflamed with anger and griefe of the repulse, all the while the Cadeleschet was deliuering his fathers message, gaue him many sharpe taunts, and had much adoe to staie himselfe from offering of him violence, oftentimes threatning him, that in short time both his father should deerely buy the changing of his purpose, and the souldiers of the court their treacherous dealing: and so sending him away with this short answer, he presently rose with his army, and passing through Bythinia, cruelly spoiled the country in his return to Amasia. There daily more and more enflamed with the griefe and the indignitie of the repulse before receiued, he determined to inuade the lesser Asia: that if it should so fall out, that he must needs by force of armes trie his right against either of his brethren, he might therein vse the wealth of that rich prouince. Whereby if it should chance that he should by the practise of any, faile of the whole empire, yet he should at the least wise be possessed of the one halfe thereof, and see the readier for all euents, hauing all these great and rich prouinces in his power. Wherfore calling vnto him his two sonnes, Amurathes and Aladin, yong princes of great hope, after he had grieuously complained of the vnkindnesse of his father Baiazet, and of the iniuries done against him by his enemies in the court, he declared vnto them, that there was now no hope left for him to obtaine the empire, except they would forthwith enter into armes with him, and so together with him defend both his and their owne right and honor, against the malice and iniuries of their enemies: which he said, would be an easie matter to do by surprising the lesser Asia, if they would couragiously aduenture vpon it; forasmuch as all Pisidia, Lycaonia, Pamphilia, with the sea coast of Ionia, were not as then kept with any armie or nauie. And as for his brother Corcutus, there was no great doubt to be made of him, who according to his quiet disposition would be content either to sit stil, or else in regard of his iust quarrell take part with him; or if he would needs intermeddle his quiet estate with the troubled, and so enter into armes, might easily be thrust out of what soeuer he possessed: as for the Gouernors of the rest of the prouinces, he doubted not, but that they would also yeeld either to his command, or fortune. Wherefore he willed them to plucke vp their hearts as men of courage, and to go into the countries thereabouts to take vp men, and what soeuer els were needfull for the wars. These gallants, of their owne youthfull disposition readie enough for such a matter, and now encouraged with their fathers persuasion, did what they were by him commanded, and had in short time raised a notable armie of voluntarie souldiers, of whom the greatest part were of seruile condition. But Achomates himselfe, besides his old armie which he had in former time lead against the Persian rebels, leuied new forces also, and called foorth into the field all the able men that were to be found in the cities round about: and so running through the prouinces proclaimed himselfe king of Asia, and such as would not forthwith yeeld vnto him, those he and his two sonnes in diuers places prosecuted with all hostilitie: by which means many cities, especially such as were but weakely fortified, partly for feare, partly by constraint, were deliuered ouer vnto him. H K

Achomates inciteth his two sons Amurathes and Aladin to take part with him against their grandfather Baiazet.

After that, he entered with his armie into Lycaonia, and the borders of Cilicia, where by embassadors and often letters hee requested Mahometes his brothers son (who then gouerned those countries) to aid him in his iust quarrell against them, who by craftie and sinister persuasions had to his dishonour and disgrace withdrawne his fathers good will from him, and so far seduced him, as that he was determined to appoint another successour in the empire, than him his eldest and first begotten sonne: which their malice he would (as he said) preuent, and by force of armes recouer his right, which his father knowing to be due vnto him, was about to haue put him in possession of whilst he yet liued, had he not by the sinister practise of others beene hindered: for the recouery whereof, if Mahometes would out of his prouince aid him with men and victuall, and so further his iust cause, he promised that he should find a far better vncle than he had found a father; and that his present friendship should in time be most amply and bountifully requited. L M

Wherunto Mahometes answered, that he could not do what his vncle had required, except he were so commanded by his grandfather Baiazet, whom alone he acknowledged for his dread soueraigne: and that it was not for him to iudge, whether he did right or otherwise, That he would

A would not in his life time resigne the empire to his son. But this (he said) he was not ignorant of, that he was not to yeeld his obedience to any other, so long as he liued possessed of the empire: to whom both his father Tzihan Scach whilest hee liued, and himselfe also had giuen their oath of obedience and loyaltie. Wherfore it were good for him to pacifie himselfe, lest in seeking vntimely reuenge of his enemies, he should to the offence of all men wrong his father: and by too much heat and hast ouerthrow both his hope and honour; which of right should be most great, if he could but in the meane time haue patience, and stay himselfe a while. Achomates, who expected nothing lesse than such an answer, but thought that Mahometes would either for loue or feare haue presently come vnto him, and now finding his requests to be with greater grauitie and consideration denied by his nephew, than they were by reason
B of him demanded, entered with his armie into the borders of his prouince, and with fire and sword began to destroy the country before him. Which Mahometes with such power as he had thinking to remedie, was by the way encountered by his vncle not farre from Larenda, and there ouerthrowne: and taking that city for refuge, was there certain daies besieged by Achomates; and at last together with his brother (then but a child) deliuer into his hands, at such time as the citie was by the fearefull citizens by composition yeelded vnto him. Achomates hauing taken the citie with his two nephewes, caused Mahometes his counsellors, with his foster brother, by whose persuasion it was supposed that he had so answered his vncle and endangered himselfe, to be put to death.

C These proceedings of Achomates filled Baiazet with griefe and indignation, that he should in so great yeres be set vpon by two of his owne sons, one after the other. Yet to proue if those troubles might without more bloudshed be pacified, he sent his embassadors vnto him to reproue him for his disloyaltie; and to command him foorthwith to set at libertie his two nephewes, Mahometes and his brother, and so without more stirre to get him againe to Amasia: which if he should refuse to do, then to denounce vnto him open war. But he, which by how much the more he had after his repulse ambitiously affected the empire, had resolued with himselfe to deale so much the more cruelly in his proceedings: hauing receiued this message from his father, caused the chiefe embassadour (for that he had in franke speech deliuered his message and denounced vnto him wars) to be in his own presence put to death; and threatned the rest with the like, if before the going downe of the Sun they auoyded not his campe.

Achomates killeth his father embassadour.

D This outrage highly offended Baiazet, and alienated the minds of many before wel affected to Achomates; for that without any reuerence of his father and contrary to the law of nations, he had violated the embassadors sent to him for peace. Vpon the first bruit hereof, the soldiers which then waited at the court gate, in the hearing of Baiazet exclaimed, that the insolencie of Achomates was not longer to be suffered, but forthwith by force to be represt; that by sufferance and delay he would grow from euill to worse; and that if Baiazet should prolong the time, and in fatherly sort seeke by faire meanes to reclaime him, he should afterwards in vain craue the aid of his best souldiers against his rebellous son strengthned by his owne long sufferance. Mustapha also the chiefe Bassa, with Rostanges and others of great place (who secretly fauored Selymus, and had cunningly caused these things by fit men to be dispersed amongst E the souldiers) began at the first to mutter, and as it were to wonder at the strangenesse and hainousnes of the fact, in such slie sort, as if they had condemned the deed done, but not the doer. But afterward, when they saw that Baiazet was throughly heated, both by his own angry disposition and the speech of the soldiers, and vpon the confidence of his former victory against Selymus, now ready to seeke reuenge; they began then to heape fresh coles vpon the fire, and bitterly to inuey against Achomates, as a traitour to his aged father and the state; and withall highly commended the fidelitie and courage of the Ianizaries and soldiers of the court, who for the fatetie and honour of their aged Emperor, were most prest and readie to expose themselues, their liues, and what soeuer else they had, vnto new dangers.

Achomates proclaimed traitor.

So was Achomates by the craft and subtiltie of these great men, by the anger of his father, F and the iudgement of the souldiers, proclaimed traitor; and order taken, that the souldiers of the court with the European horsmen, should with all possible speed be sent against him into Asia. But when choice was to be made of some valiant and worthie Generall that might take vpon him so great a charge, which seemed especially to appertain vnto some one of the great Bassaes: it was strange to see, how they all began to straine courtesie at the preferment, & euerie rie one to refuse the place and disable himselfe, saying, That it were a great indignitie, that the Emperours armie should be led against his son by any of his seruants: and the souldiers (hauing their lesson before hand) said plainly, That they durst not, nor would not draw their swords or lift vp their hands against the son of the Emperor, and heire apparant of the empire, except they were conducted and commanded by some of the Othoman bloud in person present with them: for so had his brother, long before when he rebelled in Cilicia, and now of late, Selymus his rebellious son, bin both ouerthrown and vanquished, euen by the conduct of Baiazet himselfe, and not by any of his seruants. These things all tended to this purpose, that Selymus might by indirect means be reconciled to his father (whom they secretly fauored, although for feare of displeasure they durst not so much as name him but by way of disgrace) and by this very meanes to make way for his returne to Constantinople, and so consequently giue him power to seise vpon the empire. For it was probably supposed, that neither Baiazet himselfe, being very aged & diseased; neither Corcutus, altogether buried in his study, would vndertake the managing of those wars: so that of the Othoman familie only Selymus was left, to whom that charge might be committed, all the nephews of Baiazet by reason of their tender yeares, as yet vnfit for the same. At these speeches of the Bassaes and the soldiers, Baiazet as a man perplexed and in a chafe, flung away into his pallace, excusing himselfe by his great yeares and diseased bodie: but complaining deeply, that Corcutus in following the vain title of learning, with a quiet contented kind of life, had in the mean time neglected other studies and honorable qualities, better beseeming his princely birth and calling. As he was thus reasoning with himselfe, and deuising what course to take, Mustapha the old Bassa, who all the time of his raigne had vsed to disburden him of his cares, hauing by way of talke drawn him into a full discourse concerning the proceeding to the intended war, set vpon him with this craftie and premeditated speech, framed of purpose for his destruction.

The crafty oration of the great Ta Mustapha to Baiazet, for the bringing home of Seeymus

Your Maiestie may not (most dread Soueraigne) although by yeares and strength of bodie you were neuer so well able, you may not I say, either transport your armie, or your selfe passe ouer in person in Asia; lest whilest you are there, from place to place chasing Achomates, you leaue a farre more dangerous enemie behind you in Europe, who may in your absence seise vpon Thracia, Gracia, yea and the imperiall Citie it selfe, destitute of sufficient defendants. Doe we not heare, that Selymus is raising of new forces aboue Varna? to expect a new supplie of horsemen from the Tartar King his father in law? And alreadie as it were houering ouer our heads? Is he not of greater spirit and courage, than to bee daunted or dismayed with the misfortune of one battell? or if you shall send ouer your old beaten souldiers into Asia, and call Corcutus into Europe with the forces he leauied the last yeare, who in time of your sickneesse may withstand the attempts of Selymus: will he feare these fresh water souldiers of Asia, or their phylosophycall Generall, which feared not the souldiers of your court, the picked and chosen men of the world, and your selfe a most worthie and victorious Emperour? You are deceiued, and (if I may be so bold so to say) you throughly see not into the doubtfull euent of things, if you thinke not, that you must at one time wage warre against two dangerous enemies, euen in the remotest parts of your Empire, in Asia and Europe: For whilest you shal goe about to expulse Achomates out of Capadocia, Selymus neerer at hand, and awaiting all opportunities, will by and by at your backe, raise a most dangerous warre in the very heart and chiefe strength of your Empire. But if you, mooued with the greatnesse and due consideration of the danger, shall goe about to defend Thracia, and for that purpose retaine with you the most approoued and faithfull souldiers of the court, you shall see all Asia on a fire before your face: neither will Achomates make an end of wast and warre, vntill such time as he hath drawne the Empire of Asia vnto himselfe. Wherefore if it be not to be imputed to your fault but to your fate or fortune, that two begotten of your selfe, should by your selfe and the consent of all men be iudged traitours vnto your crowne and dignitie; whereof the one through rashnesse, the other vpon pride and vaine discontentment, hath risen vp in armes against you: Why doe you not in so doubtfull and perplexed a matter, preferre safe and sound aduise before that, which masketh vnder the shew of maiestie and honour? and whom you cannot both at one time correct and be reuenged vpon, to set vpon them as occasion shall serue when they are together by the eares betwixt themselues? This is the onely hope of your safetie, this is the onely way, if you shall resolue (as the common prouerbe saith) to driue out one nayle with another, and so to ouercome your enemies. Moderate a while your hot desire of reuenge, and for the present dissemble your griefe:

griefe; grant vnto one of them pardon, and in shew take him into your grace and fauour, imploy him against the other: so shall you without danger, howsoeuer it shall fall out; persecute the one whom you loue not, with the hazard of the other whom you trust not: and at your pleasure oppresse him to whome you shall commit your ensignes and armie; the hands of your faithfull and trustie souldiers being euer at your appointment ready to take reuenge. So shall you with securitie make an end of this warre, exposing vnto the danger him whom you had rather to ouercome (as your enemie) by him whom you wish also to perish.

Mustapha had scarce made an end of speaking, but the other Bassaes (as they had before agreed amongst themselues) began where he left, & with all their cunning labored to persuade Baiazet to call home his son Selymus, and to make him Generall of his armie against his brother: saying, That he had already indured sufficient punishment for his former disloyalty, and that therefore it was like that he as a well corrected child would from thence forth containe himselfe within the compasse of his most dutifull obedience: whereas Achomates proud of his birth-right, hauing of late violated his fathers embassadors, and filled all Asia with rebellion, was not like to be brought to any reasonable conformitie, vntill he were by force of armes pluckt downe, and so made to know himselfe, in like maner as was his brother Selymus of late. Baiazet seeing that in resoluing of a matter of so great consequence, Cherseogles Bassa (his son in law, and the onely faithfull counsellor then about him) sat all silent, hanging the head, as a man not of the same opinion with the rest, stood a great while in doubt what to resolue vpon: he could not so easily forget the late iniuries don against him by Selymus, it was yet fresh in memorie, how that he had out of Asia inuaded Europe, surprised Hadrianople, giuen him battell, indangered his person with his Tartarian horsemen, and that onely by the goodnesse of God he had obtained the victorie: on the other side, his Maiestie contemned, his nephews imprisoned, his embassadors violated, the cities of Asia ransacked, and all those goodly countries presently smoking with the fire of rebellion, so filled his old heart with anger and indignation, as that he desired nothing more than to be reuenged. Whilest hee was thus strugling with his owne thoughts, and doubtfull what to do, the vnfaithfull Bassaes by deepe deceit and trecherie (Cherseogles most instantly persuading the contrary) ouercame him so far, as with his own hand to write letters to Selymus, promising him, that forgetting al iniuries past, he would vpon the hope of his loyaltie, receiue him into his former grace and fauor, and make him Generall of his armie, if he would without delay repaire to Constantinople, and so passe ouer into Asia against his rebellious brother Achomates.

Whilest these things are in doing at Constantinople, Corcutus aduertised by letters from his friends of the weake estate of his aged father, and by what persuasions he had bin induced (after Achomates was proclaimed traitour) to call vnto him Selymus, and to make him Generall of his army, came downe out of Magnesia to Phocis, and there imbarking himselfe in his gallies, sailed to Constantinople: where being arriued, he went presently to the court, attended vpon with a great number of his friends and fauourits; and entring into the prime chamber, humbled himselfe before his father, and kissed his hand: and after much talke had betwixt them of diuers weightie matters, is reported to haue spoken vnto him as followeth.

Corcutus commeth to Constantinople.

Corcutus his oration to his father Baiazet.

It is now aboue thirtie yeares past (most reuerend father, and dread Soueraigne) since that I (being chosen and proclaimed Emperour by the prerogatiue of the souldiers of the court, by generall consent of the citizens of this imperiall citie, and by the graue iudgement of the wise and graue Bassaes of the Court) haue cheerefully and willingly, and as I may truely say, with mine owne hand deliuered from my selfe vnto your Maiestie the possession of this most glorious Kingdome and Empire: Which thing what worldy wight would haue done? but either a mad man, or else a most kind and louing sonne? Vnto which so rare an example of a religious and louing heart, I was not by any feare or constraint enforced, but onely by regard and contemplation of your owne sacred person, and the due consideration of my dutie. Neither did it in the course of so many yeares, euer repent me of that my singular kindnesse and dutie done, when as I contenting my selfe with such things as you had vnto me assigned, and with the generall commendation of my well doing, as well as with a kingdome, thought this your great estate and highest type of worldly honour, not to be compared with the quiet contentment of my pleasing studies; when as I accounted it a vaine thing, and not beseeming the resolution of a setled and quiet mind, to long after these worldly things, which being had and enioyed to the C full, worke no full contentment in the insatiable desire of man: and that surmounting vertue, and the sweet, ô most sweet meditation of heauenly things promised vnto my contemplatiue and rauished mind, things of far more worth and maiestie than all the kingdomes and monarchies of the world. But whilest

I was tracing this path, little regarding wordly honour, or the glorie of an empire, and was for pure deuotion and desire of knowledge trauelling into the furthest part of Arabia, vnto the Altar of our most sacred Prophet Mahomet, and so to the Indians, as to men of a more exact knowledge and sincere pro- fession; you in the middest of my trauell drew me out of Ægypt by the long hands of the Ægyptian Sultan, backe againe into Phrygia; commanding me, that eschewing the manifold dangers (which in my long trauell I must needs haue fallen into) I should from thenceforth haue more regard of my life and health, and to expect the fruit both of my loyalty towards you, and of your fatherly loue towards me: H as if you had been then of opinion, that the time would come, when for the euill disposition of some, an innocent man, denoted vnto the studie of wisedome and learning, might be a stay both vnto your selfe and the whole Othoman familie. Since which time I haue euer both dutifully obeyed your command, and with as much care and integritie as I possibly could, discharged my charge: and in the late warre, raised and brought into the field mine armie, wherewith I defended the frontiers of my prouince from the incursions of the Barbarians. But after that they were vanquished, and by your forces driuen out of the lesser Asia, and that my vnnaturall and graceless brethren, the one of them in Europe, as a most desperate recreant, had in plaine battell assailed the person of your most sacred Maiestie (his I reuerend father, farre spent with age, and then grieuously tormented with the gout) of purpose to haue at once depriued you both of your life and empire: And the other in Asia seeking by like disloyaltie and most horrible treason there to possesse himselfe of a Kingdome, had besieged and taken prisoners his brothers sonnes your nephewes, young Princes of great expectation, your faithfull and louing subiects, and proceeding further, had set al that part of your empire on a broile: I thought my self in duty bound to repaire hither vnto your imperiall Maiestie, for that I saw it came to passe, not without the prouidence of the most Mightie, that I might at such time especially request the iust reward of my due desert of you, my most reuerend and louing father, the most religious obseruer of Equitie and Iustice: when as you hauing had too great proofe of the iniustice of my vnnaturall brethren, might most fitly and most commodiously performe that which you vpon great reason might now grant vnto me your dutifull and obedient sonne, although my former deserts had merited no such thing. Wherefore most gracious, I humb- E ly pray and beseech you by all your fatherly loue and affection towards me, and my knowne loyaltie towards you, to vouchsafe before the comming of Selymus, to haue regard of mine honour, with the state of your Empire: for when he shall once in armes breake in, he will at a trice cut off all hope of pa-cification; and supported by the men of warre, confound all things at his pleasure: for I heare, that the very guarders of your person, and chiefe commanders of your armies, altered in disposition towards you, doe but expect the good offer of time, when they may willingly salute for their Emperour and So-ueraigne, him, whome your good fortune of late full sore against their wills, ouerthrew in open field.
Wherefore that Empire whereof I was sometime possessed, and for the rare desert of mine antient loyal-tie towards you, is of good right due vnto mee, restore to mee againe whilest you may, and whilest it is yet in your power, in this sudden and momentarie occasion now presented. For your Maie- L stie shall in vaine fauour my most iust and vpright claime, after that you (hauing at once receiued into the imperiall Citie a most desperat and ambitious man) haue for euer lost your libertie, together with your selfe.

Baiazet comforteth Corcutus, and promiseth to resign to him the empire, after that Selymus was passed ouer into Asia.

Corcutus with tears standing in his eies hauing ended his speech, the aged Emperor moued with a fatherly affection and the reasonable perswasion of him, his onely loyall and most kind son, comforted him vp with good words, and willed him to be of good cheere; and withall discouered to him the very ground of his resolution, in calling home of Selymus: telling him farther That he could be well content to resigne to him againe the Empire, but that it was not in his power so presently to do, for feare of the Janizaries of the court, who had (as he said) of late withstood him in the like motion, and would gaine-say it, if he should but giue the least occasion. B ging, not without hope of obtaining the Empire, and so remained many dayes after at Constantinople: during which time he sought neither by gifts nor golden promises to procure the loue and good liking of the great Bassa's or soldiers of the court; for that he as a plain vpright man, thought it not good by suit and corruption (the great promoters of the vnworthie) to seeke for that at their hands, which was of right due vnto him by his fathers fauer & promise.

In the mean time Selymus his fast friends aduertising him of the comming of Corcutus to the court, aduised him to make haste, and with all speed possible to [illegible] that it was to be feared, lest Baiazet being verie aged, and michal ... to ... by the persuasion of Corcutus be induced to alter, yea and perhaps ... before well for [illegible] his most readie preferment. This

This curſed Iew hauing thus poyſoned the aged Prince, to auoid the danger of the fact, and to carrie the firſt newes thereof to Selymus, ſecretly conueyed himſelfe away, and fled in haſte to Conſtantinople. But Baiazet attainted with the force of the poyſon, began firſt to feele moſt grieuous gripings in his ſtomacke, the ſtrong paine whereof appeared by his miſerable complaining and heauie groaning; in the middeſt of which torments he gaue vp the ghoſt, in the yeare 1512, when he had raigned thirtie yeares. The Turks report that he died a natural death: but Antonius Vrius a Genoway, who at that time ſerued in Baiazet his chamber, & was preſent at his death, reporteth, That vpon his dead bodie the euident tokens of poyſon were to be ſeene. His dead bodie with all his treaſures were preſently brought backe again to Conſtantinople, and deliuered to Selymus, who cauſed the bodie of his father to be with the greateſt ſolemnitie that might be, buried in a moſt ſumptuous tombe, in a chappell neere vnto the great Mahometan Temple which he had before built for himſelfe at Conſtantinople: which Monument there remaineth at this day to be ſeene. His ſeruants were all by Selymus reſtored to their places which they before held in the Court in the time of their old Maſter, except fiue of the Pages of his chamber, who lamenting the death of their Maſter aboue the reſt attyred themſelues all in mourning apparell: for which cauſe they were by the commandement of Selymus caſt in priſon, where two of them were put to death; the other three at the ſuit of Solyman, Selymus his ſonne, and of other two Baſſa's, were ſaued: but being ſtript of their rich apparell, and whatſoeuer elſe they had gotten vnder Baiazet, they were inrolled for common ſouldiers vnder Sulluſtares Baſſa. Of theſe three, Antonius Vrius (the Genoway before ſpoken of) was one, who after ten yeares miſerable captiuitie amongſt the Turks, at laſt eſcaped at ſuch time as Selymus was by the Perſian diſcomfited: and with much adoo returning againe into Italie, wrot the hiſtorie of all ſuch things as he himſelfe had there ſeene, with the calamities of Baiazet, his houſe, and a great part of the tyrannous raigne of Selymus.

The death of Baiazet.

Selymus cauſeth two of his Father's Pages to be put to death for mourning for their Maſter.

Hamon the Iew luſtly rewarded for his treachery.

Hamon the falſe Iew (as the ſame author reporteth) comming to Conſtantinople, and expecting ſome great reward for his foule treaſon, by the commandement of Selymus had his head preſently ſtrucke off: with this exprobation of his treachery, That opportunity ſeruing, he would not ſticke for reward to do the like againſt Selymus himſelfe. Of this Baiazet, Ianus Vitalis writeth this Elogium:

Paulus Iouius Illuſt. virorum Elog. lib. 4.

Dum rerum exquiris cauſas, & dum procul Hunnes

Si timeat natos, progeniemque ſuam?

In Engliſh thus:

Whil'ſt that thou Bajazethes ſeekes of things the hidden cauſe,
And faine would'ſt bring the Hunne and Ruſſe vnder thy Turkiſh lawes:

Phil. Lonicer. Turc. Hist. Li.

En Selymus, scelere ante alios immanior omnes :
In patris, & fratrum, dirigit arma necem.
In Persas mouet inde ferox : Memphitica regna Destruit : & Syros, Æthiopasque domat.
Hinc in Christicolas irarum effundere fluctum, Ipsorumque imo vertere regna parat.
Cum diro victus prosternitur vlcere : Christus Scilicet est populi, portus & aura sui.

Lo Selymus, in crueltie exceeding others farre,
His father, and his brethren both, destroyes with mortall warre.
The Persian fiercely he assailes : and conquers Ægypts Land :
The Syrian, and the Moore likewise, he tam'd with mightie hand.
But purposing in his mad mood, the Christians to confound,
And the memoriall of their name to root from off the ground,
A loathsome Canker eat him vp, and brought him to his end :
Christ is to his the safest Port, when he will them defend.

THE LIFE OF SELYMVS, FIRST OF THAT NAME, THE THIRD AND MOST WARLIKE EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

C THis Selymus, by fauor of the great Bassaes and men of warre whom he had before corrupted, hauing depriued his father Baiazet first of the empire, and shortly after of his life also, and now fully pos- 1512 sessed of the empire himselfe ; first tooke view of the treasures which the Turkish Kings and Emperors his ancestors had before of long time heaped vp in great aboundance : out of which hee gaue vnto the souldiers of the court two millions of duckats ; and for a perpetuall remembrance of his thankfulnesse towards them augmented their daily wages, allowing vnto euery horseman foure aspers a day, and to euery footman two, aboue their wonted allowance. By which exceeding bountie, he greatly assured vnto himselfe the minds of the men of warre.

Selymus going into Asia against his brother Achomates.

D Shortly after he passed ouer with a great armie into Asia, leauing the gouernment of the imperiall citie of Constantinople vnto his only sonne Solyman : and marching into Galatia came to the citie of Ancyra, in hope there to haue oppressed his elder brother Achomates. But he vnderstanding before of his comming, withal wisely considering how vnable he was to withstand his forces, fled before into the mountaines of Capadocia vpon the confines of Armenia, taking vp men by the way as he went, and praying aid of all sorts of people, yea euen of such as were but of small abilitie themselues, and vnto him meere strangers ; that so he might in best manner he could, prouide such strength as might serue him to make head against his brother, and for the recouerie of Asia.

Selymus hauing spent that sommer without doing any thing worth the speaking of, and consi-E dering that he could not well winter in that cold countrey neere vnto the great mountaine Taurus, by reason of the deepe snowes and extreame cold there vsually falling ; and that to go farther was to no purpose, forasmuch as Achomates flying from place to place, and mountain to mountaine was not to be surprised, he retired backe againe into Bythinia, and sending his Europeian horsemen downe to the sea coast, and the Ianizaries to Constantinople ; resolued to winter with the rest of his armie at Prusa. At which time being wholly bent against Achomates his competitor of the empire, he for certaine yeares continued the league which his father Baiazet had before concluded with Vladislaus king of Hungarie, Sigismundus king of Polonia, and the Venetians. And thinking no care (no not of Children) superflous which might concerne the establishing of his empire, he called vnto him fiue of his brothers sons, Orchanes the

F sonnes of his brother Mahometes ; all young Princes of great hope, of yeares betwixt sixteene and twentie, excepting Musa who was not past seuen yeares old : Of all these, Mahometes (whom his vncle Achomates had a little before taken prisoner at Larenda, as is before declared, and vpon the death of Baiazet had againe set him at libertie) beeing about twentie yeares old, was for rare feature and princely courage accounted the paragon and beautie of the Othoman family: which great perfection, as it woon vnto him the loue and fauour of the men of warre, and also of all the people in generall: so did it hasten his speedie death; onely Selymus his cruell vncle enuying at his life. After he had got these poore innocents into his hands, he sent for diuers of his great doctors and lawyers, demaunding of them, Whether it were not better that some fiue, eight, or ten persons should be taken away, than that the state of the whole empire should with great effusion of bloud be rent in sunder, & so by ciuile wars be brought in danger of vtter ruine & destruction? Who although they wel perceiued whereunto that bloudy question tended, yet for feare of displeasure they al answered, That it were better such a small number should perish, than that the whole state of the empire should by ciuile warre & discord be brought to confusion; in which general calamitie, those few must also of necessitie perish with the rest. Vpon colour of this answer, and the necessitie pretended, he commanded these his nephewes before named, to be led by fiue of his great captaines into the castle of Prusa, where they were all the night following most cruelly strangled. It is reported, that Mahometes with a penknife slew one of the bloudie executioners sent into his chamber to kill him; and so wounded the other, as that he fell downe for dead: and that Selymus, being in a chamber fast by, and almost an eye-witnesse of that was done, presently sent in others, who first bound the poore Prince, and afterward strangled him with the rest: whose dead bodies were buried at Prusa amongst their ancestors. The crueltie of this fact wonderfully offended the minds of most men, insomuch that many euen of his martial men filled with secret indignation, for certain daies absented themselues from his presence, shunning his sight as if he had beene some fierce or raging lyon.

Of all the nephewes of old Baiazet, only Amurat and Aladin (the sons of Achomates) yet remained, whom he purposed to surprise vpon the sudden, and so to rid himselfe of all feare of his brothers children; hauing then left none of the Othoman family, but them and his two brethren vpon whom to exercise his further crueltie. These two yong Princes had a little before recouered the citie of Amasia, from whence they were the Sommer before expulsed by their vncle Selymus, at such time as Achomates their father was glad to flie into the mountaines of Capadocia. Selymus fully resolued vpon their destruction, sent Vsegi one of his Bassaes with fiue thousand horsemen, who by great iournies trauelling to Amasia, might vpon the sudden come vpon these two yong Princes, and take them altogether vnprouided, and as then fearing no such danger: which was thought no great matter for the Bassa to do, forasmuch as he might with his light horsemen easily preuent the fame of his comming; and the citie of Amasia where they lay, was neither well walled, nor as then furnished with any sufficient garrison for defence therof: beside that, Achomates himselfe was at that time absent, busied in taking vp of soldiers vpon the frontiers of Caramania. But Mustapha the old Bassa, by whose special means Selymus had obtained the empire (as is afore declared in the life of Baiazet) being priuie vnto his wicked purpose, and now in mind altogether alienated from him, detesting his most execrable tyranny, both for the vnworthy death of Baiazet, his father, & the guiltlesse bloud of so many yong princes his nephews by him shed without all pittie; and hauing compassion of the imminent danger whereinto these two brethren were now like also to fall, by secret and speedie messengers gaue them warning of the comming of the Bassa, and of all that was entended against them. Who vpon such knowledge giuen, presently aduertised Achomates their father thereof, and laid secret ambush themselues for the intercepting of their enemies. So that within few daies after, the Bassa comming with his horsemen towards Amasia, fell before hee was aware into the middest of his enemies: at which time also, Achomates following him at the heeles, so shut him in with his armie on euery side, that most of his men being slaine, he himselfe with diuers other captaines were taken prisoners and brought to Achomates, and by his commandement committed to safe custodie.

Now it fortuned, that some of Achomates soldiers scoffing at the prisoners whom they had taken, told them how they had bin deceiued, and how all the matter had bin carried (so hard a thing it is to haue euen the greatest counsels in court kept secret) boasting, that they wanted not their friends, euen of such as were most inward with Selymus, who secretly fauoured the better cause, & would not long suffer the cruel beast to rage further: all which things Selymus his soldiers reported again after they were ransomed and returned home. But Vsegi the Bassa lying stil in prison, and getting certain knowledge of the whole matter, by secret letters gaue

A Selymus to vnderstand, that Mustapha the great Bassa whom he most of all trusted, had secret intelligence with Achomates, and had been the only cause of the losse of his armie.

Selymus of late enuying at the great honour and authoritie of Mustapha, and wishing him dead, (whose desert he was not able, or at leastwise vnwilling to requite) caused him vpon this accusation without further triall to be secretly strangled in his sight, and his dead bodie (as it were in scorne of his former felicitie) to be cast out into the street for euery man to gaze vpon. This was the shamefull end of this traiterous Bassa, who had of long time at his pleasure commanded all things in the Turkish Empire, and was for riches, power, and authoritie, next vnto the Emperours themselues: but now lieth as a dead dog in the street, no man daring for feare to cast earth vpon him. A rare spectacle of the vncertaintie of worldly felicitie, and a worthie example of disloyaltie. But Achomates hearing what had happened to Mustapha, in Mustapha Bassa shamefully murthered.

B reuenge thereof in like manner executed Vsegi Bassa his prisoner; and according to his courteous nature set all the rest of the prisoners at libertie.

Vsegi Bassa put to death.

Selymus thirsting after nothing more than the guiltlesse bloud of his brethren and nephews, vpon whom he had against all right vsurped the kingdom, wherof he neuer thought himselfe sufficiently assured so long as any of them breathed; began with the first of the Spring to deuise with himselfe, how he might first take away his brother Corcutus, who then liued at Magnesia, and hauing cast off all hope of the Empire, gaue himselfe wholly to the studie of Phylosophie, which he (seduced with ambition) had in euil time a little before forsaken; but now retyring himselfe thereto againe, as to his greatest contentment, spent his time in quiet con-

C templation, not attempting any thing against his cruell brother vsurping the Empire. Selymus resolued vpon the destruction of this harmlesse Prince, suddenly commanded his captaines to make choice of 10000 horsemen to be in readinesse within three dayes, giuing it out that he would make an inroad vpon the sudden into Cappadocia. In the number of these horsemen, Antonius Mœnauinus a Genoway, author of this historie (as he of himselfe reporteth) was one.

All things being in readines against the appointed time, Selymus in person himselfe set forward with his armie from Prusa, still keeping the way on the right hand; so that the soldiers, who thought they should haue marched directly into Cappadocia, and so to Amasia, as it was before commonly reported; began now to perceiue by the contrarie course they held, that they were to go for Lydia and Ionia. When a valiant souldier among the rest, who had some-

D time serued one of the Bassa's in Corcutus his court, by diuers circumstances gathering the intention of Selymus, secretly conueyed himselfe out of the armie, and being excellently well mounted, taking the neerest way, came to Magnesia, & gaue Corcutus warning of the comming of his brother. Corcutus considering the great danger he was in, richly rewarded the messenger, and leauing his house in such order as it was woont to be, fled with two of his seruants to the sea side, in hope to haue found passage either into Creet or else Rhodes.

The next day after Corcutus was departed, early in the morning came Selymus to the castle of Magnesia before the rising of the Sun, in hope to haue found Corcutus yet in his bed: but being deceiued of his expectation, he fel into a great rage, and with cruel torments examined all

E his brothers seruants and Eunuchs, What was become of him, and where he had hid himself? and with much ado got it out of them, That he had warning of his commiug by a fugitiue soldier, and was thereupon fled, but whither they knew not. Wherefore Selymus stayed there fifteen dayes, during which time he caused diligent search to be made all ouer the countrey, and along the sea coast, for to haue apprehended him. But when after much search he could heare no tydings of him, he caused all his brothers treasure & rich furniture to be trussed vp, and to be sent by sea to Constantinople. So leauing one of his captains with a thousand horsemen in garrison at Magnesia, he returned againe to Prusa with as much speed as he came from thence: verily supposing, that his brother was for safegard of his life, by sea fled into Italie. All this while Bostanges, Selymus his sonne in law, lying with a fleet of gallies vpon the coast of Ionia, Selymus taketh the spoyle of his brother Corcutus.

F had taken from Corcutus all hope of escaping by sea: so that he was faine to hide himselfe in a caue neere vnto the sea side, not far from Smyrna; liuing in hope, that after a few days the fleet would depart, and so he should finde some opportunitie to escape.

After he had thus a great while in feare most miserably liued with countrie crabs and other like wild fruit (a poore diet for a man of state) and was with extream necessitie inforced to send his man for reliefe to a poore shepheards cottage thereby, he was by a country pesant discouered

Corcutus taken red to Cassumes, who with too much diligence sought after his life: and being by him appre- G hended, was carried towards the tyrant his brother at Prusa.

Right welcome to Selymus was the report of his taking: who as soone as he vnderstood that he was within a daies journey of Prusa, sent one Kirengen-Ogli (who of his squint looke was called Chior Zeinal) to strangle him vpon the way, and to bring his dead bodie to Prusa.

This captaine comming to Corcutus in the dead time of the night, and awaking him out of his sleepe, told him his heauie message; how that he was sent from his brother Selymus to see him executed, which must as he said presently be done. Corcutus exceedingly troubled with these heauie news, and fetching a deepe sigh, desired the captaine so long to spare his life, vntill hee might write a few short lines vnto his brother Selymus. Which poore request being granted, he called for pen and paper, and readily in Turkish verse (for he had spent all his time H in studie) reproued his brother of most horrible cruelty; vpbraiding him, that he had not only most disloially thrust his father out of his empire, but also most vnnaturally depriued him of life, of whom he had before receiued the same: and not so content, had most tyrannously slaine his brothers children; and now like an vnmerciful wretch thirsted after the guiltlesse bloud of himselfe, and Achomates his brethren. At last concluding his letters with many a bitter curse, he besought God to take of him iust reuenge for so much innocent bloud by him most vnnaturally spilt. And when he had thus much written, he requested the captaine, that it might together with his dead body be deliuered vnto Selymus. So without any further delay hee was The lamentable death of Corcutus. according to the tyrants command presently strangled. The next day after, when the dead bo- I dy was presented vnto Selymus, he vncouered the face therof, to be sure that it was he, and seeing a paper in his hand, tooke it from him: but when he had read it (for all his cruel nature and stony heart) he burst out into tears; protesting, that he was neuer so much grieued or troubled with any mans death as with his: for which cause, he commanded general mourning to be made for him in the court, & with princely solemnitie buried his bodie. Three daies after, he caused fifteen of those diligent searchers who first found Corcutus, to haue their heads struck off, and their bodies to be flung into the sea, saying, That if he were by any extremitie driuen to flie & hide his head, they would not stick to serue him in like maner as they had don his brother.

Now of al the posterity of Baiazet remained none aliue to trouble the cruel tirants thoughts but only Achomates and his two sons: who vpon the approch of the Spring, set forward with his army from Amasia, excited by the often letters of his friends, who assured him, that Selymus K might vpon the sudden be easily oppressed, if he would with al expedition come to Prusa; forasmuch as the Ianizaries & Europeian horsmen, the vndoubted strength of his army, were ■ that time absent, and he himselfe as one hated both of God & man, could not in so sudden and vnexpected danger tel what he were best to do, or which way to turn himselfe: wherfore they willed him without delay to hasten his comming, and not to expect the milder weather of the Spring, lest in the mean time Selymus should call together his dispersed forces: God (they said) did oftentimes offer vnto men, both the opportunitie and meanes to do great matters if they had the power to lay hold thereon, and therefore he should do well now by celeritie and courage to seeke to better his euil fortune, which but a little before had bereft him of his fathers L kingdom; for if Summer were once come on, he must either gain the victorie by plain battell, which would be a hard matter, or els get him packing out of Capadocia and all Asia the lesse.

Achomates, who before had promised vnto himselfe better successe, as well for the great strength he had of his own, as for the new supplie of horsemen he had procured from Hysmael the Persian king, but especially for the hope he had, that Selymus generally hated for his late crueltie, should in the time of the battell be forsaken of his owne souldiers; yeelded to the persuasion of his friends, who with many pleasing words set before his eies glorious things, easie to be spoken, but hard to bee effected. Wherefore, when hee was come into Galatia with somewhat more than 15000 horsmen, hauing for hast left his footmen by easie marches to come after him: Selymus aduertised of his comming, by speedie messengers sent for his horsemen to Prusa. In the mean time whiles he is leuying other common souldiers, & expe- M cting the rest of his forces; fortune which alwaies fauored his attempts, did then also auert the danger prepared for him by the vnfaithfulnes of his followers, & shewed to him the open way to victorie. For Achomates secret friends which were in Selymus his campe, continuing firm in their good wil toward him, did earnestly by letters persuade him (being already set forward,

A ward, and now come as far as Paphlagonia) to make hast, and to come before Selymus his forces were come together: for that he had sent for the Ianizaries and Europeian horsemen, and did with all speed and diligence make all the preparation he could possibly; which for all that would all come too late, if he should vpon the sudden come vpon him before he were pro- Treason against Selymus discouered.
uided. Which letters being by chance intercepted, gaue Selymus certain knowledge both of his brothers purpose and comming, together with the treason intended against him by his owne seruants: wherefore executing them who had writ those letters, he in their names caused others to the same effect to be written to Achomates, persuading him with all speed possible to come still on, and not to stay for his footmen, for that Selymus might easily be oppressed with a few troups of horsmen, if Achomates would with speed but come and shew himselfe
B vnto his friends and fauorites: who vpon the first signall of battell would raise a tumult in the armie, and vpon the sudden kil Selymus, vnaduisedly going too and fro in the battell. Which letters so written, Selymus caused to be signed with the seales of them whom hee had before executed, and found means to haue them cunningly deliuered to Achomates, as if they had bin sent from his friends: who giuing credit to the same, and presuming much vpon his owne strength, doubted not to leaue his footmen, who followed easily after him, vnder the conduct of Amurath his son; and came and encamped with his horsemen neere vnto the mountaine Horminius, vpon the banke of the riuer Parthemius. Selymus also departed from Prusa, and hauing receiued into his army ten thousand Ianizaries (but a little before come ouer the strait) sent before Sinan Bassa, Generall of his Asian horsmen, to know & make proofe of the strength was, being deceiued by the darknesse of the morning, fell into a place of disaduantage, where he was set vpon by Achomates, and hauing lost seuen thousand of his men, was glad with other eight thousand which were left, to flie backe vnto Selymus.

For all this losse, was not Selymus discomforted, or doubtfull of the victorie, but forthwith marched on forward to the riuer Elata, which runneth directly out of the mountaine Horminius into Pontus, watering most large fields vpon the right hand, which at this day are called the plaines of the new land. So did Achomates also, who although he knew his brother to bee euery way too strong for him, yet being incouraged with the late victorie, and in hope that his friends in Selymus his army (whom he vainly supposed to haue bin yet liuing) would in the ve-D ry battell doe some notable matter for him, and that victorie would follow his iust quarrell; resolued neither to retire backe, neither to expect the comming of the rest of his army. The riuer was betwixt the two campes, and the number of both armies certainly discouered: yet could not Achomates (to whom the open fields offered a safe retreat vnto the rest of his army) possessed with a faral madnesse, be persuaded (considering the greatnesse of the danger) in time to prouide for the safetie of himselfe and his army, carried headlong (as it seemed) by inuitable destinie to his fatall destruction, which presently after ensued.

ta, and gaue generall commandement through all his campe, that euery man against the next day should be ready for battell: and in a wood not far off placed a thousand horsemen in am-E bush, vnder the leading of Canoglis, his wiues brother, a valiant yong gentleman, whom his father had a little before sent from Taurica vnto his son in law with a chosen companie of Tartarian horsmen: vnto him Selymus gaue in charge, that when the battell was ioyned, he should shew himselfe with his horsemen vpon the backe of his enemies, and there to charge them.

As soone as it was day, Selymus in a great open field put his armie in order of battell, placing his horsemen in two wings, so that all his spearmen were in the right wing, & the archers and carbines in the left: in the maine battell stood the Ianizaries with the rest of the footmen. On the other side Achomates hauing no footmen, diuided his horsemen into two wings also.

Whilest both armies stood thus raunged, expecting but the signall of battell, a messenger came from Achomates to Selymus, offering in his masters name, to trie the equitie of their qua-
F rel in plain combat hand to hand: which if he should refuse, he then tooke both God and the world to witnes, that Selymus was the only cause of al the guiltles bloud to be shed in the battel, & not he: whereunto Selymus answered, that he was not to trie his quarel at the appointment of Achomates: & though he could be content so to doe, yet would not his souldiers suffer him so to aduenture his person & their own safety: & so with that answer returned the messenger backe againe to his maſter, giuing him for his reward a thouſand aſpers.

Achomates hauing receiued this anſwer, without further delay charged the right wing of his brothers armie, who valiantly receiued the firſt charge: but when they were come to the ſword, and that the matter was to be tried by handie blowes, they were not able longer to endure the force of the Perſian horſemen; who being well armed both horſe and man, had before requeſted to be placed in the formoſt ranks, by whoſe valor the right wing of Selymus his armie was diſordered, and not without great loſſe enforced to retire back vpon their fellows. Which thing Selymus beholding, did what he might by all means to encourage them againe; and preſently brought on the left wing with their arrowes and piſtols, in ſtead of them that were fled: and at the ſame time came on with the Ianizaries alſo, who with their ſhot enforced Achomates his horſemen to retire. Achomates himſelfe carefully attending euery danger, with greater courage than fortune came in with freſh troups of horſemen, by whoſe valor the battell before declining was againe renewed, and the victorie made doubtfull: but in the fury of this battell whileſt he was bearing all downe before him, and now in great hope of the victorie, Canoglis with his Tartarian horſemen riſing out of ambuſh, came behind him, & with great outcries cauſed their enemies (then in the greateſt heat of their fight) to turne vpon them: at which time alſo the footmen ſtanding cloſe together aſſailed them afront, and the horſemen whom the Perſians had at firſt put to flight, now moued with ſhame, were againe returned into the battell; ſo that Achomates his ſmall army was beſet, & hardly aſſailed on euery ſide. In fine his enſignes being ouerthrown, and many of his men ſlain, the reſt were faine to betake themſelues to flight. Where Achomates hauing loſt the field, & now too late ſeeking to ſaue himſelfe by flight, fell with his horſe into a ditch, which the rain falling the day before, had filled with water and myre: and being there knowne and taken by his enemies, could not obtain ſo much fauour at their hands as to be preſently ſlaine, but was reſerued to the farther pleaſure of his cruell brother. Selymus vnderſtanding of his taking, ſent Kirengen (the ſame ſquint-eyed captaine which had before ſtrangled Corcutus) who with a bow ſtring ſtrangled him alſo. His dead bodie was forthwith brought to Selymus, and was afterwards by his commandement in royall manner buried with his anceſtors in Pruſa.

Achomates ſtrangled.

Amurat and Aladin the ſons of Achomates, flie the one into Perſia, and the other to Ægypt.

Now Amurat, Achomates his ſonne, vnderſtanding vpon the way by the Perſian horſemen (who ſerred together, had againe made themſelues way through the Turks armie) of the loſſe of the field and the taking of his father, returned backe againe to Amaſia: and there after good deliberation, reſolued with his brother to betake themſelues both to flight; he with the Perſian horſmen paſſing ouer the riuer Euphrates, fled vnto Hyſmael the Perſian king: but Aladin the yonger brother paſſing ouer the mountain Amanus in Cilicia, fled into Syria, and ſo to Campſon Gaurus the great Sultan of Ægypt.

After this victorie, Selymus hauing in ſhort time and with little trouble brought all the leſſer Aſia vnder his obeiſance, and there at his pleaſure diſpoſed of all things, determined to haue returned to Conſtantinople: but vnderſtanding that the plague was hot there, hee changed his purpoſe, and paſſing ouer at Callipolis and ſo trauelling through Grecia, came to Hadrianople, where he ſpent al the reſt of the Summer, and all the Winter following: and afterward when the mortality was ceaſed, returned to Conſtantinople; where it was found, that an hundred and threeſcore thouſand had there died of the late plague.

Hyſmael the Perſian king, whoſe fame had then filled the world, hearing of the arriuall of Amurat, ſent for him, and demanded of him the cauſe of his comming. The diſtreſſed young prince, who but of late had loſt his father, together with the hope of ſo great an empire, and now glad for ſafegard of his life to flie into ſtrange countries; oppreſſed with ſorrow, by his heauie countenance and abundance of teares, more than by words, expreſſed the cauſe of his comming: yet in ſhort ſtrained ſpeech, declared vnto him, how that his father, his vncle, with the reſt of his couſins, all princes of great honour, had of late been cruelly murdred by the vnmercifull tyrant Selymus: who with like fury ſought alſo after the life of himſelfe & his brother, the poore remainders of the Othoman familie, who to ſaue their liues, were both glad to flie, his brother into Ægypt, and himſelfe to the feet of his imperiall Maieſtie.

Hyſmael moued with compaſſion, and deeming it a thing well beſeeming the greatneſſe of his fame, to take the poore exiled prince into his protection and to giue him reliefe, willed him to be of good comfort, & promiſed him aid. And the more to aſſure him thereof, ſhortly after gaue

A gaue him one of his owne daughters in marriage. For it was thought, that if Selymus (for his tyrannie become odious to the world) ſhould by any meanes miſcarrie (as with tyrants commonly falleth out) that then in the Othoman Familie, ſore ſhaken with his vnnaturall crueltie, none was to be preferred before this poore Prince Amurat: beſides that, it was ſuppoſed, that if he ſhould inuade him with an armie out of Perſia, that vpon the firſt ſtir, all the leſſer Aſia mourning for the vnworthie death of Achomates, would at once reuolt from him, who for his crueltie and ſhameful murthers had worthily deſerued to be hated together both of God and man.

Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring Hyſmael furniſhed Amurat his new ſonne in Law with ten thouſand horſemen, willing him to paſſe ouer the riuer of Euphrates at Arſenga, and to enter into Cappadocia, as well to make proofe how the people of that Countrey
B were affected towards him, as of the ſtrength of the enemie: after whom he ſent Vſta-Ogli, the moſt famous Chiefetaine amongſt the Perſians, with twentie thouſand horſemen moe, with charge, That he ſhould ſtill follow Amurat within one dayes journey: and he himſelfe with a farre greater power ſtayed behinde in Armenia, doubting to want victuall, if he ſhould haue led ſo great an army through thoſe vaſt, barren, and deſolate places, whereby he muſt of neceſſitie paſſe.

cia, had diuers townes yeelded vnto him by his friends; ſome others he tooke by force, Amurat ſpoileth Capadocia.
C which he either ſacked or elſe quite raſed; and brought ſuch a generall feare vpon the inhabitants of that prouince, that the people ſubmitting themſelues vnto him all the way as he went, it was thought he would haue gon directly to Amaſia, had not Chendemus (an old warlike captaine whom Selymus had left for his lieutenant in Aſia) with a great armie come to meet him at Sebaſtia, which at this day is called Siuas. This Chendemus had alſo long before aduertiſed Selymus both of the preparation and comming of the Perſians, as ſoone as he had learned by his eſpials, That they were paſſed the riuer Euphrates. Vpon which news Selymus came preſently ouer into Aſia, and commanding all his forces to meet together at Pruſa, had with wonderfull celeritie leuied thereabout fortie thouſand common ſoldiers. Which ſo ſoon as Amurat vnderſtood, as wel by ſuch priſoners as he had taken, as by aduertiſement from his friends; although he was verie deſirous to haue fought with Chendemus, yet doubting that if Selymus
D ſhould with his wonted celeritie come againſt him, he ſhould be intangled in the ſtraits of the mountaine Antitaurus, he retyred backe againe to Vſta-Ogli. But Selymus, who all that yeare had in his haughtie thoughts beene plotting ſome ſuch notable exployt as were worthie his greatneſſe, ſtanding in doubt whether he ſhould by ſea and land inuade Hungarie, the Rhodes, or Italy, at that time ſore ſhaken with ciuile wars; hauing now ſo fit an occaſion giuen him by the Perſian, to the great joy of all Chriſtendome, conuerted himſelf wholly vnto the Eaſt, and Selymus reſolueth to inuade the Perſian.
in thirtie dayes march came to Arſenga. Where joyning his armie with Chendemus, when he vnderſtood that his enemies hauing harried the countrey, were againe retyred; prickt forward with the griefe of the iniurie, and deſire of reuenge, with hope of victorie he reſolued E to follow after them footby foot, and forthwith to enter into Armenia the greater, the principall prouince of the Perſian Kingdome.

But the difficulties of this notable expedition, which were in Councell propounded by them which had beſt knowledge of thoſe countries, were great and many; all which by his owne good hap and inuincible courage, he himſelfe afterwards ouercame: for the ſouldiers which had in ſhort time alreadie marched by land out of Illiria, Epirus, and Macedonia, into Cappadocia, muſt of neceſſitie in this long expedition take vpon them new labours: they were to endure the ſharpe and pinching cold of the huge mountaine Taurus, and by and by after the moſt vehement and ſcorching heat in the plaines of Armenia the leſſer, with extreame thirſt, hunger, and moſt deſperat want of all things: and well the more, for that the Perſians in F their retreat ſpoyling the country as they went, had vtterly deſtroyed all that might ſerue for the vſe of man, of purpoſe to leaue nothing to their enemies but want of all things, if they ſhould purſue them: beſides that, his moſt expert Captaines ſtood in no ſmall doubt of the pettie Princes of Armenia the leſſe, and the mountaine King Aladeules, whom they were to leaue behinde them at their backes, without any great aſſurance of their friendſhip, who they well knew would leaue them, if [illegible]thing ſhould happen otherwiſe than well to Selymus, either in the battell, or for want of victuals, or in the strait passages. For they were to be relieued with victuals from the Armenians: and Aladeules forces then in readinesse, were neither for number nor power to be contemned; who also with castles commodiously placed, and strong garrisons, at his pleasure commanded all the straits, passages, and entrances which led out of Capadocia into Armenia and the Persian kingdome: for all the mountaine countreys were vnder his command, and his kingdome stretched from the mountaines called Scodrisei neere vnto Pontus, all alongst the great mountaine Taurus vnto Amanus, which diuideth Cilicia from Syria.

Amongst the rest, old Chendemus Viceroy of Natolia, a man of great experience, and of all others in greatest credit, fauour, and authoritie with Selymus, perswaded him to stay a while in Capadocia, and there to refresh his European souldiers alreadie wearie of their long trauell, and so to expect the comming of his enemies. And to perswade him from the dangerous expedition into Persia, spake vnto him as followeth:

Chendemus Bassa dissuades Selymus from going any further against the Persians.

It is not to be thought (most mightie and inuincible Emperour, that the Persians are fled for feare, because they retyred before they set eye vpon vs their enemies: it is a fineneſſe, and they plainly go about to entrap vs, whiles they by flight make a false semblant of feare. Know we not what cunning heads, what able bodies Persia breedeth? Will they feare the naked Turkish light horseman or archer, which with their couragious barbed horses and themselues strongly armed, feared not the Scythian shot? or (if that be too little) which by their valour haue vanquished so many nations, and gained vnto their King so great and large an Empire? Thinke you, that you haue either greater or better forces than had long agoe Cassumes your vncle, or Great Mahomet your Grandfather; who diuers times prouing their Forces against this enemie, where more than once put to the worst, I my selfe then seruing in their camps neere vnto Trapezond and the mountaines of Nicopolis. I will not denie, but that the great ordnance which you carrie with you may stand you in great stead, so that fit place may be found to bestow so many field pieces in: but this scortched ground, the frozen and abrupt mountains, with the vast and solitarie plaines beyond them, terrifie me, whom all the armed Forces of our enemies in places of great aduantage could not dismay. You must fight not onely with your valiant enemies, but with the difficulties of nature also. Neither may your Maiestie giue any credit to the Armenians or Aladeules, Princes of most doubtfull faith: although at your first setting forward they shew a faire face, and seeme neuer so friendly: for they will but expect and await some fit occasion to take you at an aduantage, and so to set vpon you when you least feare them. But admit you were assured of victorie, O with how much warme blond of your best souldiers shall you buy the same? with what other souldiers, with what other Forces will you defend Grecia, if the Christian Kings hearing that you for enlarging your Empire, or desire of fame being gone into the furthest part of Armenia, shall in the meane time inuade you? Wherefore if it be better and more wisedome, with safetie to defend your owne, than with danger to seeke for that is other mens; if Princes of greatest policie haue reposed the glorie of their victorie, not in the greatnesse of the slaughter of their enemies, but in the safetie and preseruation of their owne souldiours: spare to obiect your selfe and your armie to most manifest danger, and vnaduisedly to commit all at once to the hazard of good fortune: which being a most tickle and vnconstant mistresse, if she shall but once dallie with your dangerous attempts, you shall through your rashnesse in farre shorter space tumble down head long from the type of so great maiestie, than you haue thereunto a while agoe by your rare vertues worthily aspired.

Selymus as he was of a rough and fierce nature, so would he haue all things done according to his own deuice and direction: and though he were not a little moued with this speech of so graue a counsellor and most expert commander, and saw many of his captains troubled with the imagination of the future danger; yet in a fume refuting some little of that which Chendemus had sayd, he dismissed the Councell, protesting openly, that he would proceed in his intended purpose, hap what hap should, from friend or foe: although that old fellow were (as he said) so careful of his life, that he feared to die an noble death. Which Selymus had no sooner said, but presently others about him, accustomed to serue his humor, which enuied at the glorie and wealth of old Chendemus, tooke hold vpon these words, and beginning with the greatnesse of his forces, the valour of his soldiers, the store of his artillerie, with his own inuincible fortune, made easie matters of all the former difficulties, and with great words labored to extennat

A tenuat all that the graue Bassa had before said concerning the prowesse and power of the enemie. After that, they began to discredit Chendemus, saying, That he (being a martiall man, and of knowne resolution in all his most warlike actions) had not said as before, for want of courage, of any distrust he had or the victory, but of purpose to hinder that most honorable expedition, and to cut off all hope of victorie, which was (as they said) as good as alreadie gotten; being before loded with Amurat his great promises, and the gold of Persia. Wherefore they wished him to beware of the slie old Fox his wyles and treason, and to proceed on in his expedition so much the more boldly: and not to thinke that his soldiers would refuse any danger or labour, so long as they saw courage in himselfe, but would be readie (as they said) to vndertake the most desperat difficulties of war, and desired nothing more, than to be conducted
B into those far Countries, where by their martiall prowesse and valiant acts they might make their Emperor Selymus equall with the great Alexander, and themselues comparable to his Macedonians. And to worke the vtter destruction of this most faithful counsellor without all recure, these false flatterers suborned bold faced accusers, who falsly and shamefully affirmed, that he had receiued great sums of mony from Amurat, and did not therfore in time go against the Persian robbers, whereby all the former calamities hapned (as they said) to that prouince. For which pretended causes, Selymus commanded Chendemus without further hearing to be slaine: but indeed to terrifie others from like libertie of speech; and withall to teach them, to deeme those deuices and counsels as most excellent, which their Soueraigne should as it were by diuine inspiration finde out himselfe, and so to accept of them without contradiction. The
C sudden death of this most faithfull counsellor Chendemus, strucke an exceeding feare into the minds of all men, for that so honorable a personage, of late in so great credit and fauour with his Soueraigne, was without hearing executed; whom they had known as a man of great account, both for his prowesse and policie, to haue stood fast on Selymus side, first in his warres against his father, and of late against his brother: not doubting but that Selymus, by nature cruell and suspicious euen of trifles, would with like tyrannie not spare men of meaner calling, which spared not his deerest and most antient friends.

Selymus marching from Arsenga, came to the confines of the lesser Armenian kings, and of Aladeules; where by his Embassadors he requested the kings of those nations (who were then in armes) that they would joyne their Forces with his against the Persian, and to go with him
D into Armenia the great: promising that when the wars were happily ended, he would giue vnto them all such territorie as should chance in those wars to be taken from the enemie, as a reward of their aid. But these poore Kings, which hated both Hysmael and Selymus for their manifold iniuries they dayly receiued in the frontiers of their dominions, lying in the midst betweene them, (as commonly it falleth out, that the weakest goe to the walls) craftily expecting the euent of this war, would not openly shew themselues, but answered, that they had taken vp armes for no other purpose, but for the defence of themselues and their kingdomes. Not meaning in that doubtfull war to beare themselues as enemies vnto either of those great Princes their friends and neighbours, of whose just grieuances they were not able or worthie to determine: yet if he would without hostilitie in peaceable manner passe through their Do-
E minions, they promised to giue free passage vnto him and his armie; and after he was entered into Armenia the greater, to relieue him with such prouision of victuall as their bare Countries could affoord.

Selymus thus deceiued of this his first hope, (for why, he thought those poore kings would at the first either for loue or feare haue bin readie to haue done him all the seruice they could) dissembled his griefe for the present, as wholly bent against Hysmael: fearing that if he should by word or deed offend those neuter Princes, he should haue them at his backe his most assured & vndoubted enemies. Wherfore passing the mountains called Scodrisci, he came in eight days vnto the great mountaine called Moschij, which the famous riuer Euphrates, with his mighty streame and hugie broken bankes, separateth from the great mountain Antitaurus, and F with perpetuall steepe ridges runneth into Iberia & Colchis, and on the East discouereth Armenia the greater. Here Selymus with ensignes displaied marching alongst the banke of the riuer, departed not from the same, for feare to lacke water in that hot and drie country, and so held on his way directly Eastward, leauing the countrey of Armenia the lesse vpon his left hand, and the frontiers of the kingdome of Aladeules on the right, vntill he came vnto the mounmountaine Periardo. This great mountaine, famous by the rising of two great and notable Ri- G uers out of it, is for the wonderfull fertilitie of all things, of the barbarous people called Le-prus, which is to say, fruitfull: for Euphrates and Araxis there running out of two diuers and contrarie marshes, with many armes, water and enrich that champain and dry countrey. Selymus hauing made so great a journy, and yet not able so much as by report, to vnderstand what was become of Hysmael his so great and populous army, which he knew was but a little before departed out of Capadocia; as a man in doubt and halfe afraid, stayed and incamped his armie at the head of the riuer Euphrates, and from thence sent out his scouts euery way, if happily they could intercept some which might giue him knowledge of his enemies. But the Armenians, whether it were for feare of the comming of the Turks, or that Hysmael their king had so commanded, were all before fled out of that part of the countrey whereby Selymus was to H passe with his army; and hauing forsaken their houses, had carried away with them, or else by fire destroyed whatsoeuer might serue for the vse of man.

Selymus sendeth out his Scouts, who do returne with bad news.

The Turkish scouts after they had by the space of two dayes scoured vp and downe the countrie, returned back again to Selymus, not hauing taken so much any as one man; shewing vnto him, That all things were destroyed before him, and nothing left but wilde fields and a most desolate country, without any appearance of man or beast: and that they were of opinion, that either the Armenian guides were deceiued in the way, or else had of purpose brought them into such desart places, whereas wanting pasture for their horses, and food for men, they must needs together perish with hunger. Which their present feare was greatly increased by the weake kings whom they had left behind them at their backs; but especially Aladeules, who I either for shame or feare had a few dayes at the first holpen the Turks with victuals, but after they were farther entred into Armenia, performed nothing of that he had before most faithfully promised: seeking therein the fauor of Hysmael, who he thought would with the same good fortune vanquish the Turks, that he had not long before the greatest part of the East, Se- lymus perplexed in mind, began now to suspect treason, to feare famin, to dread the desarts and forsaken places, and with griefe of minde to call to remembrance all that old Chendemus his faithfull counsellour had before most truly told him: for all that, he shewed himselfe vnto his soldiers with cheerefull countenance, as a man nothing dismaied: which his firme constancie seemed to promise vnto their discouraged minds good successe, with speedie victorie. Wherfore calling vnto him his guides, and such as best knew the countrey; and vnderstanding by K them, that on the right hand beyond the mountaine Periardo lay the most fruitfull countrey of all Armenia, he rose with his army, and compassing the hil toward the North, turned down toward the riuer Araxes, and aboue the citie of Coy passed his armie ouer the riuer, his footmen by little bridges, and his horsemen by foords: for Araxes, vntill it haue receiued such riuers as fall into it out of the marshes of Periardo, runneth but with a small streame, and is in some place easie to be passed ouer.

Selymus had scarcely well got ouer the riuer, and incamped his great armie, when Vsta-Ogli (who hauing joined his forces with Amurat, lying incamped not far off, and fearing lest the ci-tie of Coy and the vnprouided citisens should by the sudden comming of the enemie be oppressed) quickely rose with his armie, and set forwards to meet the Turkes: for that citie of all others in that country, for fresh fountains and riuers, most pleasant (wherein the Persian Kings for the great plentie of all manner of fruit, and wholsomenesse of the aire, leauing Tauris, were woont to spend most part of the Summer) had then in it many rich citisens & sumptuous buildings; which Vasta Ogli thought good betimes to rescue, and not with dishonour to lose that rich citie, looking as it were vpon it, and leauing it vnto the enemie, to suffer him there to refresh his hunger-starued soldiers with plentie of all things. Cassius an Armenian borne, and present in those wars, did by many probabilities (as Iouius writeth) shew vnto him, That this citie of Coy was in antient time that most famous citie which was called Artaxata, which De- mitius Corbulo destroyed. Neither did Hysmael himselfe (although he had but a little before M sent the greatest part of his forces against the Coraxeni, who were then risen vp against him in rebellion; as he that made no great reckoning of the Turks, or euer thought that they durst haue come so far into Armenia) make any delay, but forthwith as soone as he had heard of the comming of Selymus, came also in person himselfe vnto his armie.

By chance Vsta-Ogli (who contrary to all mens expectation had vntill then shunned to fight, or

A or come in sight of his enemies, of purpose with lesse danger and losse of men to ouerthrow them afterwards, being sore weakned and almost spent with long trauell and want of victuals) lay then incamped neere the citie, when as the Turkes scouts, vpon the comming of Hysmael, perceiued by the great rising of the dust, and by the neighing of the Persian horses, that some greater power was at hand. Which so soone as it was noysed in the Turkish campe, they began to reioyce exceedingly, and to conceiue the first hope both of their safetie and victorie;
glad, that now meeting with their enemies, they should either by victorie turne their labour, toyle, famine, and extremities wherewith they had of long time striuen, into ease and plentie of all things, or else by honorable death end all their miseries at once: for many of the horsemen, especially of them that came out of Europe, whose horses were starued for want of for-
B rage, and the common footmen spent with long trauell, and grieuously troubled with the flix, (who trauelling in the extreame heat of the Sun, had for most part liued vpon crabs and other wild fruits, with a bad supping made of meale and vinegre, and almost despairing to get the sight of their enemies) began now to die in euery corner.

Hysmael sends an herauld to Selymus.

Hysmael as soone as he was come within sight of his enemies, reposing great confidence as well in the valor of his soldiers, as in his own rare fortune, the more to terrifie them, thought it good forthwith to giue them battell: whereupon he sent an herauld vnto Selymus, accompanied with certain skilfull soldiers, which should in best sort they could take view of the number and force of their enemies, of their artillerie, and in what sort they lay incamped: and to tell him, That forasmuch as he had no title vnto Armenia, nor that the Turks had at any time C claimed any interest therein, he could not but maruell, why he had against all right entred with his armie into his dominion: but if he happely vpon a vaine presumption, to the imitation of Alexander of Macedon, should thinke so much of the world his own, as he could by the sword and his own good fortune win, he should then make himselfe readie against the next day to make proofe of his fortune, and the forces of others not inferior to his owne.

Selymus his answer vnto Hysmael.

Whereunto Selymus answered, That the fresh remembrance of the manifold iniuries done to the Turks by the Persians, was such, as might giue him just cause to take vp armes: for as much as long ago both his grandfather Mahomet the Great, and his vncle Cassumes, and euen of late his father Baiazet, and he himselfe also in his wars against his brother Achomates, had re-ceiued great wrong and dishonor from the Persians. All which things, although they were of D themselues important, yet he esteemed not of them as sufficient causes of warre, but onely sought after his enemy Amurat, his brothers son, who had of late spoyled Capadocia: whom if he would quietly and friendly deliuer vnto him, as the mutuall lawes of amitie and friendship amongst Princes for the maintenance and preseruation of their estates and kingdomes required, then he would withdraw his forces, and peaceably returne into his kingdome: otherwise, he threatned with fire and sword to destroy, not the frontiers of Armenia, but euen the heart of Persia. And so dismissing the herauld, both the armies for that day lay still in their trenches, expecting the dreadfull euent of battell.

The order of Selymus his battell.

The next day Selymus by persuasion of his captaines brought his armie into the open field, and in order of battel set forward against his enemies, which lay about two miles off, thinking E that Hysmael, a prince of so great name, would without delay accept of battel: yet what strength the Persian king was of, what number of men he had, what manner of horsemen, how armed, and with what weapons, he could not certainly learne: for beside that the Persians are by nature ingenious and subtill, the soldiers generally so reuerenced and loued Hysmael their king, that no one was found to haue gone from him to the Turke: whereas many reuolted from Se- lymus to him, as it was afterwards learned of the Persian captaines.

Selymus, who had at that time 80000 horsemen vnder his ensignes, placed Chasan Bassa his lieutenant generall of Europe, with his European horsemen in the right wing; and Sinan Bassa with his Asian horsemen in the left: and before them both the Acanzij, which are voluntary horsemen the forerunners of the Turks armie, who in hope of spoile follow the Turks wars
F out of all countries: in the middle battel he placed the Asapi or common soldiers, which base and half-naked people, as men of little worth or estimation, are commonly thrust into the front of the Turks battels, to receiue the first furie of the enemie, and to blunt their swords, more than for any other good seruice: directly behind them he [illegible] his gr[illegible]erie, guarded with 4000 horsemen: last of all followed himselfe with [illegible] and rebellion; as he that made no great reckoning of the Turks, or euer thought that they durst haue come so far into Armenia) make any delay, but forthwith as soone as he had heard of the comming of Selymus, came also in person himselfe vnto his armie.

By chance Vsta-Ogli (who contrary to all mens expectation had vntill then shunned to fight, or

A or come in sight of his enemies, of purpose with lesse danger and losse of men to ouerthrow them afterwards, being sore weaked and almost spent with long trauell and want of victuals) lay then incamped neere the citie, when as the Turkes scouts, vpon the comming of Hysmael, perceiued by the great rising of the dust, and by the neighing of the Persian horses, that some greater power was at hand. Which so soone as it was noysed in the Turkish campe, they began to reioyce exceedingly, and to conceiue the first hope both of their safetie and victorie;
glad, that now meeting with their enemies, they should either by victorie turne their labour, toyle, famine, and extremities wherewith they had of long time striuen, into ease and plentie
of all things, or else by honorable death end all their miseries at once: for many of the horsemen, especially of them that came out of Europe, whose horses were starued for want of for-
B rage, and the common footmen spent with long trauell, and grieuously troubled with the flix, (who trauelling in the extreame heat of the Sun, had for most part liued vpon crabs and other wild fruits, with a bad supping made of meale and vinegre, and almost despairing to get the sight of their enemies) began now to die in euery corner.

Hysmael sends an herauld to Selymus.

Hysmael as soone as he was come within sight of his enemies, reposing great confidence as well in the valor of his soldiers, as in his own rare fortune, the more to terrifie them, thought it good forthwith to giue them battell: whereupon he sent an herauld vnto Selymus, accompanied with certain skilfull soldiers, which should in best sort they could take view of the number and force of their enemies, of their artillerie, and in what sort they lay incamped: and to tell him, That forasmuch as he had no title vnto Armenia, nor that the Turks had at any time C claimed any interest therein, he could not but maruell, why he had against all right entred with his armie into his dominion: but if he happely vpon a vaine presumption, to the imitation of Alexander of Macedon, should thinke so much of the world his own, as he could by the sword and his own good fortune win, he should then make himselfe readie against the next day to make proofe of his fortune, and the forces of others not inferior to his owne.

Selymus his answer vnto Hysmael.

Whereunto Selymus answered, That the fresh remembrance of the manifold iniuries done to the Turks by the Persians, was such, as might giue him just cause to take vp armes: for as much as long ago both his grandfather Mahomes the Great, and his vncle Cassumes, and euen of late his father Baiazet, and he himselfe also in his wars against his brother Achomates, had re-ceiued great wrong and dishonor from the Persians. All which things, although they were of D themselues important, yet he esteemed not of them as sufficient causes of warre, but onely sought after his enemy Amurat, his brothers son, who had of late spoyled Capadocia: whom
if he would quietly and friendly deliuer vnto him, as the mutuall lawes of amitie and friendship amongst Princes for the maintenance and preseruation of their estates and kingdomes required, then he would withdraw his forces, and peaceably returne into his kingdome: otherwise, he threatned with fire and sword to destroy, not the frontiers of Armenia, but euen the
trenches, expecting the dreadfull euent of battell.

The order of Selymus his battell.

and in order of battel set forward against his enemies, which lay about two miles off, thinking
E that Hysmael, a prince of so great name, would without delay accept of battel: yet what strength
the Persian king was of, what number of men he had, what manner of horsemen, how armed,
and with what weapons, he could not certainly learne: for beside that the Persians are by nature ingenious and subtill, the soldiers generally so reuerenced and loued Hysmael their king, that no one was found to haue gone from him to the Turke: whereas many reuolted from Se-
lymus to him, as it was afterwards learned of the Persian captaines.

Selymus, who had at that time 80000 horsemen vnder his ensignes, placed Chasan Bassa his lieutenant general of Europe, with his European horsemen in the right wing; and Sinan Bassa with his Asian horsemen in the left: and before them both the Acanzij, which are voluntary horsemen the forerunners of the Turks armie, who in hope of spoile follow the Turks wars
F out of all countries: in the middle battel he placed the Asapi or common soldiers, which base and halfe naked people, as men of little worth or estimation, are commonly thrust into the front of the Turks battels, to receiue the first furie of the enemie, and to blunt their swords, more than for any other good seruice: directly behind them he bestowed his great artillerie, guarded with 4000 horsemen: last of all followed himselfe with his choisen pentioners and

On the contrarie part Hyſmael, who by the Turks fugitiues vnderſtood all the deuices of his courage and noble mindes of the Perſians, that contemning the huge multitude of their ene-their great artillerie,they doubted not with ſo few to giue them battell.

Hyſmael hauing giuen the ſignall of battell, came on with his armie, exhorting his ſoldiers then to remember the honour they had long before gotten in many battels,and couragiouſly to follow him their Soueraigne,whom they by their worthie ſeruice and many victories had K

On the other ſide,Selymus perceiuing the comming of his enemies by the riſing of the duſt, with naked men, whoſe weapons were but weake ſtaues and light targuets, and their horſes little poore jades almoſt dead with hunger, neuer able to abide the firſt charge of his valiant men at armes.

On the other ſide, Selymus perceiuing the comming of his enemies by the riſing of the duſt, cauſed knowledge to be giuen through his armie by his captaines and officers, that the time of battel which they had ſo long wiſhed for, was now come; wherein if they would worthily acquite themſelues againſt thoſe their proud enemies, they ſhould to their immortall fame extend the Turkiſh Empire from the Perſian ſea to the mountain Caucaſus: but if they cowardly forgetting their antient proweſſe, ſhould faint in time of battell, they were not then to thinke by any meanes to eſcape by flight backe againe through thoſe great plaines and deſolate countries; where they ſhould by the way either ſhamefully periſh, or elſe to their perpetuall infamie be taken priſoners, and as baſe ſlaues, during their liues be enforced to ſerue the Perſian women: foraſmuch as beſide the great diſtance of the place, both the great riuer Euphrates, and the huge mountaine Taurus, and the faithleſſe king Aladeules, who had ſhut vp all the paſſages, did cut off all hope from them, if they ſhould be ouercome, by any meanes poſſible to eſcape backe againe into Capadocia.

The great and mortall battell betweene Selymus and Hyſmael.

When Hyſmael was come neere with his armie, and the Aſapi vpon ſigne giuen diuiding themſelues, made place for the great artillerie to play; as was before appointed; he alſo properly diuiding his horſmen, charged the right wing of the Turks armie, with ſuch force, that after a moſt terrible fight betwixt the half armed Turks, and the valiant Perſian men at armes, M Chaſan Baſſa the great commander of the Europian horſmen, with the formoſt of that wing being ſlain, and many more after them, he inforced all that wing to retyre vnto that place where

A followers of that danger, as had Hyſmael, charged the Aſian horſemen in the left wing, and there in bloudie battell made great ſlaughter of the enemie, but not with like good hap as did Hyſmael: for whiles he moſt couragiouſly in the formoſt rankes aſſailed his enemies, he was wing, began afreſh to renew the battell, and valiantly to withſtand the Perſians; and with their harquebuſiers (wherwith the Perſian horſmen were wonderfully terrified) draue them headlong vpon the Turks common footmen. The Perſians whether it were forced by neceſſitie for that they had loſt ſo great a commander, and not wel able to gouerne their horſes terrified with the thundring ſhot, or elſe for that the open ſide of the footmen preſented vnto them B greater place of aduantage, ſerring themſelues together brake through the middle of the battell of thoſe Turkiſh footmen, and bearing them down before them with a mightie ſlaughter, came to the great ordnance and there ſlew the canoniers, who diſcharging their field pieces at all aduentures, in that great medly made a foule ſlaughter, as well of their owne men as of their enemies. And ſo without ſtop (as victorious conquerors) made way through the midſt of their enemies, vntill they came to the right wing: where Hyſmael was ſtill hardly charging the Europeian horſemen, who hauing before loſt Chaſan their Generall, and beeing many of them ſlaine or wounded, were already enforced to retire; but now charged afreſh vpon the ſide, had much adoe to endure the fury of their enemies, but as men in extreame danger, were glad to crie to Selymus for helpe.

C In this hard diſtreſſe, Selymus in two places opened his carriages, wherewith he ſtood as it were entrenched, and preſently ſent out part of his horſmen. And by and by turning himſelfe vnto his Ianizaries, ſaid, This daies victorie is reſerued (moſt worthie ſouldiers) vnto your valor and labor, wherefore now valiantly ſet forward, and as freſh and couragious men, aſſaile your wearied enemies; their horſes are all on a water with ſweat, and the men themſelues faint vnder the waight of their armor. But yet for all that Selymus could ſay, the Ianizaries were not very forward, but ſtood ſtill, as men willing in ſo great a danger to keepe themſelues within the ſafegard of their munition. Wherefore whileſt they at their leiſure ſet forward, the Perſians in the midſt of the heat of this victorie, compaſſing in the Europeian horſemen, ſlew them downeright. Selymus looking on and wiſhing in vain to help them. Fabritius Carrectus great Maſter of the Rhodes, D who of all theſe things had certaine intelligence, writ to Leo the tenth then Biſhop of Rome, that the Ianizaries refuſed to be commanded by Selymus, and were not by any perſuaſion or in-treatie to be induced to relieue the diſtreſſed Europeian horſemen, but as men diſtruſting the euent of the battell, choſe rather in their ſtrength to expect the ſucceſſe therof, than with moſt manifeſt danger to expoſe themſelues vnto the violence of the Perſian horſemen, which had as a tempeſt ouerborne the vantgard of the Turkiſh footmen.

The Perſians were now ready on euery ſide to haue aſſailed Selymus in his greateſt ſtrength: when Sinan Baſſa, although the wing he led was ſore rent and weakned, yet following the Per-ſians through the midſt of the heaps of the ſlaine footmen, came in, in good time for Selymus, and with certain freſh troups which had eſcaped the fury of Vſta Ogli, reſtored the battell be-E fore almoſt loſt: but eſpecially by the inuincible courage of Alis-Beg and Mahomet his bro-

Turks is accounted next vnto the Othomans; both of them for courage reſembling their warlike father Malcozzius, famous for that wofull expedition he made into Friuli againſt the Venetians in the raigne of Baiazet. Selymus alſo not yet diſcouraged but ſtil in hope, commanded all the great ordnance wherewith he was enuironed, which he had reſerued as his laſt refuge, to be diſcharged: by the violence whereof, ſuch ſlaughter was made, as well of his owne men as of his enemies, mingled together, that what for duſt, what for ſmoake, and thundring of the artillerie, hauing on both ſides almoſt loſt the vſe of ſight and hearing, and their horſes being

F led, the battell was broken off, the victory yet doubtfull. The Turkiſh hiſtories to expreſſe the terror of this day, number it amongſt their diſmall daies, terming it The onely day of doome.

Hyſmael in this furious battell, hauing receiued a wound vnder his left ſhoulder with a ſmall ſhot, by perſuaſion of his friends withdrew himſelfe to haue his wound ſearched: which thing vndoubtedly was the ſafegard both of Selymus and his army: for the Perſians by & by folowing

ing their king, left the victory, now in all mens opinion almost gotten. But after that Hyf- G mael perceiued the wound was not deepe, for that the strengh of his armor had so broken the force of the shot, that it pierced not farre into his bodie, hee was about to haue charged the Turks afresh: but vnderstanding of the death of Vsta-Ogli, in whom for his singular experience in martial affaires, he had repoled his greatest confidence; and his captains also persuading him not to make so light reckoning of his wound, the griefe whereof he yet felt not, being warme, but to haue regard to his owne health: he in seemly order softly marched away in such sort, that his departure had no resemblance of flight. And passing by the citie of Tauris, willed the chiefe of the citizens to open the gates of the citie to Selymus (if he should come thither) and to receiue his garrisons, rather than by vaine constancie to fall into vtter destruction: and so marched himselfe into the confines of Media.

The Persian tents taken by the Turkes. But the Turks intangled with many difficulties, hauing no hearts for feare, nor strength for wearinesse to pursue their enemies, yet comming to the Persian tents, tooke them without resistance: where beside the rich pauillions wrought with needle worke of silke and gold, and much other pretious furniture, many noble ladies and gentlewomen were found, which after the manner of the Persians had followed their husbands in those wars; whom Selymus caused to be all freely set at libertie vntouched, excepting one of the wiues of Hysmael whom he detained and gaue her in marriage to one of his Bassaes. Some which were present at this battell, reported that amongst the heapes of them that were slaine, were found the dead bodies of diuers Persian women, which being armed, & following their husbands, died with them in the battell; whom Selymus caused to be honestly buried.

Thus was that notable battel fought in the Galderan fields neere vnto the citie of Coy, betwixt these two great princes, the seuenth day of August in the yeare of our Lord, 1514. In which battell Selymus lost aboue thirtie thousand men, amongst whom was Chasan Bassa his great lieutenant in Europe, seuen Sanzackes, in which were the two Malcozzian brethren, who labouring the one to rescue the other, were both together slaine. Beside his common footmen of whom he made least reckoning, he lost most part of his Illirian, Macedonian, Seruian, Epirot, Thessalian, and Thracian horsmen, the vndoubted flower and strength of his army, which were in that mortall battell almost all slaine, or grieuously wounded.

Selymus for all this great losse, by the confession of his enemies hauing gotten the victorie, and receiuing Embassadors from Coy and the cities thereabout, and the great citie of Tauris, K promising to relieue him with whatsoeuer he needed, and to do what els he should command: marched directly to Tauris, desiring both to see and possesse himselfe of that citie, as one of the chiefe pallaces of the Persian kings. This citie is two dayes iourney distant from Coy where the battell was fought, & is verily thought to be the famous city called in antient time Ecbathana, about an hundred and fiftie miles distant from the Caspian sea. The citizens were readie at the comming of the Turks, and brought them great store of victuals out of the gates of the citie, where Selymus had lodged his armie in the suburbs, thinking it no safetie to lodge within that great and populous citie, contenting himselfe to haue the gates thereof deliuered vnto him, which he kept with strong guard. Some report that Selymus durst not trust the Persians, and therefore neuer went into the citie but disguised in the habit of a common souldier. L Yet some others say, that he did with great magnificence banquet in the stately pallace of the Persian king, and there had great discourse with them of Tauris concerning his late victorie. But whilest he thus staied at Tauris, and with himselfe purposed to spend that winter in Armenia, he called together his great captains and commanders of his armie, to know how they liked thereof: who fearing his displeasure, wholly referred themselues to his own resolution. Only Mustapha his chiefe Bassa chanced to say, That it were good that the minds of the Ianizaries and the other souldiers of the court should therin be known. Which his speech, Selymus tooke in such euill part, that he presently commanded him out of his sight, and depriued him of his greatest honor: and the more to disgrace him, sent one of his iesters after him, who in great scorne and derision comming behind him, cut off part of his tulipant that hung down as M the fashion was. But the Ianizaries vnderstanding the matter, and much offended with the in-

A were resolutely set downe to forsake him if he would needs stay, and not with speed returne. Selymus much troubled with this insolencie of the Ianizaries, and hearing dayly, that Hysmael with new supplies out of Iberia, Albania, and Parthia, was comming vpon him with greater power than before, and considering withall, with what difficulty and danger he had escaped in the late battell, preserued rather by his good fortune and force of his great artillerie, than the valour and prowesse of his souldiers, and withall suspecting the multitude and strength of the Taurisians, of whose fidelitie he could make no reckoning, he changed his former determination, and resolued againe to returne into Capadocia: whereupon hauing contrarie to his promise exacted a great masse of money from them of Tauris, he departed thence, carrying away with him three thousand families, the best artificers in that citie, especially such as were skil-
B full in making of armour and weapons, and so with speed retired towards the riuer Euphrates, a longer way than that whereby he came: fearing to returne againe by the head of Araxis and the mountains Periardes, for meeting the Iberian and Albanian horsmen, who were reported to be then comming against him.

Hysmael vnderstanding of his departure, followed after with as much speed as he could, leauing behind him for hast his carriages and such of his souldiers as were not able to indure so long and speedie a march: yet for all his hast (forsomuch as Selymus was gone a great way before him) he could not ouertake any part of his army, vntil he was come to the great riuer Euphrates; where Selymus staying two daies, and hauing made diuers little boats, was passing ouer his footmen: which because they were not sufficient for the speedie transportation of so
C great a multitude, many for hast swam ouer the riuer with bladders, & some aduentured to get ouer vpon the broken peeces of their carriages, which they had for that purpose burst in sunder. Selymus himself got ouer to the farther bank in a little boat, hauing before caused his horsmen with their horses at once to take the riuer, of purpose to break the violence of the stream, whereby his footmen & cammels with their burdens got ouer with lesse danger, and some of his field pieces were also with lesse difficulty transported: yet for all the speed he could make, Selymus in passing the riuer Euphrates, receiueth great losse.
the Georgian horsemen, the forerunners of Hysmael his army, being come within sight before D the Turks were all got ouer, raised such a feare and a stir all alongst that side of the riuer, that two thousand of the Turks were in their hasty passage there drowned, diuers field pieces left stic king in the mud, & much of their baggage carried away with the force of the riuer. The Georgians contenting themselues with such things as were left, pursued them no further: for the wheeles of the Turkes carriages entangled together with the violence of the streame, had staied a great part of the Turkish traih, floating in the riuer: and much more was in diuers places driuen vpon the shore, all which the Georgian horsemen easily drew out. Hysmael in the mean time reioicing at nothing more, than that hauing chased away his enemies, he had also recouered much of the great ordnance wherby he had before receiued so great hurt.

Selymus by speedie flight thus got out of the hands of the Persians, found his passing much more dangerous at the mountain Antitaurus, than he had before thought on: for Aladeules, the mountain king hauing now his fortune in contempt, and diligently waiting for his prey, had E with his sauage people before taken all the strait passiges of the mountain country; who euery night in theeuish manner assailed the Turks, as they with their weake and wearie companies passed through those rough and broken waies: and robbing their carriages, presently fled into their haunts and places of refuge in the thicke woods and rockie mountaines. Aladeules himselfe in the mean time (by whose fraud all this was done) euery day excusing himselfe, as if it had bin done against his will, by the rude mountaine people, enured to such desperat robberies, whom neuertheless he said hee would in short time seuerely chastise so soone as hee could find the authors thereof. In the meane while, for fashion sake sending a little spare prouision for certaine dayes, did euery night rob and spoile the Turkes by his souldiers, as they could take them in places of aduantage. Against which mischiefes Selymus could neither by F policie, neither his souldiers by industrie prouide any sufficient remedie. Wherefore dissembling the iniuries he daily receiued, purposing to be thereof in time reuenged, together with the foule & trecherous dealing of the faithlesse king, holding on his way, he with much adoo came at length to Trapezond, and from thence to Amasia, where he spent that winter in repairing his sore weakned army, purposing with the first of the Spring to make war vpon A- Selymus commeth to Amasia.
ladeules & the mountaine people, who in his returne had done him so great harm and iniurie.

In

blemish of infamie than the headines of punishment: so that it was not to be maruelled, if Hysmael by such honorable vertues did mightily defend the glorie of his maiesty and renowne. Vnto these his rare vertues, was also ioined a comlinesse of face (the fairest gift of nature) wel beseeming so great a monarch: for he was well colored, quicke eyed, yellow bearded, & that which amongst the Persians is accounted the signe of antient nobilitie, hooke noted; and was withall exceeding eloquent: by which good gifts, he wonderfully won to himselfe both the eies and hearts of such as beheld him. But in Selymus, his stern countenance, his fierce and piercing eies, his Tartar-like pale color, his long mustacho's on his vpperlip, like bristles, trild back to his neck, with his beard cut close to his chin, did so expresse his martial disposition & inexorable nature, that he seemed to the beholders, to haue nothing in him but mischiefe & cruelty. Which diuersitie of countenances was also accompanied with no lesse diuersity of affections, and so consequently with farre vnlike manner of gouernment. For Hysmael was of nature courteous and affable, easie to be seen and spoken withall, doing nothing that beseemed his regall function, but in the sight of all men: his maner was to dine openly in the companie of his nobility, delighting much in hauking and hunting, accompanied with his noble men and the Embassadors of forraine princes. He would oftentimes run, leape, and proue masteries with his chiefe courtiers, being himselfe a most excellent horsman & cunning archer: in his exercises he was so popular, that he would not stick openly to bathe himself & swim in his princely bathes: his wiues, the beautifull daughters of his nobility or neighbor princes, ladies of great chastitie, he neither loathed nor diuorced, after the antient manner of the Persian kings, who alwaies vsed most tenderly to loue and cherish their wiues, doing them all the honor possible in court, as partakers of all their fortune; and carried them, their children, nurses, & richest furniture into their farthest warres, to their great trouble and charge, by the presence of so deere pledges the more to encourage their minds in time of battell. Whereas Selymus contrariwise did al things in secret, eating his meat alone without any company, attended vpon with his pages and eunuches only, and satisfying natures want with some one simple dish of meat: he seldome went abroad but to the church, vpon the friday the Turks chiefe Saboth; and then so beset with his pentioners and other souldiers of the court, that although he vsed to ride alone mounted vpon some couragious horse, yet was it a hard matter by face to know him among so many armed men; who with great pride and insolencie kept backe the beholders: hee was seldome seen abroad in the city, chusing rather for his recreation to passe ouer in his gally into Asia, and there alongst the sea coast to take the aire: his wiues he would not suffer to come to court, neither vsed their companie but for procreation sake, and that (as was thought) without any great good countenance or familiarity; for that he being not greatly giuen to women, but more delighted with vnnaturall pleasure, thought a mans bodie and mind to be not a little weakned with the allurements of women: wherefore he seldome resorted to the cloister of choice paragons in the middest of Constantinople, shut in on euery side with high and blind wals. Those dainty pieces, either taken from their Christian parents, or by chance surprised by pirats, are there most curiously kept by antient matrons and old eunuches, by whom they are with all diligence instructed in the principles of the Mahometan law, and to read the Arabian tongue, and withall, cunningly and comely to sing, play, daunce, and sow: but Selymus of all others vsed seldomest to see their allurements, as a man not greatly delighted with women, or desirous of many (and oftentimes vnfortunat) children, hauing but one son (Solyman) by the daughter of Mahamet a Tartar king, who afterwards by the sufferance of God, proued a great plague to the Christian commonweale. Such spare time as he had from his serious & waighty affaires, he vsed to spend in walking in his gardens with some of his Bassaes or other great courtiers, & in beholding & noting the noblemens children there sporting themselues, would discourse & consult of many things of great importance. Some houres he would spend in the bathes, and in reading the histories of his ancestors & other forraine princes: imitating therein his grandfather Mahomet the Great, who caused almost all the histories of the famous princes of the world to be translated into the Turkish language, & their liuely counterfeits to be with cunning hand drawn, that by their worthy examples he might be the more inflamed to extend his fame and glory. He would many times scoffe at the great busines of his father Baiazet, who (as he said) was so drowned in the studie of Auerrois (determining nothing certainely of the nature of the soule) and the motions of the heauens, that he desired rather the name of a sharpe disputer, disputer amongst the idle professors of Philosophie, than of a renowned chiefetaine amongst his valiant souldiers and men of war.

One of the Persian embassadors finding him pleasantly disposed, demanded of him, why he did not weare his beard long, as his father Baiazet, and other great princes of that age had don, therby to seeme vnto their subiects of greater maiestie: to whom he answered, That he liked not to carrie about with him such an vnnecessarie handful, whereby his Bassaes might at their pleasure lead him vp and down the court, as they had done his father: noting therby, that Baiazet whilest he yet liued, had bin too much ouerruled by the Bassaes; which he could by no means indure, following no mans aduise but his owne in whatsoeuer he tooke in hand.

But to come vnto the Persians themselues, they in their warres had great disaduantage of the Turks: for as they were strong in horsmen, so were they destitute of expert trained foormen, by whose only meanes the Turks haue atchieued their greatest victories, and performed their greatest wars. Beside this, it was a great want in the Persians, that they had not the vse of guns, against whose fury no sufficient resistance can be made, or force of man opposed: as appeared by the lamentable example of Vsun-Cassanes at Artenga, & now of Hysmael in the Caldean fields, whose victorious armies of horsmen were in both places put to the worse by the terror and violence of the Turks artillerie. For the naked Turkish horseman is not to be compared with the Persian man at armes; who comes into the field armed with a strong cuiras, a sure head-piece, and a good targuet: whereas the Turkish Europeian horsemen, altogether naked, vse only a square or crooked buckler, wherewith they do scarcely couer themselues: and the Asian horsemen, bucklers made of soft reeds, wound round, and couered with some kind of silke. The Persian horsemen also, wearing their pouldrons and gauntlets, and bearing staues of good ash, armed at both ends, fight with them as occasion serueth at the halfe staffe, after the maner of the Numidians, and with doubling and redoubling their often thrusts from on high, doe easily wound or kill the vnarmed Turks, with their horses: whereas the Turkish horsemen, after the manner of the Grecians, couching their staues in their rests, do at the first course most commonly breake the same, being made of light and brittle firre, and so presently come to their scimitars, or horsemans maces, being in all other things far inferior to the Persian man at armes. As for the Turkish archers on horseback, they are in no respect to be compared with the Persians, who well mounted and surely armed, and vsing both greater & stronger bowes, shoot more deadly arrows, & so make small account of the Turks. So that all things well considered, the Persian armie, deuoted to their king, as well for the great and firme opinion conceiued of his high courage and diuine spirit, as for that they were to him by faith obliged, although it was in number far inferior, yet had it bin of the Turkes inuincible, if it had not bin ouerwhelmed by the cruell, cowardly, and murthering artillerie, and wonderfull multitude of men. The cause why Hysmael out of so many great & large prouinces then vnder his obeisance (able in antient times with their multitude to couer the face of the earth, & to drink the riuers drie) brought now so small an army against the Turkish Emperor, breaking into the heart of Armenia; was, for that Hysmael to win the hearts of the people by bounty, had remitted a great part of his customs and tributes, so as then stood best with his policie, hauing but lately aspired to the kingdome, and thrust downe his neere kinsmen, the posterity of Vsun-Cassan and Iacup, the right full inheritors thereof: so that his coffers being emptie, & wanting money, the sinews of war, he was not able to raise so great an army as otherwise he might out of those populous kingdoms & countries, yeelding plentifully all things necessarie for mans vse. Whereas with Selymus it was far otherwise: whose horsemen, footmen, captaines, canoniers, both at sea and land, officers of peace and wars, receiued their daily wages and monthly paies in readie money, of his treasurers and paymasters: for defraying of which charge he neuer wanted coyne, hauing an inestimable masse of money alwaies in store in the seuen towers at Constantinople: and his yerely tributes and reuenewes still exceeding all his charges by a fourth part. The strength of the Persian king consisted in three kind of soldiers: the first were they which were accounted souldiers of the court: the second, such as were by custome and dutie bound to serue him in his wars: and the third, such as were sent to him from the princes his neighbors and confederats. Those which were accounted souldiers of his court, had their certain stipends, and were altogether maintained of the kings charge; of whom, according to the old custome of the Persian kings, they at certaine times receiue armor, horses, apparell, tents, and wages, euery one as he is in place and degree. And being attended vpon with a gallant and strong garrison of these, he maintaineth the maiesty of his court, especially when he rideth in prograce. The nobilitie and antient gentlemen of his country, who hold lands and possessions discended vnto them from their ancestours, or holden by the gift of the king, are sent for in time of wars, and are of dutie bound to performe such like seruice as the nobilitie and gentlemen of Italie, France, and Spaine do vnto their soueraignes: these hardly amount to the number of twentie thousand, wherof it is well if the third part come well armed; the rest content themselues with head-pieces and iacks, and vse for their weapons either horsemens staues or bowes, which they can most cunningly handle, discharding their arrows very neere vnto that they aime at, either forward or backward. They which come vnto him from forrein princes, confederat or tributary, are commonly sent from the kings and princes of Iberia, Albania, and the countries bordering vpon Media, and Armenia; who being halfe Christians, beare a mortall hatred against the Turkes. Hysmael the Persian king had then vnder his dominion these great and famous countries, Armenia the greater, Sulthania, Persia, Assyria, Mesopotamia, Media and Partia: whereof Armenia is the chiefest, famous for the great citie Tauris, called in antient time Ecbathana: this countrey yeeldeth vnto the Persian king his best footmen; but his choice horsemen come from out of Persia, and especially from Scyras, called of old Cyripolis: next vnto them are from Assyria; the chiefe citie whereof is Bagadat, called in antient time Babylon. The Medes and Parthians are of all others accounted the best archers next vnto the Scythians.

1515 But now to returne againe from whence we haue a little too farre strayed. Selymus after his great expedition against Hysmael, wintering at Amasia, by his lieutenants and captaines in Europe and Asia, raised such a power, that with the first of the Spring he entered again into the confines of the Persian kingdome, with a greater army than before, and that somewhat sooner than the extreame cold of that parr of Armenia (subiect to the snowie mountaine Taurus) would either well suffer, or that the enemie thought it had beene possible for him to haue so done. There was vpon the further side of the riuer Euphrates a strong towne called Clamassum, scituate a little aboue that place where the riuer Melas (much celebrated by the Grecian Poets) falleth into the riuer Euphrates; which towne for the commodious scituation therof, standing vpon the first entrance of the passage into Armenia the great, the Persians had furnished with a strong garrison: this towne Selymus thought good in any case to be master of, by taking whereof, and of some other holds thereabout, he should open a faire way for himselfe into his enemies countrey. Hysmael at the same time was gone with all his power against the Hyrcanians, Bactrians, and other sauage people dwelling neere vnto the Caspian sea, then vp in arms against him: which wished opportunitie Selymus taking, and making a bridge ouer the riuer Euphrates, passed ouer with his armie, came before the towne, and laid hard siege to the same before his enemies were well aware of his comming. The Turkes at their first approch compassing the citie round with their huge multitude of harquebusiers and archers, draue the defendants from the wals; and still without rest or intermission bringing on fresh men, as Selymus had before taken order, and others at the same time breaking open the gates, and in diuers places scaling the wals, enforced the defendants to forsake their standings, and to retire themselues into the market place; where although they were before sore spent with labor & wounds, yet did they there with wonderfull courage a great while notably withstand the multitude of their enemies still swarming in, and in defence of their countrie, like resolute men, fought it out vnto the last man.

Selymus with a new armie entreth into Armenia.

Selymus hauing taken and ransacked Clamassum, with two other small castles which the defendants had for feare before abandoned, although he was with a deadly hatred & ambitious desire prickt forward against Hysmael, and thirsted after nothing more than the subuersion of the Persian kingdome: yet he thought it not good further to enter into Armenia, before hee had out of those forrests and mountains chased the mountain king Aladeules, who but the yere before had most trecherously done him and his armie so many iniuries in his return from the Persian expedition. For Aladeules not without cause fearing his owne estate, as soone as he vnderstood that Selymus had againe taken the field, and that he was come to the riuer Euphrates, and so to Clamassum, speedily assembling his forces, had in short time raised a great armie for the defence of himselfe and his Kingdome: purposing that if Selymus should goe farther into into Armenia, then after his wonted maner to looke on as a beholder, and by the euent of the war, to take occasion of prey, and by shutting vp the passages of his country, at his pleasure to rob and spoile the Turkes in their returne. Wherefore Selymus leauing a garrison at Clamassum, retired backe againe ouer the riuer Euphrates vnto the mountaine Anritaurus, where it was reported that his enemies lay.

This Aladeules (as is aforesaid) ruled ouer the rude and sauage mountaine people, inhabiting the great mountaines Taurus and Anritaurus: which mountaines as it were linked together one to another, run from the mountains called Scodristi, and the borders of Capadocia, with a perpetuall rising, through many large prouinces and countries vnto the great mountain Amanus, and vttermost bounds of Cilicia. The people of this countrey were by nature fierce and warlike, more famous for nothing than for the warr of all things; who as men dwelling in a rough and bare countrey, could little or nothing profit by husbandrie: yet in such places as would beare any pasture, they had their breed of horses and camels, and did with all diligence vse grasing; but the greatest part of their liuing consisted in hunting & stealing. These are supposed to haue had their beginning from the Galatians, Capadocians, Armenians, and the old inhabitants of Asia the lesse, which by long and continuall wars in former ages, and especially by the lamentable irruption of the Scithians, were inforced to forsake their cities and dwellings, and for safegard of their liues to flie into those rough and desolat mountains. These distressed people searching euery hill and euery dale, and following the opportunitie of the riuers and fountaines, but especially the mildest temperature of the aire, and fauorable aspect of the Sun, built in many places poore country villages, and afterwards diuers faire townes: where in processe of time they growing to better estate, there rise vp some amongst them, which ouerruling the rest, ambitiously tooke vpon them the name of kings, desiring to be had in regard, and to bee feared of their neighbours, although they commanded but ouer rough woods and ragged rockes. Neere vnto the confines of Aladeules kingdome is the citie Orpha, which many suppose to haue bin the famous citie Edessa, because that as yet there remaineth certaine monuments of Baldwin in latine letters, who after his brother Godfrey was possessed of Ierusalem, is reported to haue taken Edessa, and there raigned. Not far from thence is also the antient citie Amyda, which at this day is called Caramrdi, ioyning vpon Mesopotamia: which countrey lying betweene the two great riuers Euphrates and Tygris, is now called Diarbecha. The chiefe citie of Aladeules kingdome was Maras, so called as may be thought of the faire riuer Marsias running through it out of the mountaine Cælene, taking the name of Marsias, ouercome by Apollo, and made famous by the verses of many learned Poets. But Aladeules, after he saw that Selymus with his armie was entered into the frontiers of his kingdom, and drawing neere vnto him, brought downe all his horsemen, in number about fifteene thousand, from the mountains into a faire large valley; commanding his footmen, whereof he had great store, to keepe the mountaines on the right hand and the left: where hauing the high rockie mountaines and strait passages much for his aduantage, hee determined in that place which he had long before chosen and fortified, to expect the comming of his enemies. Selymus considering the disaduantage of the place, although he perceiued the victorie could not without great losse of his men be obtained; and before persuaded that his enemies would neuer haue willingly bin drawne to battell: yet made no doubt to aduenture his fortune, presuming vpon the multitude and strength of his armie. Wherefore he commanded Sinan Bassa the Eunuch (whom he had made generall of the Europeian horsemen in stead of Chasan Bassa before slaine) with a square battell to charge the enemie afront, forasmuch as the place would not suffer him to range his battell in length, nor to vse any wings: and hee himselfe with his Ianizaries and Asian horsemen followed after in the rereward. Neither were the souldiers of Aladeules vnmindfull of themselues or of their king, who valiantly fought in the head of the battell, but hauing spent their arrowes, did couragiously receiue the furious assault of the Turkes: and standing close to them, still keeping the aduantage of the ground, did with such force repulse them, that the old beaten souldiers of the Turks, seemed little or nothing to preuaile either with their multitude or valor: for the Turks by reason of the straightnesse of the place, could not inclose them on either side, and were beside grieuously wounded by Aladeules footmen, who standing vpon the sides of the hils with their darts and arrowes from aboue, ouerwhelmed the Turks in the vally. When Selymus saw that Aladeules, contrary to his expectation made ſtrong reſiſtance, and valiantly withſtood his forces; he drew certaine companies of harquebuſiers out of his owne ſquadrons, and ſent them to relieue their fellowes: and at the ſame inſtant commanded the Ianizaries to all the danger to mount the hill. Then the mountain people terrified with the ſtrangenes of the ſhot, and not able to abide the force therof, by and by turned their backs, and by knowne waies fled into their ſure haunts, in the mountains & woods faſt by: yet the greateſt ſlaughter fell amongſt theſe footmen, who when they ſaw the horſmen put to flight, & the Ianizaries comming vp the hils againſt them, did with much difficultie, by ſteepe and broken waies clamber vp the high mountains: as oftentimes it falleth out, that both the ſtrength of mens legs and other their wonted forces faile them moſt, when ſurpriſed and ouercome with ſudden feare, they deſire to run, & flie faſteſt. The Turks hauing them in chaſe, had the killing of them vntill the going down of the Sun. The horſmen with the king, vpon their ſwift horſes, well acquainted with thoſe rocks & rough ways, with little loſſe retired themſelues into the further & ſtronger places of the mountains.

Aladeules flies into the mountaines.

Aladeules after this diſcomfiture, finding himſelfe in all things far inferiour to his enemie, thought it beſt by protracting the war, to wearie him out: wherfore as the Turks purſued him, and burnt the poore country cottages ſtanding in their way, hee ſtill fled from mountaine to mountaine, neuer offering battel or ſhewing himſelfe, but in places of great aduantage: and therefore Selymus fearing leſt in that barren rough and vnknowne countrey, he ſhould either want victual or by ſome other means be intrapped, if he ſhould ſtil with his whole armie follow after his ſtrong enemies, vpon the ſeuenth day left off to purſue them any further. And encamping himſelfe in the moſt conuenient place of that countrie, ſent Sinan Baſſa with his light horſemen, who carrying with them certaine daies victuals, ſhould ſtill at the heeles follow the enemie, and with all ſpeed and policie poſſible hunt after the king himſelfe. Selymus in the meane time curiouſly inquiring of the countrey captiues after the ſtrength of Aladeules, & what means he had to maintain the war; found, that he had taken with him his beſt men both horſe and foot; and had commanded the countrie people to forſake the villages, of purpoſe to leaue all deſolat to the enemie: and hauing ſurely intrenched himſelfe vpon a certain ſtrong rock (whither he had before conuaied great ſtore of prouiſion) was reſolued not to giue battell vnto his enemies, vntill he had drawn them into the impregnable ſtraits of the mountains, where their hugie multitude ſhould little auaile them, but to increaſe their owne loſſe. Another cauſe there was alſo (as they ſaid) for that he feared to be betraied by Alis Beg his kinſman, Generall of his horſemen; who firſt fled in the late battell; whoſe vnfaithfulnes and hatred might ſeeme to proceed of a iuſt ground, for that Aladeules had in former time trecherouſſly murthered his father, vpon a iealous ſuſpition of his aſpiring vnto the kingdome.

Selymus vnderſtanding all this, cauſed the captiues to haue their yrons ſtruck off, and in ſtead of their giues lading them with gifts and promiſes, ſent them to Alis Beg with ſecret letters and rewards, to perſuade him in ſo fit a time to reuenge his fathers death; which thing if hee would perform by ſome notable exploit vpon Aladeules, he ſhould both purchaſe vnto himſelfe great credit with Selymus, and alſo the kingdom. Theſe homely meſſengers according as was giuen them in charge, hauing imparted the matter to Sinan Baſſa, within few daies had ſo wrought, that Alis Beg (whom the deſire of a kingdome together with Selymus his rewards prickt forward to ſeeke reuenge) was eaſily drawne to ioine hands with Selymus. And when he could no other way hurt Aladeules, who miſtruſting all things, warily looked vnto himſelf, he found the means to go ouer to Sinan Baſſa, carrying after him a great part of Aladeules his beſt horſemen: by whoſe means the reſt alſo which remained being with rewards corrupted, one companie after another came at laſt all ouer vnto the Baſſa. Aladeules circumuented with this vnexpected trecherie, which neuer before thought it poſſible that his men ſhould all ſo ſuddenly haue forſaken him & reuolted to the Turks, was now glad to repoſe al his hope in ſecret flight. But Sinan Baſſa & Alis Beg, hardly purſuing him as he fled through the mountains hiding himſelf in rocks & the thick woods, & at laſt drew him out of a caue, being betraid by the country peaſants. Aladeules being brought to Selymus, was within a few daies after put to death, & his head in great deriſion afterwards caried about through all Aſia the leſſe: & afterward by way of barbarous oſtentation, ſent by Selymus to the Senat of Venice, as a loathſome teſtimony of his victory. Aladeules thus dead, Selimus reduced al his kingdom to the form of a prouince, which he diuided into three parts, & after the maner of the Turkiſh gouernment, appointed pointed to euery part a Sanzacke: yet ſo, that Alis Beg ſhould be chiefe ouer the reſt, with ſuch ſouereigntie, as that hee wanted nothing of a king but the name onely. And for the better gouernment of all things in that new gained kingdome, hee left Sinan Baſſa there all the reſt of that Summer; with commandement, that after he had ſet all things in good order, he ſhould winter at Iconium; and he himſelfe with a ſmall traine returned to Conſtantinople, for he had heard, that whileſt he was buſied in his wars againſt Hyſmael and Aladeules in Armenia, that the Hungarians had made diuers incurſions into Seruia, and ſpoiled that countrey. Wherefore for feare of loſing Samandria (which ſtanding neere to Danubius, for the conuenient ſcituation thereof is reputed the bulwarke of Seruia and Thracia) hee ſent Ionuſes Baſſa then Gouernor of Boſna with eight thouſand horſemen, who paſſing the riuer Savus entered into Croatia as far as Catinum: and at the ſame time tranſported another army ouer Danubius into Hungarie, to the intent that the Hungarians at one inſtant beſet with double danger, ſhould be inforced to feare their owne State; and withall to ſhew vnto the World, of what ſtrength and power the Othoman Emperours were. Deeming it to concerne much, both for the preſent, and the time to come, to the daunting of the Chriſtians; if hee ſhould by his happie attempts make it knowne, that hee could at once eaſily and readily maintaine ſo many and ſo puiſſant armies, and wage ſo great warres in diuers parts of the world, and ſo far diſtant one from another.

Selymus inuadeth Hungarie.

In the end of the yere, when he had thus with double inuaſion repreſſed the Hungarians, he ſpent the Winter following at Hadrianople and Conſtantinople, in making of greater preparation for war than euer hee had before from the beginning of his raigne. For he was aduertiſed, that the great monarchs of the North his neighbors, namely Maximilian the Emperour, Vladiſlaus King of Hungarie, and Sigiſmundus king of Polonia, with the princes of Germanie, had combined themſelues together to make warre vpon him. But after he had learned by his ſure intelligencers (whom he had with great charge ſent into all parts of Europe, diligently to obſerue what was done in the courts of thoſe great princes) that all the great meetings of the Chriſtian Princes proued nothing but glorious words and ſumptuous banquets; he being rid of that vaine feare (God ſo appointing) turned himſelfe and all thoſe his wonderfull preparations againe toward the Eaſt, to the great quiet of Chriſtendome in generall.

Yet leſt happily in the abſence of himſelfe and of his armies, the Chriſtian Princes might take occaſion to inuade his dominions, he ſtrengthened the frontiers of his empire with moſt ſtrong garriſons; and left his ſonne Solyman (who afterward proued the ſcourge of Chriſtendome) at Hadrianople with a ſtrong power, and Pyrrhus Baſſa his tutor (a man of great wiſedome and gouernement) at Conſtantinople. This great Baſſa was of Cilicia, a native Turke borne, which was a thing accounted ſtrange, foraſmuch as the great Baſſaes were alwaies choſen of the Chriſtian bloud. After that, he ſent Cherſeogles (whom of all others he moſt truſted) with his armie into Bythinia, and made Zafferus an Eunuch Admiral of his nauie, which he had but a little before built, and with a wonderfull labour and charge rigged forth. Then ſtaying a few daies at Conſtantinople to ſee the young ſouldiers, but then choſing Ianizaries, hee departed thence and went to his old armie, lying with Sinan Baſſa at Iconium, purpoſing to haue againe inuaded the Perſian.

Selymus goeth to Iconium.

When he was come thither, he vnderſtood that Campſon Gaurius Sultan of Ægypt (with a great armie leuied in Ægypt and Iudea) was come into Syria; giuing it out that he would aid the Perſian king his confederat, & with al hoſtilitie enter into Cilicia, if Selymus ſhould farther proceed to inuade Hyſmael the Sophi his friend & allie. Selymus perplexed with theſe news, & fearing that if he ſhould once paſſe ouer the riuer Euphrates, Campſon lying ſo neere in readineſſe, ſhould forthwith breake in at his back into Aſia by the mountain Amanus, and ſo indanger that part of his dominion, ſtaied at Iconium, & ſent his embaſſadors with great preſents to Campſon to pacifie him, if it might be. The chiefe men in this embaſſage were the Cadeleſcher, a man of great account amongſt the Turks, and of them exceedingly reuerenced for the opinion they had of his great knowledge in the Mahometan ſuperſtition, who afterward wrot the Commentaries of this war; & Iachis a great captain. The ſcope of whoſe embaſſage was, to intreat Campſon, that he would not hinder or diſturbe Selymus from making war vpon the Perſian king; who had ſo often and ſo forcibly inuaded his dominions in Aſia, and by bringing in a new forme of ſuperſtition, had corrupted and altered the moſt certain grounds of the Mahome-

Mahometan religion. And if they found him resolutely set downe and not to be by any conditions remoued, then with all possible diligence to learne his strength and farther designes, so far as by any means they could, and with all speed to make their returne. G

The cause moouing Campson to fal out with Selymus.

But Campson now far spent with age, and liuing in the height of worldly blisse, although he knew it fitter for him at those yeres to giue himselfe to ease & quietnesse, than to thrust himselfe into wars and other princes quarrels; yet thought this expedition to be for many causes both good and necessarie. First, he deadly hated the man for his inhumane crueltie, and therfore could neuer be persuaded to renew the league with him which he had in former time made with his father Baiazet: besides that, he desired to abate and represse his audacious insolencie, grown already by his prosperous successe beyond the bounds of reason: for Selymus hauing taken Tauris, ouerthrowne the Persians, and slaine Aladeules, began now to seeme terrible to all the princes that bordered vpon him, and there were many which said hee was another Alexander, who whilest other princes sate still as men a sleepe, did in the mean time plot in his victorious mind, the monarchie of the whole world. But aboue all things, the feare of the losing of Syria, and consequently the losse of all his kingdome (the quickest motiue to stirring vp of the suspitious mindes of the greatest princes) most inforced Campson to take in hand this war: for as much as the goodly kingdomes of Ægypt, Iudea, and Syria, oppressed with the intollerable gouernment of the proud Mamalukes, and therefore lesse faithfull to the Ægyptian kings, were in danger to reuolt to the Turks, if the Persians should by any mischance or fortune of war be of the Turks vanquished. For which cause Campson in the beginning of this war, solicited by the Persian embassadors, had made a firme league and confederation with Hysmael; and also moued with the miserie of the wofull yong prince Aladin the son of Achomates, was in mind persuaded, that the cruel Turkish tyrant might by his and the Persian kings forces, easily be thrust out of his empire in Asia and Europe. For Aladin, who after the death of Achomates his father, fled to Campson the Sultan of Ægypt (as is before declared) had liued three yeares as a forlorne and distressed prince in the Ægyptian court, and by all means he could deuise incited the Mamalukes to reuenge the iniuries and cruelty of his vncle Selymus. The eldest sonne also of the late king Aladeules, a goodly yong prince, hauing at once lost his father, his kingdome, and whatsoeuer he had else, was in good time fled to the Ægyptian king, and had so filled the minds of all men with the indignation and detestation of Selymus his exceeding crueltie, that the princes of the Mamalukes of their owne accord came to Campson, humbly beseeching him to take vpon him so iust a war: and if by reason of his great yeares he should think himselfe vnable to indure the trauell thereof, it would then please him yet to giue them leaue of themselues to take the matter in hand, for the repressing of the insolencie of that great and wicked tyrant. H I K

The order of the Mamalukes.

These Mamalukes far excelled the Turkes, not onely in strength of bodie, skilfull riding, and goodly armor, but also in courage and wealth. Beside that, they had not forgotten with what small power they had vnder the leading of Caitbeius their great Sultan, ouerthrown the Turks great armies in Cilicia, first at Adena, and afterward at Tarsus, where they tooke prisoners, Mesites Palæologus the great Bassa, and Cherseogles, Baiazet his son in law: by which victorie they grew into such a proud and vaine conceit of themselues, as if they had bin the onely souldiers of the world, able of themselues to vanquish and ouercome whomsoeuer they should set vpon. These so valiant souldiers, were for the most part of the poore people called in antient time Getæ, Zinchi, and Bastarnæ, born neere vnto the Euxin sea and the fens of Mæotis, especially on that side where the riuer Corax falleth into the Euxine sea: which countrey is of latter time called Circassia, of the people called Cercitæ neere vnto Cholchis. These miserable and wretched people, the Valachians, Podolians, Polonians, Roxolanes and Tartars, dwelling by Taurica (pulled from their mothers breasts, or by other violent meanes surprised) were sold to merchants; who culling out the best for strength of body, or aptnesse of wit, conuaied them by sea to Alexandria, from whence they were continually sent to the great Sultan of Ægypt: and by his appointment were at Caire (after the old manner of that people) deliuered to masters of fence and such other teachers, who carefully instructed them, beeing shut vp in their schools, in all manner of feats of actiuitie: where after they were become able to bend a strong bow, and taught cunningly to shoot, leap, run, vault, ride, and skilfully to vse all manner of weapons, they were then taken into pay, and receiued into the number of the kings L M

A kings horsemen or Mamalukes: and such of them as prooued cowardly or vnapt, were made slaues vnto the rest. So that they seeing all honor, credit, and preferment, laied vp in martiall prowesse, did with all diligence and courage imploy themselues to militarie affaires, and therin so well profited, that oftentimes they which at the first were but bare and base slaues, of the meanest of the Mamalukes, by many degrees of seruice rise at length to the highest degrees of honour. All these Mamalukes were the children of Christian parents, from the time of their captiuitie instructed in the Mahometan superstition: for no man borne of a Mahometan father, or of a Iew, could be admitted into the number of the Mamaluke horsemen: which was so straitly obserued, that the honor of a Mamaluke horseman neuer descended vnto the sons of the Mamalukes, yet might they by law inherit their fathers lands, possessions, and goods: by B which reason the sonnes of the Sultans themselues neuer succeeded, their fathers in the kingdom. Hereby also it came to passe, that many Christians of loose life, or condemned for their notorious offences, flying thither, and abiuring the Christian religion, and suffering themselues to be circumcised, being men meet for the wars, grew by degrees to great honor: as did Tangarihardinus the sonne of a Spanish mariner, who by his forwardnesse and industrie grew into such credit and authority with Campson the great Sultan, that almost all things were done by his aduice and counsell; & was diuers times by him employed in most honorable seruice, being sent embassador both to Baiazet the Turkish Emperour, and to the State of Venice, about matters of great importance. Yet his impietie escaped not the hand of God, for at length by the enuie of the court he was brought into disgrace, thrust out of his place, & cast into prison,
C where he, loaded with cold yron, most miserably died. Neither was it to be maruelled if the Mamalukes were growne to that excesse of wealth, forasmuch as the Ægyptians and Syrians being miserably by them oppressed, were not suffered to haue the vse either of horse or armour, neither admitted to any matters of counsell; but being impouerished and brought low with heauie impositions and daily iniuries of the Mamalukes, gaue themselues wholly to the trade of marchandise, husbandrie, and other mechanicall occupations: ouer whom the Mamalukes had power and command, as imperious masters ouer their seruants, & would with greater insolencie than is to be beleeued abuse the poore countrey people, beating and spoiling them at their pleasure; and not so contented, rauishing their wiues and daughters without redresse. The Ægyptians (a people in antient time much renowned for their valor and prowesse)
D were by these masterful slaues kept in this miserable thraldome and slauerie about the space of three hundred yeares. For after the declination of the Romane empire, that rich countrey falling into the gouernment of the Constantinopolitan Emperors, the Ægyptians soone wearie of the proud and auaritious soueraignty of the Greekes, called in the Sarasins, by whose help they expulsed the Greekes, and after chose the General of the Sarasins for their king, after whose name the Ægyptian kings were of long time called Caliphes, as they had of antient time been called by the names of Pharo and Ptolomey.

The imperious gouernment of the Mamalukes in Egypt, Iudea, and Syria.

The last of these Caliphes raigned at such time as the Christians vnder the leading of Godfrey and Bohemund, passing as conquerors through Asia and Syria, erected the kingdome of Hierusalem. He being inuaded by Almericus sixt king of Hierusalem, and finding himselfe too E weake, praied aid of the Sultan of Syria, who sent him Sarraco, a valiant captain, with a strong power to aid him: but Sarraco no lesse vnfaithfull than couragious, trecherously slew the Caliph, in whose aid he came, and tooke vpon him selfe the kingdome. After Sarraco succeeded Saladine his brothers sonne, who vtterly extinguished the name and authoritie of the Caliphes in Ægypt, whom Sarraco had yet left as high Priests. This Saladine oftentimes vanquished the Christian armies in Syria and Iudea, and at length quite ouerthrew the kingdome of Hierusalem, as is in the former part of this Historie to be seene. Saladin dying, left the kingdome of Ægypt to his brother, whose posteritie successiuely raigned of long time there, vntill the time of Melechsala. This Melechsala (last of the free borne kings, and of the posteritie of Saladine) had great and mortall warres with the Christians, wherein hauing lost most of his F best soldiers, and reposing no great confidence in the Ægyptians, thought good to strengthen himselfe with a new kind of souldiers, meere slaues bought for money. For at that time the Tartars breaking into Armenia and Capadocia, and ouerrunning the people called Comani ioyning vpon Capadocia, made generall spoile of that people, as of prisoners taken by law of armes. Of this base people, Melechsala for a little money bought a great multitude,

which he transported into Ægypt, and furnished them with armes: by whose prowesse he not only defended the frontiers of his kingdome, but also besieged Lewis the French king in his trenches not far from Damiata, called in antient time Heliopolis, or Pelusium, and shortly after in plaine battel tooke him prisoner, as is long before declared. But in the pride of this victorie, Melechsala was by the conspiracy of these his new souldiers slaine: in whose place they set vp one Turqueminus, a desperat fellow of their owne companie, honouring him with the title of the great Sultan of Ægypt. Turqueminus of a base slaue now become a great monarch (after the maner of men) forgetting his old companions which had so highly promoted him, and hauing them in great disdaine, was by one of them (called Clotho) suddenly slaine; for which fact he was by those base souldiers, his companions, chosen Sultan in his place: who for the short time of his raigne did much for the confirming of that seruile monarchie: yet was he at length slaine also by Bandocader, sometimes one of his fellow seruants, who also succeeded him in the kingdom. After him in long order succeeded many valiant men of the same seruile state and condition, whom for breuitie I wittingly passe ouer. Amongst the rest, Cassbeius (of whom wee haue before spoken in the life of Baiazet) was for wealth and martiall prowes most famous; who according to the maner of his predecessors, did with greater bountie and care maintain that seruile gouernment, than any of them who had before him raigned in Ægypt: and was for his notable gouernment and noble acts iustly accounted amongst the greatest princes of that age. After whose death great troubles arose in that seruile monarchie about the succession. Whereby the Mamalukes drawne into diuers factions, some seeking to prefer one, and some another, had in foure yeares space with ciuile wars sore weakned their estate, and slaine diuers of their greatest princes which had aspired vnto that kingdome. For appeasing of which mischiefes, tending to the vtter ruine of their kingdome, the great courtiers and chiefe men amongst the Mamalukes with one consent offered the kingdome to Campson Gaurus (or as the Turks call him) Cansaues Gauris, of whom wee now speake, a man of great integritie and courage, and altogether free from ambition. He, terrified with the dreadfull example of so many kings whom he had seene in short time miserably slaine by the ambitious aspiring of other proud competitors; when hee was sore against his will hoist vp vpon the shoulders of the nobilitie and chiefe souldiers, and so carried into the court, as their manner was, began earnestly to refuse the kingdome, and to withstand their choice, excusing himselfe as vnfit for so hie a place; and with teares standing in his eyes, besought the other great lords his friends, that they would forbeare to thrust him, well contented with his priuat life, into that glorious place subiect to so many dangers; and the rather, for that he neither had mony to giue bountifully vnto the souldiers of the court, as other the Ægyptian Sultans had accustomed; neither held that sufficiencie and authoritie as was requisit for repressing of such violent & seditious tumults as were too rife in that troublesome time and confusion of all things.

The nobilitie on the other side perswaded him, That he would not vpon a foolish obstinacie or vaine modestie refuse the offer of his present good fortune, but couragiously to take vpon him the gouernment of the state, now sore shaken with ciuile discord, together with the regal dignitie, which was with the generall good liking of all men so frankely offered vnto him. At last they all by solemne oath promised vnto him, That they would with all their power, policie, and wealth, maintaine and defend the maiestie of his state; and that the men of war should not demand their wonted largesse, before the same might by his receiuers and treasurers be raised of his customes and other reuenewes of the crowne. By which perswasions Campson incouraged, suffered himselfe to be saluted Sultan, and so tooke vpon him the gouernment. Afterwards, when he had giuen vnto the men of war ten millions of duckats, by the name of a largesse, and by his moderat gouernment had caused men generally to haue his prowesse and wisedome in admiration, he did with such policie and dexteritie reforme the shaken state of that kingdome, before rent in sunder with ciuile wars, taking away by poison and other secret deuices, some few, the chiefe authors of sedition, that for the space of sixteen yeares neither tumult nor noise of war was at any time heard of in all Syria or Ægypt: worthie vndoubtedly the name of a most excellent and fortunat Prince, if when he had by singular wisedome and policie established the generall peace and prosperitie of his kingdome, hee could haue there contented himselfe to haue liued in quiet, and in the winding vp of his life not rashly haue thrust himselfe into the dangerous quarrels of other princes.

The moderat and happie gouernment of Campson.

The

A The Cadeleschers and Iachis (Selymus his embassadours) departing from Icchilim, came in few daies to Campson the great Sultan, who then lay incamped neere vnto the riuer Orantes, at this day called Farfar. These embassadors entertained by Campson with greater bountie than courtesie, and shortly after their comming hauing audience in his pauilion, did with most temperat and calme speech deliuer their embassage. To whom Campson answered, That it was the antient custome of the Ægyptian Sultans (forasmuch as they held the chiefe place in their religion) with all care and industrie to keepe the other Mahometan Kings and people in peace and concord amongst themselues; whereof he for his part had been alwaies most desirous: and was for no other purpose come with his army into his province of Syria, than to perswade Selymus to peace. Who if he would needs wilfully proceed in his intended wars against Hysmael the Persian king, his friend and confederat, he would then do what should stand with his honour and place, and not longer suffer all to goe to wracke, for the vaine pleasure and furie of one insolent and ambitious man. He said also, That he had of long time before seene into Selymus his insatiable, fierce and troublesome disposition, who hauing most vnnaturally procured the death of his good father the old Emperor Baiazet, and slaine his bretliren, Princes of great valour; seuen of his nephewes, princes of no small hope; with many other of his best friends and faithfull counsellors; could make no end of his ambitious tyrannie. Wherefore they should tell Selymus, that one and all the conditions of peace should be, if he would from thenceforth desist from inuading of Hysmael, and restore to Aladenler his son, his father's kingdome, which had of long been vnder the defence and protection of the Ægyptian Sultans, as

C of right and reason hee ought to doe: hee should in so doing, beside his fauor and friendship which might greatly stand him in stead, reape greater fame and glory by an assured and honorable peace, than by doubtfull and dangerous warre.

Campson his answer to the embassadors of Selymus.

The Embassadors, although they knew right well that Selymus would not for any threats giue ouer his enterprise or lay downe armes; yet to the intent they might the sooner be dispatched, and so in time aduertise Selymus of the Sultans sudden comming, seemed wonderfully to like of his motion for peace, and to giue good hope by their reasonable perswasions to induce Selymus to like thereof: forasmuch as they were of his secret counsell, and mightable to doe much with him; whereby they trusted (as they would haue had the Sultan to beleeue) it would easily be brought to passe, that those sparks might be quenched, which all things standing vpright had not as yet kindled the fire of war. So they being by Campson rewarded,

D ding vpright had not as yet kindled the fire of war. So they being by Campson rewarded, and hauing leaue to depart, trauelling day and night, returned to Selymus, who was then come to Cæsarea.

Campson also remouing from Orantes, came into Comagena vnto the famous city of Aleppo, which citie is probably supposed to haue bin built of the ruines of the antient citie Hierapolis, by Alepius the Emperor Iulianus his lieutenant, who in that prouince did many notable matters, and called that new built citie after his owne name. It is scituate neere vnto the riuer Singa, which rising out of the mountaine Pierius, with many turnings and windings runneth thorough Comagena, and being but a small riuer, falleth at length into the riuer Euphrates. This citie Hyalon king of the Tartars tooke and burnt, at such time as the Christian princes of

E the West made warre with the Ægyptian kings, for the kingdomes of Seruia and Ierusalem. Which calamitie notwithstanding, it was againe repeopled, and is at this day a famous city, for the commodious scituation thereof much frequented with merchants from the furthest parts of the world. It is scarce fiue daies iourney from Tripolis and Berytus, the great ports of Syria, and is also neere vnto the Turks and Persians: so that the riches of the East are thither commodiously conuaied out of Turkie, ouer the mountaine Amanus which parteth Cilicia from Syria: and so likewise out of Persia and Mesopotamia ouer the riuer Euphrates, where the citie Byrtha of late time bounded the kingdome of the Ægyptian Sultans, from the Persian.

Selymus vnderstanding by his embassadors (who had diligently noted all things in the Sul-

Selymus conuerteth his forces from the Persians against Campson.

F tans camp) both of the comming, and of the number of his enemies; and also enformed of the Sultans proud answer, who had so peremptorily prescribed to him such vnreasonable conditions as pleased himselfe thought good to alter his purpose, and now to conuert his forces another way than he had before determined. For that to enter farther into Armenia, leauing so puissant an enemy as Campson at his back, seemed a thing too ful of danger and to giue ouer

the enterprise he had with so great care and charge vndertaken, and the appointment and plea- G sure of another man, stood neither with his honor or stare. Wherfore in a matter so doubtful, he resolued vpon a notable and necessarie point, well fitting the greatnesse of his mind. He made shew as if he would haue gon directly against the Persian, as he had before determined; and that the more certaine report of this his purpose might be carried to Campson, he sent before part of his armie with his carriages to the citie Suassia, in old time called Sebasta, it stan-deth in the frontiers of the Persian kingdome, where the great riuer Euphrates pent vp with the rocks of the mountaine Taurus, breaketh againe violently forth into Mesopotamia: but turning himself vpon the right hand, purposed to passe the mountain Taurus, & breaking sud- H denly into Comagena to come vpon the Sultan before hee were well aware of his comming.
Wherefore calling vnto him his trustie Ianizaries, with the other souldiers of the court, hee openly with cheerfull countenance declared vnto them what he had resolued to doe with the reasons of the alteration of his former determination: perswading them, that the victorie would easily be atchieued, if they as couragious soldiers would with all celeritie (before the Mamalukes could perceiue they were returned) get vp to the top of the mountaines, and re-couer those difficult passages; not fearing the vaine names and titles of the Mamalukes. For why (said he) the strength of those horsemen is long since decayed and gone: the old Mamalukes, whom the time of Caitbeius were of some fame and reputation, are all dead. You shall in battell meet but with a sort of gallant horsebreakers rather than souldiers, which can cunningly manage their horses in sport, to the pleasure of the beholders, but know not how to encounter the enemy, or to indure to be wounded: I who as carpet Knights effeminate with long peace, and corrupted with excesse and delicacie of their great Cities, neuer saw their foes intrenched, or armed enemies, neither haue heard the sound of a trumpet, but at plaies or shewes. Wherefore you are to make but small account of them, being furnished with no store of endance or strength of footmen. But as the reuerend interpretours of our sacred Lawes and Religion, hauing orderly performed all their obseruances, do diuine vnto vs all happinesse: so you as men full of hope, set forward cheerefully vnto most assured victorie ouer your proud enemies. For God no doubt fauoureth the quarrell of men iustly prouoked, and offereth meanes of victorie to such as take vp iust and necessarie armes. Yea to ouercome the enemie, and to enioy victorie indeed, wholly consisteth in the courage and valour of them which deeme nothing better or more honourable than to spend their liues for the honour of their Prince and Countrey. Heere the Ianizaries shaking their weapons, forthwith cried out with cheerefull voice, That he should lead and conduct them whithersoeuer K hee would: saying, That they were readie as courragious men, to ouercome all the difficulties of those hard passages, and patiently to endure all the labors and dangers incident to that warre.

Selymus encou-rageth his soul-diers to goe a-gainst the Ma-malukes.

Selymus, by the mountaine people hauing found out the easiest passages, resolued to passe ouer the mountaine with his armie in three places: and so appointing three great companies of the common souldiers and country people, for the opening of the strait passages, hee commanded the rough and vneuen waies to bee made plaine and smooth, for the transporting of his ordnance, and the broken passages to be cast euen, that so his baggage and carriages might the better passe: and the more to encourage his souldiers to take paines, he promised present reward to all such as in transporting of his ordnance, should take any extraordinarie paines.
Whereby it came to passe, that the same being of the smaller sort bearing bullet of no great L height, was in short time by the cheerfull labour of his souldiers, drawne ouer those great hils and dales: so that in fiue daies all his armie with his baggage and carriages were got ouer the mountain Taurus, and come into the plaines of Comagena. For that mountaine where it taketh the name of Amanus, which is almost in the middle where the riuer Euphrates parteth the mountaine Taurus, and the Bay Issicus, is neither exceeding high, or yet impassable: for as it commeth neerer the sea, it is not so rough as elsewhere, but is in many places inhabited and tilled by the mountaine Cilicians, a fierce kind of people accustomed to labor and toile, who are now called Caramanians, which is to say, the inhabitants of the blacke mountaines; M for that the burnt rocks of the mountaine seeme a far off to be blake.

Alis-Beg which betraied Aladeules, whom Selymus had a little before sent for, as soon as the armie was come downe into the frontiers of the enemies country, with a strong power of his light horsmen, speedily ouerran all that country which is at the foot of Amanus and Taurus: wherby to vnderstand of the country people & such as they could take prisoners, where Camp- son

A son lay with his armie; and also by keeping the passages to doe what might possibly be done, that Selymus his comming might not be knowne to the enemie.

But Campson, who with no lesse vanitie than pride had fondly flattered himselfe, onely by the authoritie and greatnesse of his name to haue terrified Selymus, and ouerruled him at his pleasure; could not be perswaded that he was come ouer the mountaine Amanus, vntill certain newes was brought him, that he was encamped with a most puissant armie within two daies march of him. With which vnexpected newes being sore troubled, and in the midst of that danger to seeke counsell, as one which began rightly to consider of his owne strength, and the strength of his enemie, began then to doubt what were best for him to doe, and in great perplexitie sometime hoped well, and by and by was as a man halfe discouraged and dismaied.
B And now become exceeding carefull both of his honour and himselfe, hee began to doubt, whether it were better for him to giue place to so great a danger, and shunning battell to retire with his armie into places of more safetie; or elle couragiously to abide the comming of his enemies, and to hazard the fortune of a battell, although it were vpon great disaduantage: forasmuch as he reputed it farre more honorable, after the example of his predecessors from whom he had receiued that great kingdom (both gotten and kept by martiall prowesse) to die with honor in the field, than by shamefull and vnwonted flight, either to blemish their militarie glorie continued aboue the space of 300 yeares, or for loue of a small remainder of life, being now 77 yeares old, to seeme willing to reserue vnto obloquie and shame his last dayes, depriued of all honour and reputation.

The wholesome counsell of Gazelles for protracting the warre.

C There were amongst his chiefetaines many, which preferred wholesome counsell before that which was in shew more glorious: but aboue all others, one Iambard syrnamed Gazel- les (sometimes the follower of great Caitbeius) a valiant man of great honor, for his long experience in martiall affaires, and at that time gouernour of Apamia. He, as he was of opinion, That to fight with the Turks armie, consisting for most part of expert souldiers, with so small a power, were a thing of desperate danger; so was he also, that it were good speedily to retire, and to chuse the citie of Damasco, as the fittest place for those wars: forasmuch as the Turks army could make no hast after them, by reason of their footmen and carriages, so that they might at ease and with safety retire; and there calling together all the Mamalukes which were in garison in Iudea and Ægypt, and entertaining the Arabians their neighbors, to protract the D war vntill Winter, when as they might easily distresse the enemie for want of victuall. And that it was not to be feared, that Aleppo, if it were furnished but with a reasonable garrison, could by & by be taken of the enemy, who had but smal field peeces not fit for batterie. Beside that, in short time aid would come from the Persians out of Mesopotamia, yea & Hismael himselfe hearing of the Turkes expedition into Syria, was like ynough to breake into Asia the lesse: neither would the Christians refuse to furnish them with great artillerie from the Islands of the Rhodes and Cyprus against that common enemie, if they were thereto in time requested. All which things being laid together, he said, the Sultan might afterward vpon euen hand goe into the field, if he should thinke it so much to concerne his honor, to giue his enemies battell. But for as much as the greatest wars, which at the first had most violent and most E furious motions, by the politicke enemies delay, did most commonly in time grow calme, he should not therefore make too much hast to aduenture the fortune of battell: for that the errours of war, which many times chanced through the ouersight or rashnesse of the chieftains, might wel of good men be lamented & detested, but hardly or neuer recouered or amended.

Gazelles his graue and considerat speech had much moued both the Sultan and others: yet the cheerfulnesse of the souldiers, and foolish hardines of the Mamalukes did so fill Campsons eares, that he could not hearken to so good and wholesome counsel: for as soone as they heard certainly of the comming of the Turks, they began to leape and dance, and to reioice among themselues, that the time was come wherin they might make proofe of their valor, and win to themselues honor. For now (as they said) was come that time they had long wisht for, where-F in they would by notable slaughter of their enemies, aduance the honor and maiesty of Camp- son their Sultan far aboue the fame of Caitbeius: and some euen of the chiefe men about Camp- son, vpon flatterie and vaine ostentation, alledging how honorably and with what small labor they had before ouerthrown the Turks great armie at Taurus, perswading him, that the victo-rie would easily and without any great danger be gotten. But especially Cayerbeius Gouernor
of

of Aleppo and of the prouince of Comagena (who after his war ended, was in reward of his foule treason, by Selymus vnworthily preferred to the greatest honours of Ægypt) extolling with glorious words the faithfulnesse, courage, and valour of the Mamalukes, and extenuating the power and strength of the enemie, forced his wits to the vttermost to ouerthrow the wholsome counsell of Gazelles.

For this Cayerbeius for all his faire face bare a grudge in heart against Campson, because hee had some few yeres before poisoned his brother, whom he had in jealousie, being a man next to himselfe of greatest power, wealth, and authority amongst the Mamalukes, and withall of an aspiring mind. Whereupon Cayerbeius afterwards thinking it good to looke to himselfe, and doubting the like practise to be intended against himselfe, being, as the maner of that kingdom was, summoned to a parliament at Caire, faigned himselfe sicke, and would not come: wherwith Campson was not a little offended, yet for a time he thought it best to dissemble the matter, & to wait some fitter opportunity for the taking away of that proud man, so forgetful of his duty, and bearing himselfe against his soueraigne, as if he had bin an absolute king in his own prouince: this he thought might most couertly be brought to passe, if he should vpon the occasion of the present war (as it then fel out) or els vnder the color of going in person himselfe to the riuer Euphrates, come to Aleppo: for it was the manner of the antient Egyptian Sultans, not to account themselues worthie of the name of a Sultan or great Generall, before they had, as Cayrbeius had of late done, encamped their army vpon the side of the riuer Euphrates at the citie Byrtha (which standing vpon the banke of the riuer, retaineth at this day both the antient name and fame) and there with solemne pompe had in the sight of the armie forced their horses into the riuer to drinke: giuing to vnderstand by that ceremonie, the greatnes of their empire, & that they were readie by force of arms to proue, that all those countries were theirs which lay alongst the riuer Euphrates, from the mountain Taurus vnto the deserts of Arabia. But the consideration of this war letted that he did not at his first comming oppresse him, because he deemed it to stand best with his present affaires: and not yet knowing the purpose of Selymus, to expect the motions of the Turks and Persians, and to defer the execution of his wrath against Cayerbeius, vntill the end of the war; for feare left the other Mamalukes, dismaied with the hainousnesse of the sudden fact, should either reuolt from him, or els raise some mutinie or rebellion in that populous citie. For Cayerbeius had by his courtesie and bountie many strong companies in the army fast bound vnto him: and beside that, was of greatest credit and authority with them of Aleppo, hauing in his keeping a strong citadell, built vpon the rising of an hill in the midst of the citie, which he kept with a strong and sure garrison.

But whiles Campson doth thus slowly and considerately purpose his destruction, many of the Sultans secret friends, to him more officious than faithfull, secretly aduised Cayerbeius to beware of the Sultan, and by some good means in time to prouide for his owne safetie. He vnderstanding of the danger, and thinking all delay deadly, sent secret messengers vnto Selymus, discouering vnto him the cause of his griefe, and promising as occasion should serue to come ouer vnto him, and to deliuer into his power the castle with the heart of the citizens, and all the strength of his owne horsemen; thereby to prouide for his owne safetie, to reuenge his brothers death, and to further his victorie against Campson: and for performance of promises on both sides, required secret hostages to be giuen. By the same messengers he also aduertised him, what strength the Sultan was of, perswading him in any case to make hast to giue him battel before he had gathered any greater power. Selymus nothing doubted to condiscend to all that the traitor had requested, promising of himselfe farre greater things than euer he had required: assuring himselfe of the victorie, if his enemie should lose so much of his strength by the reuolt of so great a commander.

Campson enforced by the generall consent of his souldiers, and the violence of his ineuitable destinie, then at hand, reiecting the good and faithfull counsell of Gazelles, at such time as Selymus was reported to be at hand; resolued according to the counsell of the traitor Cayerbeius, to dare him battell. He lay conueniently incamped vpon the riuer Singa, almost ten miles from the citie, in such sort as that his soldiers might vse the benefit of the riuer, and remoued from the houses and pleasures of the citie, might yet neuertheless be easily relieued with the store and plentie thereof.

The Mamalukes notable souldiers.

The Mamalukes were scarce in number twelue thousand, but euery one of them, according as

as he was of greater place or calling, so had he attending vpon him mo seruants, wel furnished with horse and armor. A goodly and inuincible armie, if the battel might haue been tryed by true valour. The Mamalukes wearing their beards long and rough, with graue and sterne countenance, hauing strong and able bodies, vsed such cunning in all their fights and battels, that after they had giuen the first charge with their launces, they would by and by with wonderfull actiuitie vse their bows and arrows, casting their targuets behind them; and forthwith the horsmans mace, or crooked scimitar, as the manner of the battell or place required. Their horses were strong and couragious, in making and swiftnesse much like vnto the Spanish Ienets; and that which is of many hardly beleeued, so docible, that at certaine signes or speeches of the rider, they would with their teeth reach him vp from the ground a launce, an arrow, or such like thing; and as if they had known the enemie, run vpon him with open mouth, and lash at him with their heeles, and had by nature and custom learned, not to be afraid of any thing. These couragious horses were commonly furnished with siluer bridles, guilt trappings, rich saddles, their necks and brests armed with plates of yron: the horseman himselfe was commonly content with a coat of maile or a brest-plate of yron. The chiefe and wealthiest of them vsed headpieces; the rest a linnen couering of the head, curiously folded into manie wreathes, wherewith they thought themselues safe ynough against any handie strokes: the common souldiers vsed thrumb'd caps, but so thicke that no sword could pierce them.

Campson of all his armie made foure battells: The first was committed to Cayerbeius, because it was in his owne prouince where the battell was to be fought. The second was led by Sybeius, who for his wonderfull actiuitie was of them called Baluano, which in their language signifieth a tumbler, or one that sheweth feats of actiuitie: he was gouernour of Damasco, a man of singular faith and valour. These two great Commanders were appointed at once to charge both the wings of the Turks armie. After them followed Gazelles with the third battell, to second either the one or the other of the two formost, as need should require. Campson himselfe led the fourth, all glistering in guilt armour, behind the rest almost a mile and a halfe. The last was left for defence of the campe.

But Selymus according to his woonted manner so ordered his battell, that his Asian horsemen were in the right wing, his Europeian horsemen in the left, his Ianizaries and artillerie in the maine battell; before whom in the middle betweene the two wings he placed his most valiant and gallant pensioners, amongst whom, contrarie to his woonted custome, he chose to serue that day.

Cayerbeius as soone as he was come neere the enemie, in token of his braue courage, gaue a hot charge vpon the Europeian horsemen; and by and by, as if he would haue compassed in that wing, wheeled a great way about behind them: where chancing vpon a great company of scullions, drudges, and other base people that followed the campe, with an infinite number of camels and carriages, he made there a great stir with little slaughter, that as a valiant and cunning traitor he might in the selfe same time satisfie the expectation of his valour and of his treason together. In the other wing, the gouernor of Damasco, to enter vpon the open side of the enemie, forbearing to charge him afront, and turning about his troups on the left hand, entred ouerthwart their ranks; where the Mamalukes fought with such furie, that hauing made great slaughter of the Asian horsemen, they brake in amongst them, as if it had been a raging floud, bearing all down before them, vntil they came to the ensignes in the midst of that wing: neither could Mustapha the Beglerbeg (who was by birth a Hungarian, & Selymus his brother in law) neither the Imbrahor-Bassa (or master of the house) though they did what they might to withstand him, after the first were ouerthrowne, stay the rest, but that they would needs turne their backs and flie. So Sybeius as a valiant conqueror hauing cut in two peeces the right wing of the enemies battell, and thrusting in betwixt the battell of the footmen and the backs of the pensioners, brought a great terror and feare vpon the whole maine battell. The matter was now brought to extreame danger; for Selymus by the breaking in of Sybeius was almost cut off from his footmen, in whom he had reposed his greatest confidence. And now the Ianizaries were hardly charged by Gazelles, who following the fortune of Sybeius, had set vpon the head of the enemies battell. The Asian horsemen also being put to the worse, and cut in pieces, found no meanes how to restore againe their disordered battell.

In this extremitie Sinan Bassa in good time came in with his horsemen: by his comming, for that that he had bin but lightly charged by Cayerbeius the traitor, and had brought with him many G freſh troups of horſemen, the fury of the Mamalukes was repreſſed, the Turks againe encouraged, and the victorie ſhortly after wrung out of the Mamalukes hands; the great artillery being by the commandement of Selymus at the ſame time diſcharged amongſt them, by the terrible thundring whereof, the Mamalukes horſes ſomewhat troubled, could ſo well as before be ruled: neither could the men themſelues, although they were of wonderful courage, much preuaile, being on euery ſide oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies. Yet in that diſtreſſe beeing nothing diſmaied, although they were by Cayerbeius and their good fortune forſaken, they were not to ſeeke either of courage or direction: but ſerring themſelues cloſe togither, they brake through the midſt of their enemies, with great ſlaughter of the Europian horſemen, and hurt of the penſioners; and ſo with ſpeed fled towards the campe and citie. Af- H ter whom followed Sinan Baſſa with the readieſt and freſheſt troupes of his horſemen: for Se- lymus (who that day in the extreame heat, for his wonderfull paines, courage, and direction, ſeemed vndoubtedly greater than himſelfe) riding vp and downe, called earneſtly vpon his ſouldiers to vrge the victorie, and with all ſpeed to purſue their flying enemies.

Campſon had now (his deſtinie ſo leading him) ſet forward, of purpoſe to come to the relief of his men ſent before; or if the Turks ſhould be ouercome, to be partaker of the victorie:
when vpon the way he vnderſtood by them that fled, That Cayerbeius was reuolted, his armie ouerthrown, and the terror ſo great, as that the flight of his ſoldiers was not now poſſibly to be ſtaied: beſide that, to augment the feare, it was reported, That the multitude of his enemies, I and force of their artillerie was ſo great, that they were not then to be encountred. With which heauie news, the proud old man, who in the perpetuall courſe of his good fortune had neuer taſted of euill hap, was readie for ſorrow and griefe of minde to haue ſunk down to the ground. And forthwith his own men, and the enemy purſuing them, comming vpon him, who in their headlong courſe without regard ouerthrew whomſoeuer they met, euery man making ſhift for himſelfe, without reſpect of others harmes: he being a corpulent man of great yeres, and beſide the heauineſſe of his armor, troubled alſo with a rupture, ouercome with heat and griefe of mind, fainted in that great preiſe, and ſo falling down, was without regard troden to death, after he had with great maieſtie gouerned the kingdomes of Ægypt, Iudea, and Syria, many yeres. The valiant Tetrarchs of Damaſco and Tripolis, whileſt others fled for life, either K to the campe or to the citie of Aleppo, labouring in the hindermoſt of their flying troupes to repreſſe the force of their purſuing enemies, where both fighting honorably ſlain. Selymus erecting a few tents in the ſame field wherein the battell was fought, and keeping moſt part of his armie in armes, ſlept not all that night, but ſtood faſt as a man not yet aſſured of his victory or good fortune; fearing leſt men of ſo great valour as were the Mamalukes, ſhould in the co-uert of the night returne and ſet vpon him in his campe: for he knew right wel, that they were ouercome and put to flight, rather by the treacherie of Cayerbeius, and furie of his great ordnance, than by the valor of his ſoldiers. But Gazelles and the other Mamalukes, after they certainly vnderſtood of the death of Campſon, hauing giuen their horſes a ſhort bait, departed in haſt from Aleppo to Damaſco. The next day Selymus remouing with his armie, took the rich L tents of his enemies full of all princely ſtore, which he gaue vnto his ſoldiers for a prey: and marching from thence to Aleppo, had the citie peaceably deliuered vnto him by Cayerbeius, where he fauorably tooke the citizens into his protection; and the more to win their hearts, granted vnto them greater priuiledges than they had in former time enioyed.

The death of Campſon.

Aleppo deliuered to Selymus by Cayerbeius the Traitor.

In this battell were ſlaine not aboue a thouſand Mamalukes, but of their ſeruants and followers a great number; moe being ſlaine in the flight than in the fight, when as their horſes fainting for heat, and dying vnder them for thirſt, many of them were inforced to betake themſelues to their feet, and ſo were eaſily ſlaine of euery baſe horſeman. For a great number of goodly horſes died there, which being foggie fat, and delicately brought vp in cold ſtables, could not endure the vehemencie of the heat, and that vnacquainted trauell: for that day all things were burnt with the ſcorching heat of the Sunne. M

This famous battell was fought the 17 of Auguſt, in the yere of our Lord 1516, the verie ſame day (which is ſtrange to tell) whereon but two yeares before, he had obtained the victo-rie againſt Hyſmael the great Sophie in the Chalderan fields. Selymus loſt in this battell three thouſand horſemen: whereby it may eaſily be gathered, That he had there receiued a notable

A dle ouerthrow of his horſemen, if Sinan Baſſa in the left wing (which by the treaſon of Cayer- beius eſcaped with ſmall loſſe) had alſo happened vpon his Sybeius, as the other Generall did.

The dead bodie of Campſon found two dayes after without any wound appearing thereup- The dead bodie of Campſon laid out for all men to view.
on, was by the commandment of Selymus laid forth in open place for all men to behold; that ſuch as beleeued him yet to liue, and to be gone to repaire his armie at Caire, might be out of all hope of his returne; and others that were alreadie reuolted, might thereby be the more confirmed, as now out of all feare of him. Not long after, when the dead bodie began to pu-trifie and grow noyſome, and to conuince the fame of his eſcape, had lien open to the view of

In English thus:

Fortune, well cal'd both deafe, and blind,
And thereto fond withall,
Thou setst the beggar vp aloft,
To worke his greater fall.
Thou peeuish dame, more sudden than
The thunder clap from hie, Reiects the suits of greedie wights,
Which to thee call and crie.
And lauishly consumes thy selfe,
And whatso else thou hast,
On such as craue nothing of thee,
Nor wish not to be grac't.
As Campson Gaurus seeking nought, Ne crauing owght of thee:
Against his will by souldiers rage,
Was rais'd from base degree.
And soaring vp aboue the clouds,
Made King of Ægypts Land, Receiu'd amongst the highest stars,
Did there in glorie stand.
But forthwith falling thence, oppresst
With rebels, war, and age:
Became the scorne of thine ore'thwart
Most fierce and fickle rage.
And so with life, together lost
A world of wealth also:
Which with his stately kingdome great,
He greatest did forgo.

Selymus coming to Damasco.

Selymus hauing receiued the citie of Aleppo into his obeisance, sent Ionuses Bassa before him with a great part of his light horsemen, to pursue his flying enemies to Damasco, whither he himselfe in few daies after came also with the rest of his armie, when hee vnderstood that his enemies were departed thence and fled to Caire. They of Damasco, thinking it not to stand with their good to stay the course of his victorie, and with their liues to hazard the

A the great wealth of that rich citie: without delay presently opened vnto him the gates at his comming. By whose example other cities alongst the sea coast mooued, especially Tripolis, Berytus, Sydon, and Ptolemais, sending their Embassadours, and receiuing in the Turks garrisons, yeelded themselues in like manner.

Not long after, Selymus held a great Councel in his camp, which then lay vnder the wals of Damasco: for he would not bring his soldiers into the citie for troubling the quiet and populous state thereof, togethet with the great trade of merchandise, which at that time was with wonderful security kept there by merchants of diuers countries, comming from far, euen from the remotest parts of the world. And in the camp such was the military discipline of that most seuere Commander, that the souldiers (knowing the victorie to giue them no whit the more Notable discipline in Selymus his armie.
B libertie) suffered the fruitfull orchards and gardens of the citizens, in the most plentifull time of Autumne, to rest in safetie vntouched, without any keeper. By which seuere and strait gouernment he so politickly prouided against all wants, that his camp was in all parts furnished with plentie of all things necessarie, and that at prices reasonable. There taking vnto him men skillfull in the laws and customes of the countrey, and calling before him the embassadors of all the cities of the countrey, he heard and decided the greatest controuersies of the Syrians, appointed Gouernors ouer the prouinces and cities, took view of the tributes and customs, and abrogated many customes & tributes due vnto the old Sultans, which seemed either vnreasonable or grieuous to the people; therby to gain the fame of a iust & bountiful conqueror.

When he had thus set all things in order in Syria, and sufficiently rested and refreshed his
C army; and especially his horses which with long and continuall trauel were grown maigre and leane: he of nothing more desirous than of the conquest of Ægypt, and the vtter subuersion of the Sultans state and Mamalukes gouernment; sent before Sinan Bassa into Iudea with fifteene thousand horsemen, and a strong regiment of harquebusiers selected out of the Ianizaries and other souldiers, to trie the passage of that countrey, and to open the way for him to Gaza, which was thought would be vnto him very troublesome, by reason of the wild Arabians roaming vp and downe that countrey. The citie of Gaza standeth neere the sea towards Ægypt, not far from the sandie desarts, whereby men with much difficultie and dangerous trauell passe out of Syria and so to Caire.

In the meane time, the Mamalukes who vnder the conduct of Gazelles were come to Caire, D with all the rest of their order which were thither assembled from all parts of the kingdome, entring into counsel together (as it often falles out in time of danger & distres) without al con- Tomombeius by the general consent of the Mamalukes chosen Sultan of Egypt tention or enuie, chose Tomombeius (of the Turks called Tuman-bai) a Circassian borne, to bee their king. He was then the great Diadare, and by his office next in honor and power vnto the Sultan; whose prowesse & policie was such, that he only in the opinion of all the Mamalukes was thought able and sufficient to stay and vphold the afflicted & declining state of their kingdome. He by their general consent and good liking promoted to the state of the great Sultan, thinking (as truth was) his owne maiestie, and the remainder of the Mamalukes hopes, to be wholly reposed in arms, and the fortune of battell: began with great carefulnesse and singular
E industrie to prouide armor, weapons, and horses from all places; he also caused great store of ordnance to be cast, and mustered great companies of such of his slaues as seemed meet for the wars: beside that, he entertained for pay, many of the Moores and Arabians his neighbors. He also for great reward, hired men skilfull of the countries, to go through the desarts of the Palmyrens into Mesopotamia, and so to Hysmael the Persian king with letters, earnestly requesting him to inuade the Turkes dominions in Asia the lesse, or with all speed to breake into Comagena, being by the departure of the enemy left bare and destitute of sufficient garisons: and farther to aduertise him, That Selymus who then lay in the borders of Iudea, might easily be inclosed with their two armies, and so be vanquished, or for want of victuals distressed: and the rather, for that there was no fleet of the Turkes vpon that coast, able from sea to relieue their armie by land, or yet to transport them thence in case they should by chance of war be F distressed, & so thinke to return. In which doing, he should both relieue the Ægyptian Sultan his friend and confederat, for his sake brought into so great danger, and also without any great trouble or perill notably reuenge himselfe of so many shamefull iniuries as he had before receiued from that his most capital enemy. Whilst Tomombius doth these things, Sinan Bassa the forerunner of Selymus, hauing easily repulsed diuers companies of the wild Arabians, who in manner of theeues and robbers lay vpon the passages, had now opened the way, and was come G to Gaza: where the citisens, although they were in heart faithfull vnto the Mamalukes, yet Gaza yeelded to Sinan. for that to shut their gates against the Bassa, and to stand vpon their guard without a sufficient garrison, seemed a matter both perilous and vnreasonable, forthwith yeelded their city vpon reasonable composition; and with the plentie thereof relieued the Turks Bassa, giuing him great (but dissembled) thanks, that by his means and the good fortune of Selymus, they were deliuered from the cruell bondage of the Mamalukes: promising for the remembrance of so great a benefit, for euer to remaine his faithfull seruants. Sinan commending their readie good will, required of them all such things as he wanted, or had occasion to vse; which they seemed willingly to deliuer: and so lodged his armie neere vnto the walls of the citie, within the defence of the gardens, purposing in that place to expect the comming of Selymus.

In the mean time (as he was a man of great experience, and most skilfull in martial affaires) H he sought by all means to get knowledge of that desart and vnpeopled countrie, not inhabited for lacke of water; and especially of the nature of the great sands whereby Selymus was with his armie to passe: he also woon by rewards the inhabitants of the countrey thereabout, by large offers, to procure vnto him the fauour of the Chieftaines and leaders of the Arabians, neere vnto those places; and also to espie what the Mamalukes did at Caire, and wherein they reposed their chiefe confidence, and forthwith to giue him knowledge thereof.

On the other side, the citisens of Gaza, in heart enemies vnto the Turks, as dayly feeling the grieuances of the present armie, aduertised Tomombeius of the comming of Sinan Bassa: and that that power of the Turks armie might easily be oppressed before the comming of Selymus, I if a strong power of Mamalukes were sent thither vnder the conduct of skilfull leaders: promising, that if the Mamalukes would at an appointed time vpon the sudden in the night set vpon the sleepie Turks, they would at the same instant sallie out of the citie vpon the campe, and there with fire and sword doe what harme they could for the ouerthrow of the enemie.

Of this deuice, Tomombeius and the Mamalukes liked well, and so without delay sent Gazelles six thousand chosen horsmen, and a great number of the Arabians, to performe the exploit vpon Sinan: for Gazelles, in that his wholesome counsell had been by Campson and others reiected, (who being straitway desirous of battell, had rashly cast themselues and the whole State into so great calamitie) and afterwards in the greatest danger of the battell hauing performed all the parts of a politique and valiant Chiefetaine, was growne into such credit, that K all men held a great opinion both of his valour and direction.

Sinan aduertised of the comming of Gazelles, goeth secretly to meet him. But he was scarcely well set forth, when aduertisement was giuen vnto Sinan by his Syrian intelligencers, That the Mamalukes with the Arabians were comming thorow the sandie Desarts, vpon the sudden to oppresse him; and that they would be with him before two dayes were expired, forasmuch as they had set forward vpon the spur, without any carriages or baggage to let them. Which ouerture in good time giuen, as it was the safegard of Sinans armie, so was it of greatest importance and moment, for the obtaining of the full conquest of Ægypt afterward. But Sinan Bassa, although he knew nothing of the treacherie of them of Gaza; yet as a man of a prouident and subtill wit, suspecting that such a thing might happen, because he L would not at once haue to doe with a double enemy, resolued to go and meet the Mamalukes vpon the way, and to giue them battell. Wherefore with great silence dislodging his armie betwixt tenne and twelue of the clocke in the night, he set forward and marched out of sight of the citie about fifteene miles toward Ægypt. There was neere vnto that place a little low village, wherein trauellers vsed commonly to lodge, for the commodiousnesse of a liuely and plentious spring which there riseth: there by chance both Sinan Bassa had purposed to stay, and Gazelles in like manner had also determined to rest a few houres to refresh his armie, that he might by night, after he had wel refreshed his horses, come vnlooked for vpon his enemies at Gaza: when newes was brought to both the Generals almost at one instant, by the forerunners of both the armies, That the enemie was at hand.

Gazelles not a little troubled with that vnexpected news, for that he perceiued himself dis- M appointed of his purpose; and vnable to fight with his enemies in plaine battel, especially his horses being sore wearied with trauell, was inforced vpon the sudden for the safegard of himselfe and his followers, to resolue vpon a new resolution: yet nothing discouraged, with cheerfull countenance and liuely speech exhorted his soldiers to make themselues readie for battaile,

A battell, & that which they could not by policie bring to passe, they should now by plain force performe. Sinan on the other side hauing somewhat sooner set his men in order of battel than had Gazelles, forasmuch as hee had before at good leisure taken order what hee would haue done, if it should come to the point of batell: with constant looke and long persuasions full of hope, encouraged his souldiers to fight. But the conclusion of all his speech was, That they should play the men, and not once thinke of flight, forasmuch as all places about them would be shut vp, and become impassable, if they obtained not the victorie: and that aboue all things they should persuade themselues, that no one of them could that day perish, but such as the immortall God had by the ineuitable law of fatall Destinie appointed to die: and that with like hazard valiant men found life in the middest of their enemies weapons, that cowards by

The battell betweene Sinan Bassa and Gazelles. The Bassa had placed his harquebusiers in the wings of his battell, which were raunged of a great length in thin ranks, thereby to vse their peeces at more libertie, and with more ease to inclose the enemie: in the middle were placed the horsemen to receiue the first charge of the Mamalukes. Gazelles approching the enemie, sent before the troups of the Arabian light horsmen to trouble the wings of his enemies battell, and with a square battell of his Mamalukes charged the middle battell of the Turks. The battell was a great while most terrible, and the victorie doubtfull: for although the Turks in number far exceeded, yet were they not able to indure the armed and couragious Mamalukes, but were gald to giue ground; and quite disordered by the breaking in of the Mamalukes, as men discouraged, began to looke about them
C which way they might flie: when by the commandement of Sinan, the harquebusiers, who with the first volley of their shot had repulsed the Arabians, wheeling about, enclosed all the enemies battell. By which means both men and horse were a far off slaine, with the multitude of the deadly shot: where true valor helped not them, so on euery side inclosed. For where any troupe of the Mamalukes pressed forward vpon the Turks, they quickly retired, and in all places of the battell as much as they could shunned to encounter their enemies with their horsemen, labouring onely to gaule them with shot. Gazelles seeing his horses spent with extreame wearinesse, and that he was not to expect any further help, his Arabians beginning now to fall from him; and also considering, that many of his most valiant souldiers were either slaine or wounded, and hauing also himselfe receiued a great wound in his necke, he with the rest of his
D armie made way through the midst of his enemies, and hauing lost diuers of his ensignes, fled backe againe to Caire through the same sandie deserts whereby he came. In this battell was lost the Gouernor of Alexandria, and Orchamus Gouernor of Caire (both men of great account among the Mamalukes) and beside them a great number of Arabians, with a thousand or more of the Mamaluke horsemen. Neither got Sinan a ioyfull or vnbloudie victorie hauing lost aboue two thousand of his best horsemen, and amongst them certaine commanders, men of great marke.

The Turkes wearie of this battell, which had endured from noone till night, and many of their horses fainting vnder them, were not able to pursue their enemies, and therefore encamped themselues in the same place where the battell was fought, neere vnto the fountaine. The E day following they at leisure gathered the spoile, and cutting off the heads of their enemies, which were easily knowne by their long and rough beards, fastened them vp vpon the Date trees growing thereby, as well in witnesse of their worthie labour, as by that strange and horrible spectacle to feed the eyes of their fierce Emperour, who was shortly after to passe that way, and so to manifest vnto him the victorie of that day.

In the meane time they of Gaza vpon the rising of the Sun, perceiuing the Turks camp left emptie, as men not able longer to dissemble their couert trecherie; and vainly supposing that Sinan Bassa vpon some knowledge of the comming of the Mamalukes, had for feare retired back into places of more safetie, suddenly set vpon such as were left in the camp, which were for most part sick and weake men (yet in number many) whom they most cruelly slew: & pre-
F sently after set vpon 2000 of the Turks horsmen, sent from Selymus to Sinan, which by chance were come thither the same day, enquiring with great carefulnesse what was become of the Bassa and his armie; and spoiling them of their carriages, put them to flight: who after that discomfiture, supposing the Bassa (whom they had thought to haue found at Gaza, tarrying for the comming of Selymus) by some mishap or policie of the enemy to haue been lost, with all all his armie, and therefore fearefully retiring, were vpon the way miserably slain by the Arabians: neither had any one of them escaped, if they had not met with Iuleb the Gouernor of Achaia at the citie of Rama: for hee was also sent from Selymus to Sinan Bassa with a strong companie of Græcian horsemen, by whose comming the fury of the Arabians was well repressed. Yet these pilfering people still calling forth to the prey more and more of their leaders which dwelt in the mountaines adioyning, and being growne to a great armie, ouertooke the Turks at a village called Carasbara, where they inforced them to fight in a place of great disaduantage. For the Arabians hauing before taken certain straits, which closed in the passage at the further end of a large vally, shewed themselues at once, before, behind, and on both sides of the Turkes: their weapons were bow and arrowes, and long speares armed at both ends, which they nimbly handled, after the manner of the Moores. These weapons they most skilfully vsed vpon their swift horses, and both in their charge & retreat wounded their enemies deadly. So that the Turks in number few, and for their horsemens staues inferior to their enemies, durst not offer to charge them; but keeping close together, hardly defended themselues still making way as they might: and had vndoubtedly bin brought into extreame danger to haue bin vtterly lost, had not Iuleb with foure peeces of arttillerie which he brought with him for his defence, driuen them which kept the straits from their high places, and so opening the way, with all speed brought thorow his men: which straits once passed, and comming into the open fields, he with more safetie marched forward, skirmishing a far off with the enemie with his archers and harquebusiers, and discharging his field pieces where he saw the greatest and thickest troups of those wild people.

On the other part, the Arabians dispersedly houering about them in troups, were stil in the taile of the army, and such as were wounded or weak and could not follow the rest, they slew; and sought by all means to hinder their iourny, not suffering them (circumuented with so many dangers) either to refresh themselues, or to take any rest. This was vnto the Turks a most dismall day, for many of them tormented with thirst, and weakned with wounds and extream labour, gaue vp the ghost; and now no helpe remained in this desperat estate, being still beset and hardly laid too with the multitude of those fierce and desperat enemies: when suddenly a great number of other Turks came to them in the mid way vnlooked for, being now in despaire and euen at the last cast: for Selymus hauing left the Imbrahor-Bassa with a strong armie vpon the borders of Persia, for the defence of Syria and Asia, and hauing sent for new supplies of souldiers to Constantinople, which should with a great fleet be transported into Syria, had now remoued from Damasco: and the better to prouide for victuals and forrage, which began now to grow scant in that wasted countrey; euery day sent before great troupes and companies of his armie, as it were at certaine appointed times.

Selymus doubting Sinan Bassa to haue bin lost becommeth melancholie.

So Iuleb deliuered of the present danger by the comming in of these fresh souldiers, met with Selymus the next day, and in order told him all that had hapned vnto him and his first troupes at Gaza and Rama, and all the way after: and also what they supposed by coniectures to haue chanced to Sinan Bassa with his armie, for the manifold wiles of so dangerous enemies. With which newes Selymus became exceeding melancholic, and thereupon thought it not good to goe any further, before he perfectly knew how all stood with Sinan: in whose fortune he had reposed all the hope of his good successe in that so great an enterprise. But whilest he was in this dumpe, suddenly came the Syrian spies, who declaring vnto him all that Sinan Bassa had done, conuerted that melancholie passion into no lesse ioy and gladnesse: for hee saw that by that victorie, Ægypt was laid open vnto him, and his desires as good as halfe accomplished in lesse time than euer he expected.

Newes of Sinans victory comforteth Selymus.

The next day after, he remoued with his armie to Rama, and by the way as he went (to the terror of others) burnt the dwellings together with the wiues and children of those Arabians, who but a little before had done so much harm to his men in their passage. And from thence sending before his footmen to Sinan Bassa at Gaza, he himselfe with his horsemen turned out of the way vpon the left hand to Ierusalem, to visit that most antient and famous citie, so much renowned both for the antiquitie thereof, and the fame of the religion of the Iewes. That vnpeopled and desolate citie lay then defaced with the hugie ruins of the old sacred and stately buildings; not inhabited by the Iewes, the antient inhabitants therof (who for their inexpiable guilt, as men exiled out of the world, haue no countrey or resting place) but for most part by a few

A a few poore Christians, who to the great scorne and shame of the Christian name, payd yerely a great tribute vnto the Sultan of Ægypt, for the possession of the sacred Sepulchre: when as the Christian Princes, flourishing at that time with glorie, power, and wealth, could not by any motiue of immortal glory or fame, be incited to reuenge so great an iniurie; but deeming it (as should seeme) better agreeing with their state, to spend their time in idle vanities, or mortall war one against another, than in the quarrell of the most true and Christian religion.

Selymus hauing reuerently worshipped the antient monuments of the old Prophets, and done especiall sacrifice vnto his great prophet Mahomet; gaue vnto the Christian priests keepers of the place (as vnto good and deuout men) mony to maintain them for six months: and staying at Ierusalem but one night, marched in foure dayes to the rest of his armie at Gaza:
B where by the way he had continuall skirmishes both day and night with the Arabians: for they according to their wonted manner were desperatly at hand in euery place, and where the straitnesse of the ways inforced the Turks to extenuat their ranks, there would they be readie to skirmish with them; and suddenly vnlooked for come to handie blowes; and when they came into the vallies, they tumbled down from the mountains great stones vpon them, which they had for that purpose before prouided. At which time the Turks harquebusiers, in whom they had greatest confidence, serued them to little purpose: for the weather was so tempestuous and extreame moist with continuall raine, that the pouder in their flaskes became wet and vnseruiceable, and hardly could they keepe fire in their matches. Yet by the valiantnes of the Ianizaries the matter was so vsed, that neere vnto the person of the Emperour no great harme
C was done by those naked robbers: for climebing vp the hils with pikes in their hands they droue them from their standings, and enforced them to abandon the straits and high places.

But Sinan Bassa (who after his victorie returning to Gaza, had put to death the authours of the late reuolt, confiscated their goods, and exacted of the people in generall a great sum of money, as the just punishment of their false treacherie) hearing now of the comming of Selymus, went to meet him with his victorious souldiers, furnished with the spoyles of their enemies. Whome Selymus most honourably receiued, and gaue generally to the Captaines, and particularly to the most valiant of the common souldiers, garments of silke, with a great sum of money in reward of their good seruice. 1517

Sinan Bassa goeth to meet Selymus, as hee was comming to Gaza.

After that, he staied but foure days at Gaza, for that he thought it not good to giue any long
D time of breathing vnto his discouraged enemies, now twice ouerthrowne; or to suffer the new Sultan (not yet well setled in his kingdom) to grow stronger by new preparations and supplies raised in the most populous and plentifull country of Ægypt. Which to let, although it required great haste in setting forward, and serued as spurs vnto him, naturally hasting to glorie and renowne; yet was his armie to be refreshed after so long and painfull trauell, & great prouision to be made for the carriage of water vpon camels all the way through the drie, solitarie, and sandie desarts. For betweene Gaza and Caire lie vast vnpeopled and barren sands, which moued by the wind, rise vp in billows in manner of a wrought sea, so troublesome, that oftentimes it is not possible to see for dust: and the light sands in many places gauled deepe with the winde, wonderfully troubleth the wearie passengers. But such a sudden calme ensued
E the great rain which fell but three dayes before, that Selymus vnto his great good fortune wanted nothing that he could wish, for the happie conduct of his armie: for the aire was become so calme, that there was no blast of wind to raise the sand to trouble their sight; and withall, such plentie of water was found almost in euery place, by reason of the abundant rain, which being not yet sunke far into the sand, afforded them water in such plentie, if they digged but two foot deep, that the soldiers commonly thought it needlesse to carrie any bottle of water for feare of thirst. Yet for all that, the wild Arabians failed not in all that passage, on euery side to houer about the Turks armie (as hawks ouer their prey) and suffered none of them to straggle out of order, or stay behind the armie, but they were straitway snatcht vp & slain. Against whom Selymus prouided an easie remedie, by placing his field pieces in diuers parts of his ar-
F mie, which by the direction of the leaders (as euery man hapned to be neerest vnto the danger) were forthwith discharged vpon the roaming enemie. And in the rereward of his army were placed strong companies of harquebusiers, for defence of the weake and feeble soldiers, who could but softly follow the armie, and were therefore most subiect to danger.

By this meanes Selymus with some small losse receiued from the Arabians, in eight dayes march march drew neere to Caire, Sinan Bassa going before him, who with his Europeian souldiers still kept one daies iourney before. There is a village about six miles distant from the citie of Caire called Matharea, famous for the plentie of most excellent balme: with liquour of all others most fragrant and soueraigne, distilled out of low trees there planted, whose vttermost rind the people cut with yuorie knives to giue the liquor passage: which baulme for the notable vertues thereof, being not elsewhere to be had, mens diseases and wanton desires haue made of a wonderfull price. Into that place neere vnto a village called Rhodania, had Tomombeius conuaied all his new and old prouision of artillerie; and had drawne deepe ditches ouerthwart al the field, & crosse the high way, which he had closely couered ouer the weak hurlds and earth, as if it had bin firme ground. And he with his Mamalukes (in number about twelue thousand) and a great multitude of Arabian horsemen lay in places conuenient, of purpose that when the Turks battels should approch, they should first feele the force of his great ordnance, before they came within the shot of their arrowes, and forthwith vpon great disaduantage, with all his forces suddenly to set vpon them disordred and intrapped. All which things were so cunningly and so politiquely contriued and done, that there was none in the Sultans army which doubted of the good successe of that day: and a great mischiefe had vndoubtedly befallen the Turks, had not fortune which fauored Selymus, and frowned vpon Tomombeius (or more truly to say, the fatall period of that kingdome so requiring) by the false treachery of a few frustrated the great endeauors of the Mamalukes.

Tomombeius seekes to intrap the Turkes.

There was in the Sultans armie among the souldiers of the court, foure Epirot Mamalukes, who grieued to see Tomombeius (contrary to their desires) preferred to the kingdom by others of a contrary faction; whether it were vpon a malicious dispositiõ, or vpon hope of reward and better entertainment, or for that in so great a declination of their kingdome, they thought it good to seeke for new friends of more assurance, fled secretly to Sinan Bassa, as to a most famous captaine, and one of their owne nation. For this great commander Sinan, Selymus his right hand, was borne in a poore country village of Epirus, in the mountain countrey of Ambracia; whom a wonderfull mischance preferred to that height of credit and wealth: for it is reported, that a sow kept in the house wherein he was borne, bit off his genitories, being then but a child, as he lay by chance sleeping in the shadow; and being made of greater esteem by that mishap, was by them which tooke vp delicate minions for the Turkish Emperor, brought to Constantinople, and presented to the great Emperour Mahomet, Selymus his grandfather: where fortune by the fatall direction of his good hap, aduanced him to his appointed honors, whome shee had long before dismembred. By these fugitiue Mamalukes, Selymus and Sinan were instructed of all the deuices of the enemie, and especially what stratagems Tomombeius had with great cunning and policie deuised: whereinto they must needs fall, if they should go directly on and not forsake the highway. Wherefore guided by the same fugitiues, they fetcht a great compasse on the left hand, and by an vnused way, before it was day, hauing escaped the front of their enemies campe, with all the dangers prepared for them; they came and shewed themselues at their backs in order of battell, with their great artillerie readie bent, because they were desirous without delay to joyne battell.

Tomombeius now too late perceiuing that his plot was discouered by the treason of some of his owne people; although he was therewith aboue measure grieued, for that all that he had with so great industrie and the labour of so many men brought to passe, was through spiteful fortune made frustrat, and in a moment brought to nought; yet for all that, as he was a man of an inuincible courage) presently entred into his wonted and deepe deuices, and calling to him his chiefe commanders, quickly told them what he would haue done. Now in this short moment of time he was to do many things at once; the signall was to be giuen for the souldiers to mount their horses, and to make themselues readie, the order of his campe was to be changed, his battel to be ordred, his souldiers to be encouraged, and all his great ordnance, as the case required, quite the contrarie way to be turned: all which things, as they could but hardly and troublesomely by one commander be directed, so were they hastily and disorderly at once done by many. But aboue all other things, the great concourse of people for turning & remouing the great artillerie, most troubled the wel ordring of the rest: for many of them were hugie yron pieces of great weight, made fast in stocks of wood, with rings & yron claspes, after the old and rude manner of ship ordnance, which for their exceeding and ponderous weight, could

The comming of Selymus by an vnexpected way makes great cõfusion in Tombeius campe.

A could not be out of their places remoued, but by the strength of many horses, and the great labour of men, with leauers and roules put vnder them: and such as were mounted vpon carriages when they were drawne through all parts of the campe, with the great clamour of the disordered and hasty people, some drawing, some thrusting forward the same, with their tumultuous stir and doings, wonderfully troubled the other souldiers as they were mounting to horse and repairing toward their ensignes. But two things maruellously helped these difficulties, the soldiers cheerfulnesse, & constancie, which was such as passeth credit: for they did not vpon any apprehension of feare faile either in hope or courage, as oftentimes it hapneth in sudden accidents, wherin euen the old approued soldiers do many times faile of their wonted valor. And although they were twice ouercome in battell, yet still they were of greater spirit
B and confidence, as men destitute neither of courage or skill, but onely of fortune.

Wherefore Tomombeius hauing with much adoo ordered this battell, and his soldiers with great cheerfulnesse desiring the signall to be giuen, commanded all the multitude of his Arabians to compasse in the wings of the enemies battell behind, and so to skirmish with them: that so (if it were possible) the Turks horsemen might with the danger of the doubtfull fight with such an vncertain enemie, be disordered before he set forward to charge them with his troups: and withall commanded his great ordnance (which was now turned vpon the enemy) to be presently discharged. So did the Turks likewise, discharging at once from a conuenient distance both their greater & smaller ordnance; and speedily recharging them, brought them within an arrow shot; so that for a good space they lay beating the one the other on both sides
C with their great artillerie onely: in which manner of fight the Ægyptian canoniers were almost all slaine, and many of their field pieces broken by force of the enemies shot. For Selymus had in his camp many excellent and skilfull canoniers, whom he had with great entertainment allured out of Italie and Germanie: and especially of those refuce Iewes, which by the zeale of king Ferdinand being driuen out of Spaine, afterwards to the shame of the Christians, dispersed those rare and deadly deuices through the East. The chiefe of these canoniers was one Iacobus è Regio Lepidi, a cunning enginer, who but a little before ouercome by the Turkes rewards, abiuring the Christian Religion, reuolted vnto the Mahometan Superstition.

Christian canoniers serue the Turkes against the Egyptians.

But after that the Mamalukes had brought the matter to battel on both sides, they gaue out a most hideous and dreadfull crie, and with exceeding fury assailed the Turks in three places:
D for Selymus still keeping his wonted order, approched his enemies with his battel in forme of an halfe Moone. Mustapha Bassa had the leading of the Asian horsemen in the right wing: and Ionuses Bassa, of the Europeians in the left: he himselfe stood in the maine battel with the squadron of his trustie Ianizaries, and great store of artillerie: but Sinan the Eunuch Bassa, General of the field, led after him a great number of most valiant horsemen, drawne out of euery troup to be ready against all the vncertaine euents that might happen in the battell, vnto whom hee ioyned fiue hundred harquebusiers, Ianizaries, men of wonderfull courage and actiuitie, selected out of Selymus his owne squadron, to relieue such part of the army as should chance to be most pressed by the enemie.

The order of Selymus his army. Sinan Bassa Generall of the field.

So almost at one time, whilest Tomombeius stood in the maine battell against Selymus, and E the wings of the Mamalukes with equall battell encountered the wings of the Turks, and the Arabians also valiantly charging them in the rereward as they had in charge; foure sharp battels were at once made in diuers places. It is reported by some that were present in that battel, that what for the clamor & crie of soldiers, what for the noise of drums and trumpets & such like instruments of war, what for the thundering of ordnance, clattering of armor, and rising of the dust, all mens minds were so confounded and abashed, that running on headlong as men furious & desperat, when neither their speeches could be heard their tokens known, their ensigns seen, or captains vnderstood, mistaking one another in that hurly burly, they slew many of their friends in stead of their enemies: for neuer battels met together with greater hatred, neither did euer two great kings with lesse care of their persons & safety more resolutely, or F desperatly make shew of their strength & courage: for both of them with like danger both of themselues and of their armies, seeing plainly that they had put both their liues & kingdoms to the hazard of a battell, promised vnto themselues no other hope of safetie, but what they should obtaine by victory. Gazelles desirous both of honor and of reuenge, to requite the Europeian horsmen with like slaughter as he had before receiued from them not far from Gaza,

with wonderfull fury assailed Ionuses Bassa, and at the first encounter brake his first rankes, and ouerthrew certain of his guidons: at which time the Arabians pressing couragiously in at their backes, enforced those victorious troupes, which in all battels had hitherto carried away the prise (the very flower of Tracia, Thessalia, Epirus, Macedonia, and Grecia) to flie and shew their backs, which neuer enemie had before that time seene. At which time Sinan Bassa carefully attending euery accident, came speedily in with his most valiant troupes of fresh men, vpon the side of the enemie, and restored againe the battell, now declining and fouly disordered. But whilest Sinan, who in this his last worthie labor had interrupted the manifest victory of Gazelles, was with an inuincible courage valiantly fighting in the head of his battell, he was by the comming in of the couragious captaine Bidon with his Mamalukes, ouercharged and slaine. His most valiant followers also laboring to rescue and carry away his dead bodie, were by Gazelles vnfolding his troupes (that standing thin, they might at more libertie vse their swords, in which manner of fight the Mamalukes far excelled the Turks) for most part slaine, and the rest put to flight: and that chosen companie of fiue hundred of the most valiant Ianizaries, now destitute of their horsemen, when they had most couragiously done what was possible for men to doe, being compassed round with the Mamalukes horsemen, were all in a trice cut in pieces and trodden vnder foot. Thus resteth this Eunuch Bassa in the bed of fame, who liuing, had the leading of this most warlike Emperour Selymus his greatest armies in his most dangerous warres.

Mustapha in the other wing of the Turks battell comming on couragiously with his Asian horsemen, did sore presse the left wing of the Ægyptians (whereof Helymis the Diadare, and Gispal, two valiant captaines, had the leading) who but a little before had receiued great harm by the great ordnance which was discharged out of the middest of Selymus his battell ouerthwart the field: which Mustapha perceiuing, and desiring to blot out the old infamie he had before receiued, did fiercely presse vpon them, so disordered, and with his whole troups ouerthrew their broken rankes, and glistering in his bright armour, with a loud voice encouraged his Asian souldiers, exhorting them that day with valiant prowesse or honorable death, to recouer their antient honor of late lost in the fields of Aleppo.

At the same time also Tomombeius breaking through the middle battell of the Turks horsemen, was entered into the squadron of the footmen, with his crooked scimitar giuing many a deadly wound, himself being a valiant big made man, and of great strength. The Arabians had also in a ring inclosed the vttermost parts of the Turks armie, & in many places inforced them to turne their battell vpon them, being sore charged with a doubtfull fight both before & behinde when Selymus set forward with his battel of footmen, and his squadron of Ianizaries, his last and most assured refuge in that his hard distresse, whose inuincible force, neither the couragious barbed horses nor their victorious riders were able to abide: for part of them with their harquebusiers, and the rest with their pikes, had so strongly set the front of their battell, that nothing was able to stand where soeuer that firme battell, linked together as if it had been but one whole entire body, swayed. Yet was this cruell battell continued with diuers fortune on both sides, from foure a clocke vntill the going downe of the Sunne; neither was there any part of their armies, which had not with diuers successe and change of fortune, endured the fury of that battell: for both the victors and the vanquished being enraged with an implacable hatred one against another, fought desperatly as men prodigal of their liues: the Mamalukes disdaining to haue the victory wrong out of their hands by them whom they had in so many places discomfited, and the Turks taking it in no lesse scorne, that they, whom but of late they had ouercome & vanquisht in two great battels, should now the third time make so strong resistance. So that on both sides their fainting hands and bodies both wearied and weakned with wounds, supported only with anger & obstinacie of mind, seemed yet sufficient to haue maintained that bloudie battell vntill the next day, if the darknesse of the night now comming on, had not made an end of that dayes slaughter.

Tomombeius vndoubtedly vanquished, and fearing to be vtterly ouerthrown, first caused a retreat to be sounded, that his Mamalukes which were indeed notable to withstand the Ianizaries, might not seeme to be put to flight, but rather as men commanded, to retire. Which he thought to concern much both for the encouraging of his souldiers, and for the keeping of his own credit & estimation with his subiects: for now the selfe same fortune which had deceiued his his first hopes, seemed vnto him (as it fareth with them in distresse, still hoping for better) to promise him more prosperous successe, if he were not discouraged: but reseruing such remainders of his forces as were left, he should againe couragiously renew the war.

The battell thus broken off by the approch of the night, the Turks as victors enioying the tents and great artillerie of their enemies, pursued the Mamalukes vntill midnight, who held on their way to Caire, in manner as if they had fled. This great battell was fought vpon a Thursday, the 24 day of Ianuary, in the yere 1517. The Diadare was taken in the flight mortally wounded, and with him the valiant captaine Bidon, hauing in the battell one of his legges broken in the knee with a faulchion shot, wherewith his horse was also slaine vnder him. Selymus commanded them both the next day to be slaine, either for that their wounds were supposed to be incurable, or els for that it was his pleasure, with the death of those two honorable personages to appease the angrie ghost of Sinan Bassa, whose death he wonderfully lamented.

Selymus causeth the Diadare & the valiant captaine Bidon to be slaine.

The Turks although they still preuailed, yet was their armie greatly impaired euen in their prosperous successe and fortunat battels: the fourth part of their armie was consumed with sickenesse and the sword, and that dayes labour had tyred a great number of their horses, besides the long journey they had before endured. For which causes Selymus was enforced to slacke somewhat of his accustomed haste: for as yet he had no experience of the disposition of the Ægyptians which dwelt at Caire; neither could he vnderstand by any certaine report, where Tomombeius stayed, or vpon what resolution he rested. Which things not throughly knowne, he thought it not good to commit himselfe and his armie into that most populous and spacious citie: but staying foure dayes at the village of Matharea and Rhodania, carefully prouided for his wounded souldiers, and caused the bodies of such as were slain to be buried; but the dead carkasses of his enemies he left to the birds of the aire and beasts of the field. And afterward remouing his campe thence, that he might more commodiously water, he came to the plaines betweene old Caire and Bulach.

In the meane while Tomombeius, nothing discouraged with so many mishaps, gathering together the Mamalukes from all places, encamped his armie commodiously between the new citie of Caire and the riuer Nilus; he also armed eight thousand Æthyopian slaues (which kind of men he had not before vsed, for the remembrance of their old rebellion:) beside that, he opening the old armourie, put armes into the hands of the Mamalukes sons, & Moores, (his vassals) into the hands of the Iewes and Arabians also, and couragiously prepared for a greater and more mortall war than before. But forasmuch as there were many difficulties in the managing thereof, hauing almost lost all his great artillerie, with many of his most valiant horsemen slaine in the former battels; he in his troubled minde did so cast the doubtfull hopes of his last deuice, (which cruell necessitie wrung from him) that forasmuch as he had by manly force nothing preuailed in open field, he would now altogether vse policie; as he which of late hauing vnfortunatly made proof of his strength, his forces yet al whole, thought it not good again to aduenture the fortune of a battell: neither was he in hope if he should so do, to be able with his small power and desperat supplies to protract the war vntill the heat of Summer, as he desired. Wherefore he resolued by night to assaile the Turkes campe, and if possibly he could, to set it on fire. For which his deuice he seemed to haue two reasons: whereof the one consisted in the speedie execution, that he might desperatly attempt to doe some notable exployt in the night, before the enemie should perceiue the weakenesse of his power, which was not great, and scambled vp on the sudden; as also before he himself should grow into contempt with the naturall Ægyptians; who desiring nothing more, than to cast off the seruile yoke of the Mamaluke gouernment, with wauering mindes expected but some fit occasion to rebell: The other was, That by the benefit of the night he might auoyd the danger of the great ordnance; which in sudden accidents, and especially in the darknesse of the night, serueth to little or no purpose: in which kinde of strength he had before to his great losse learned, that his enemies were too good for him. But these his reasonable policies, when all things were in readinesse to haue put the same in execution, were in like manner as the first, ouerthrowne by the treason of such as secretly reuolted from him to the enemie.

Tomombeius his purpose discouered to Selymus.

For Selymus vnderstanding the whole plot by certain Mamalukes (which hauing the kings euill fortune in contempt, as it commonly falleth out with men in miserie, dayly forsook him) commanded his armie to be alwaies in readinesse, and making great fires in diuers parts of his campe, kept moſt carefull and vigilant watch. By which his diligence it came fitly to paſſe, that the night following, Tomombeius approching his campe, was repulſed, with no ſmall loſſe of his firſt troupes which vnaduiſedly were gone on too farre: and had no doubt that night thereby receiued his laſt ouerthrow, but that he wiſely miſdoubting the vnwoonted light of the fires ſhining in all parts of the campe, in time called backe his haſting troups, which were themſelues with more haſte than good ſpeed marching into the verie mouth of the Turkes great artillerie, bent of purpoſe vpon them.

Tomombeius diſappointed of his purpoſe, by perſuaſion of his Chieftains retired to Caire: for the Mamalukes ſtill put to the worſe in plaine field, thought it beſt to proceed in another manner; perſuading him, with the whole ſtrength of his armie to man all the conuenient places of that great citie, otherwiſe expoſed to the enemies pleaſure, and ſo to keepe the Turkes from entring. For they as men brought to this extremitie, that they muſt now fight for their dwellings, liues, wiues, and children; thought it more honorable, and better agreeing with their antient glorie, ſo to do in their ſight, and in the entrance of their houſes, than elſewhere further off. Wherefore the Mamalukes comming home to Caire, furniſhed all their families and flat roofes of their houſes, with all manner of weapons: euery one of them now humbly requeſting the Ægyptians their neighbours, to take vp armes againſt the Turkes their antient and mortall enemies, and not to ſuffer themſelues to be cowardly ſlaine, their goods ſpoyled, and their wiues and children carried away into moſt miſerable captiuitie; foraſmuch as the mercileſſe and greedie enemie, if he ſhould once get the victorie, would no whit ſpare them, although they ſhould as neuters ſtand looking on, and helpe neither partie: for victorie (as they ſaid) alwayes full of inſolent pride, would know no friend but ſuch as with reſolute hand did their vttermoſt deuoire in time of danger for the obtaining thereof.

The Egyptians diuerſly affected toward the Mamalukes.

There were many of the wealthieſt of the Ægyptians, who as they thought the change of the ſtate would be hurtfull to their trades and wealth, ſo were they readie in all they could to helpe the Mamalukes their old lords: ſo on the other ſide there were many of the middle ſort of the citiſens, and a far greater multitude of the baſeſt ſort of the vulgar people, who hauing little or nothing to loſe, liued in hope now to make a gaine of other mens loſſes; and withall, remembring what miſerie and ſlauerie they had endured about the ſpace of three hundred yeares, vnder the proud gouernment of the Mamalukes, kept themſelues cloſe in their houſes, expecting the laſt euent of wars; and ſecretly reioycing in their hearts, that the time was come (God ſo appointing) wherein their outragious and cruell maſters ſhould be juſtly and worthily puniſhed for their oppreſſion and hard dealing; and that which gladded them the more, was, That the reuenge ſhould be taken by the hazard of other mens liues, with which wiſhed ſpectacle they well hoped ſhortly to fill their deſirous eyes.

Tomombeius with much labour and greater care, fortified all the gates and entrances of the citie, appointed vnto euery ſtreet a particular captain, in euery publique place encouraged the people, omitting nothing that could poſſibly be done or deuiſed; and that which in ſo great a calamitie and danger was of all other things the hardeſt, with cheerefull countenance and vndaunted courage made ſhew of greateſt hope. The Mamalukes alſo, beſide the neceſſitie (which in caſes of extremitie is of power to encourage and make deſperate the faint hearted coward) prouoked with emulation, ſtraue amongſt themſelues, who ſhould beſt performe all the duties of worthie captaines and ſouldiers: for euery one of them according to his conceit and deuice, cauſed great ditches or great timber logs to be caſt ouerthwart the ſtreets; ſome in couert trenches ſet vp ſharpe ſtakes, whereupon the enemie falling vnawares might be gaged; otherſome according to their ſtore, furniſhed the windowes and fronts of their houſes in the greateſt and moſt open ſtreets, with harquebuſiers: all which things with many moe, were done with ſuch celerity, that none of the beſt and moſt honorable of the Mamalukes refuſed to handle a ſpade or a mattocke, or to put his hand to any other baſe labour; ſo that nothing could be ſooner deuiſed, but it was forthwith performed.

The diſcription of the great city of Caire.

This great and antient citie of Caire was not compaſſed with any walls, yet were there diuers gates and entrances which led vnto it: whereof one broad ſtrait ſtreet came directly from the Eaſt gate vnto the caſtle and middle of the citie; the reſt were ſo narrow and crooked, that by them no great artillerie could poſſibly be brought, or ſoldiers enter without great danger. Into this place eſpecially had Tomombeius conueied his chiefeſt ſtrength; for that he knew his enemies

A enemies muſt of neceſſitie come in that way for the largeneſſe of the ſtreets; the other parts of the citie he kept with leſſe garriſons. But the innermoſt part where the caſtle ſtood, was kept with a verie great & ſtrong garriſon of moſt valiant ſoldiers: that whither ſoeuer the clamor of the enemie or danger of the battell ſhould call, they might ſpeedily from thence come with reliefe. For why, that citie of all others the greateſt, could not with ſo ſmall power as Tomombeius then had, be in euery place & entrance ſufficiently defended: for within the circuit of Memphis (now called Caire) are contained three great cities, which ioined one to another with ſtragling bridges, make one citie, whereof the greateſt and moſt populous, is at this day called New Caire. It lieth in length ſix miles, alongſt the riuer Nilus, from which it is equally diſtant a mile: the breadth thereof, exceedeth not a mile and a quarter. In the midſt therof
B is a caſtle ſtanding vpon a little riſing ground, ſomewhat higher than the reſt of the city; more notable for the beautie and greatneſſe thereof, than for the manner of the fortification: for in it were many princely gardens, a faire ſtreet with many large galleries, diuers faire tilt-yards and courts, with ſtately chambers opening euery way: the vtter part thereof was garniſhed round about with towers, fortreſſes, and beautifull battlements, from whence all parts of the citie, the riuer Nilus running by, and the high Pyramides, were moſt pleaſantly to be ſeene. Not far from this princely pallace, is a lake made by the hand of man, the water wherin deriued from the riuer Nilus, is on euery ſide incloſed with moſt ſtately buildings; and is a place of wonderful pleaſure, when as a man ſtanding at a window may take both fiſh & foule, wherof there is in the lake great ſtore. Another lake there is far greater and fairer than this, in form
C of a triangle, in the vttermoſt part of this new citie of Caire toward Bulach: it is filled at the riſing of Nilus by a great ſluce made of ſtone with yron floudgates, and being ioyned to the great riuer by a broad channel, is able to beare ſmall boats and barges; wherin gentlemen for their diſport vſed to ſolace themſelues both by day & night in courting their miſtreſſes. The houſes were all gallantly built a front al about the lake, with porches garniſhed with open galleries, and paued with ſmooth marble euen to the brim of the lake: there the citizens in their more proſperous times vſed to row vp and downe in boats, and with pleaſant muſicke to delight the liſtening eares of the hearers. On the Eaſt ſide of this lake ſtood a moſt ſumptuous & ſtately pallace, the late worke of queene Daltibe wife of the great Sultan Caietbeius, for manet of the building and inward beautie far exceeding the other proud buildings of this pleaſant D place: for the wals gliſtered with red marble, and pargeting of diuers colors, yea all the houſe was paued with checker and teſſelled worke; the windowes and gates were made of alablaſter, white marble, and much other ſpotted marble; the poſts & wickets of maſſie yuorie, checkered with gliſtering black ebonie, ſo curiouſly wrought in winding knots, as might eaſilier ſtay than ſatisfie the eies of the wondering beholder: neither was the furniture in it inferiour to the magnificence of the building, but ſuch as might fitly anſwer both a princes ſtate, & a womans quaint deſire. All which things ſhortly after (Selymus hauing obtained the victorie) carried to Conſtantinople; not ſparing the very wals, but plucking them down, ſo to take out the curious ſtones whole. Beſide the goodly buildings about that lake, in euery place of New Caire was to be ſeene the faire houſes of the chiefe Mamalukes, more commended for their E commodiouſneſſe, than for the manner of their building. The reſt of the buildings of the city was but low, repleniſhed with the common ſort of baſe people. There are yet extant in diuers places of the citie, three churches of the Chriſtians; wherof one is holden in greater reuerence than the reſt, for the fame of a low vault in the ground, where it is reported the virgin Mary flying the fury of Herod, to haue repoſed herſelfe with her child Chriſt Ieſus the Sauiour of the World: another dedicated to the virgin Barbara: and the third to S. George, which amongſt thoſe nations are of great fame. Vnto the citie of New Caire, the citie of Bulacha is ioyned almoſt with continuall buildings. It is of an high and ſtately building, lying cloſe vnto the riuer Nilus, and was in Summer time frequented by the Mamalukes and other noble men, that they might at their pleaſure from their high places behold the inundation of that famous ri-
F uer. There land all the ſhips which come vp the riuer; yet the great meeting of the merchants is at New Caire. On the other ſide of the riuer ouer againſt Bulach, are many cottages made of hurdles and leaues of Date trees, the dwellings of poore fiſhermen and watermen. A little aboue Bulach is old Caire, which is alſo ioyned vnto the new city with continual buildings; yet diſtant from it about two miles and an halfe, and ſtandeth alſo faſt by the riuer of Nilus:

Ouer against it in the midst of the riuer is an Island, notable for the pleasantnesse of the gardens and banqueting houses therin: in it is an antient temple, famous for the loue of king Pharaos daughter and the danger of Moses (a most antient historie, yet euery where there still fresh in memorie.) But most part of the buildings of old Caire, are now grown into gardens & rude ruins. It is supposed by many probable coniectures, that there somtime stood the antient citie of Memphis. Vpon the banke of the riuer, the late Sultan Campson built a sumptuous tower, ouertopping the castle in new Caire, to conuay water thither out of Nilus; which being by many wheeles and ingenious deuises forced into the top therof, and there receiued into great cisterns, was from thence by pipes of stone & lead, conuaied into all places of the kings great pallace at new Caire. About fiue miles distant from old Caire on Affricke side, stand the Pyramides, monuments of the barbarous Ægyptian kings vanitie; whose proud names and titles Time hath worne out of those huge and wonderfull buildings, of purpose made for the vaine eternising of their fame and endlesse wealth; so that of them it may now well be said,

The pyramides of Egypt.

Miramur perisse homines? monumenta fatiscunt:
Interitus saxis nominibusque venit.

What wonder we that men doe die? the stately tombes do weare:
The verie stones consume to nought, with titles they did beare.

Within them are the sepulchers of the old Ægyptian kings, diuided into chappels, garnished with stone of great price curiously wrought. Yet are those places loathsome of smel, and for darknesse thereof, dreadfull to behold: for as men go downe to come into them by a narrow way, almost swarued vp with rubbish, their lights are oftentimes put out with the dampe of the earth and swarmes of remise flying about their eares. Some hauing got to the tops of them, report, that the watch tower of Alexandria, and the mouth of the riuer Nilus where it falleth into the sea, is from thence well to be seene: and that for the great height of them, a man cannot shoot an arrow so high as the midst of the lower tower wheron the spire standeth. Of these outragious buildings, are written many strange and almost incredible things, as that an hundred thousand men should be occupied continually by the space of twentie yeres, in building of one of them: during which time, the charges for roots, garlike, and onions only, amounted to 1600 talents of siluer. These wonderfull Pyramides only excepted, nothing is in the three cities more to be wondered at than the multitude of the people, who in number almost incredible go vp and downe euery street: but for most part ragged and torne, for that they which held any wealth, durst not make any shew therof for feare of the Mamalukes. The common people did then generally liue with mutton, hens, and rise, whereof the countrey yeeldeth plentie: neither had they as yet the knowledge of the curious but vnwholesome forced dishes, and prouocations of gluttonie, which other nations had to their great cost and hurt inuented. But againe to our purpose.

When Selymus vnderstood assuredly, that Tomombeius was retired into Caire, and that the Mamalukes hauing thither assembled all their strength, were resolued there to proue the vttermost of their fortune: he with his army drew neerer vnto the citie, exhorting his soldiers to set downe themselues that day for euer to vanquish and subdue their enemies, whom they had so many times before ouerthrown; & now a little to force themselues for the gaining of the rewards due to their former labors and victories: which (as he said) would be so many and so great, as they had not the full thereof before in their immoderat desires imagined. Telling them moreouer, that there was but a few good soldiers left with the desolat Sultan, who already wounded and terrified, and not able longer to keep the field, had made choice to end their daies in the sight & arms of their wiues and children. Beside that, he made them beleeue, that he was voluntarily sent for by the Ægyptians, deadly enemies vnto the very name of the Mamalukes, whose vtter destruction they earnestly expected: and had therefore promised him for the rooting vp of that wicked & cruell kind of men, to assaile them as occasion serued out of their houses, & so to further his victory: yet neuertheles he said, That the accomplishment of the whole matter, & to make a ful conquest, consisted in the subduing of those weak remainders of the vanquished & scattered army; forasmuch as they were not to be accounted as men quite quite ouercome, which did yet liue in hope, with weapons in their hands, possessed of the chiefe citie and seat of their Empire. Wherefore that they should thinke, That in the fortune of that day, rested the good or bad estate and condition of all their liues, honours, and fortunes. Assuring them, that it would be a matter but of small labour and trauell, to bring it to a wished end, if they would in that new kinde of fight (as they had alwayes valiantly in other battels vnder his conduct) but resolue with themselues, that they would ouercome.

This his speech much inflamed the minds of his souldiers; but the hope of so great a prey much more: so that being in good order and readie, they expected but the signe of the assault. When Selymus entering by the gate called Basuela, did at one instant thrust in his horsemen at diuers places of the great citie; but his Ianizaries he brought in by the greatest and largest street. At the first entrance of the citie, horsemen encountred with horsemen, and made a bloudie fight in the narrow streets and lanes: but the footmen placing their culuerins & falcons before, and suddenly discharging them where they saw the thickest troupes of their enemies, cleered the street directly before them. But when they came to the barricado's & trenches, and were by force to remooue the timber logges and other like things lying crosse the streets, and so to passe the trenches, the Mamalukes on the other side valiantly withstanding them; they fought with such force and obstinacie on both parts, that in the memorie of man was neuer a more fierce and cruell battell seene. For both the Mamalukes and the Turkes in that fight shewed the vttermost of their strength and power: not ignorant, that in that, as in the last, they were to fight not for honour onely, but euen for their liues and empire; when as greatest rewards, or else extreame miserie, were by dallying fortune on both sides propounded both to the vanquished and vanquisher. At these barricado's the Turks receiued great losse, as also at the trenches; for they vnaduisedly running on, the hindermost still bearing forward the foremost, tumbled by heapes one vpon another into the couert trenches, and were there miserably impailed vpon the sharpe stakes, for that purpose before set vp by the Mamalukes. The women also and children, with manly courage threw downe stones and tyles, and such other things from the tops of their houses, and out at their windowes, vpon the Turks: and they on the other side as they could espie them, fetcht them off from those high places with their harquebusies, or else violently brake into the houses from whence they were assailed, and there fought with diuers successe. But most part of the Ægyptians, diligently obseruing the fortune both of the one and of the other (accounting them both for enemies) with diuers affection assailed sometimes the Turks, and sometime the Mamalukes, seeming still notably to helpe that part whom they saw for the time to haue the better. Many cruell and most terrible incounters were at once made in diuers places of the citie: for as they crossed from street to street, somtime the one, and somtime the other hapned vpon new troups of enemies; and they which as victors pursued their enemies afront, were by others following them at the heeles, slain downright; so that in the victorie no man could assure themselues of safetie. The lanes and streets (a most horrible thing to behold) did so flow with the bloud of them which lay by heapes slaine, that the dust which at the first rose wonderfull thicke, was quite layd, as with a plentifull shoure of raine: the aire was darkned with the smoke of shot, and shoures of arrowes: and such was the clamour of the people and souldiers, the clattering of armour, and report of the artillerie, that the earth seemed to tremble, and the houses to fall downe.

A most mortall battel fought in Caire.

This dreadfull and doubtfull fight endured two whole dayes and nights without intermission: yet so, that the Mamalukes in number few, and not able to endure so long labour & watchings, giuing ground by little and little, and forsaking their first munitions, retyred themselues further into the citie. The third day, beset with the greatest dangers that could be, as to lose themselues with all that they had, (which commonly enforceth mens courages in their last attempts) they renewed the battell with such resolution, that they constrained the Turks to retyre a great way, and for hast to leaue behind them certaine of their field pieces. With which repulse it is reported, that Selymus dispairing of victorie, commanded to set fire vpon the houses; mooued thereunto with iust displeasure against the Ægyptians, for that Tonuses Bassa, now his greatest man of war, had euen before his face receiued a dangerous wound in his head, by a stone cast out at a window.

A long and terrible fight.

Now were the houses pittifully burning, and the Ægyptians weeping and wailing cried for mercie. The Turks themselues fought but faintly, expecting the found of the retreat: when newes newes was suddenly brought by many at once, that the enemies in the other side of the citie, were by Mustapha Bassa enforced to retire, and afterward had betaken themselues to flight, as to their last refuge. For Mustapha by the ouerture of the Ægyptians and fugitiue Mamalukes, was directed to a faire broad street, where the Mamalukes had left their horses readie sadled and bridled; that if the worst should chance, they might thither retire, & taking horse, speed themselues to such places of refuge as they had before thought vpon. All these horses, reserued by the Mamalukes as their last refuge, Mustapha tooke away, hauing before put to flight the garrison which kept them, which was but weake, consisting for most part of horse-boies, & mulerors; as safe enough in such a place of the citie as was least to be suspected and feared.

This accident (as it oftentimes falleth out in great and vnexpected mischances) did not a little daunt the courage of the Mamalukes: who now seeing themselues hardly beset, and that dreadfull battell by no other hope or helpe maintained, but onely by courage; being in their own iudgement ouercome, betooke themselues to flight. Most part of them hasting to the riuer of Nilus with Tomombeius (who in that battell had all in vaine proued the vttermost of his prowesse and policie) being transported ouer the riuer in boats, fled into the country of Segesta: others of them hid themselues in the houses of the Ægyptians, and in the loathsome corners of the citie. A thousand fiue hundred of the better sort of the Mamalukes fled vnto the greatest Temple of their vain Prophet: where after they had a great while valiantly defended themselues as out of a strong castle, because they would not yeeld themselues but vpon honourable conditions, at last ouercome with thirst, wearinesse, and wounds, together with the furie of the great artillerie, they yeelded themselues to the pleasure of the conqueror: part of whom the furious souldiers slew in the porch of the same Temple, and the rest within a few daies after were sent downe the riuer to Alexandria, there to be afterwards murthered.

Selymus hauing thus gained the victorie, forthwith sent part of his armie to quench the fire then raging, and caused proclamation to be made through al the city, That all the Mamalukes which would yeeld themselues within twelue houres, should bee taken to mercie; but vnto such as yeelded not within the appointed time, should remaine no hope of life. Vnto the Ægyptians also that should reueale the hidden Mamalukes, he proposed rewards: but to such as should conceale them, he threatned to impaile them vpon stakes, and hauing sold their wiues and children to burne their houses: vpon which proclamation, many of the Mamalukes before crept into corners, came forth and yeelded themselues, & were forthwith cast into yrons. All which were shortly after, contrarie to his promise, most dishonourably murthered in prison, because (as it was ginen out) they sought means to haue escaped. Many of the Ægyptians which would not breake the bonds of faith and fidelitie with the Mamalukes their old lords, beeing appeached by their malitious neighbours, most constantly died for their friends, for whose sake they had vowed themselues to death.

With this victorie the Turks growing insolent, ransackt euery place of the citie, drew out the Mamalukes that had hid themselues, and slew them, rifled the houses of the Ægyptians, as wel friends as foes, & left nothing shut vp or in secret. And some there were, which at one time in the same houses raged with couetousnesse, crueltie and lust; euery man fitting his own humour, whereunto hee was by nature or custome inclined: for that in time and place of so great libertie, most men, but especially the common souldier, flattereth himselfe to the full, making conscience of nothing, but measuring all thing according to his insolent and disordered appetite. The same day that Selymus tooke Caire, Gazelles (who but a little before by the commandement of Tomombeius, was gone to Thebais, to assemble the Arabians and to entertain new supplies) came to Caire; but finding all lost, and seeing no possibility either by force or policie to preuaile, and therefore thinking it not good againe to proue the fortune of war, which had so often with contrary course frustrated the endeuours both of himselfe and his partakers; he came to Selymus, vpon his faith before giuen for the safetie of himselfe and his followers (which were three Arabian captains, & a number of good horsmen) & being admitted to his presence, in the midst of his greatest captaines boldly spake vnto him as followeth:

Gazelles hit speech to Selymus.

If fortune, whom by thy great valour thou hast woone to bee thy friend, had not enuied our felicitie, thou shouldst not haue (most noble Selymus, at this time, after that all things haue giuen place vnto thy Valour, matter whereby thou mightest excell others in worthinesse of mind also. Whilest we

we were in arms against thee for our liues and kingdom, our wealth and state yet standing whole, we alwaies as men proudly presuming vpon their owne vaine strength, made little account of thee or the name of the Turkes; yea to say the truth, we hated thee as became enemies: But now that wee haue to the vttermost of our power made proofe of thy force, and haue in all battels beene put to the worse; admiring both thy wonderfull and diuine prowesse, and most prosperous victories (not giuen thee without the prouidence of the immortall God) wee humbly come vnto thee by thy goodnesse to better our hard and aduerse fortune: that thou by sparing and pardoning thy vanquished and yeelding enemies (by which onely vertue men come neerest vnto the gods) maiest extend thy name and fame aboue the bounds of the rest of thine immortall glorie. Wee haue faithfully serued Tomombeius, so long as hee held the strength and maiestie, yea but the name of a king, or liued in any countenance: but seeing hee is (his Destinie so requiring) driuen out of his countrey, and wandereth the desarts, with vncertaine report whether he liue or not; wee come vnto thee, rather as men of him forsaken, than such as haue forsaken their Prince; readie to shew vnto thee our loyaltie and valour in our better condition and state: if we may by thy goodnesse, changing our hard fortune, liue and serue vnder thy worthie conduct.

Selymus, for that he right well knew Gazelles both for his vertue and valor, wherewith valiant men win credit euen with their greatest enemies, and also desiring to ioyne in league and friendship with the Arabians (or rather Alarbes) whom he knew of all others to be most to be feared, receiued them all courteously: appointing vnto euery one of them an honourable pension, and persuading them to forget their old estate, willed them to looke for far greater things of his bountie. Not long after, when as the Moores and wild Arabians, with certaine Mamalukes that were fled to the citie of Achasia, made incursions into the country about Caire, and oftentimes did cut off the Turkes which went any thing far from the citie to seeke abroad for forrage, he sent Gazelles with part of his armie to represse them: who hauing quickly won and sackt Achasia, and slaine most part of those aduenturers, to his owne great praise, and the wonderfull contentation of Selymus, honorably returned in lesse time than was expected.

In the meane time, Tomombeius in the countrey of Segesta (which is on the other side of Nilus towards Cyrenaica) miserably beset with so many mischiefes, began to make head againe. There were come vnto him a strong companie of Mamalukes from Alexandria, which he had by letters sent for out of the garrison of that citie, and many others had followed him in his flight from Caire. And there were not wanting many great men amongst the Arabians and Moores (the inhabitants of that countrey) which promised him their helpe and furtherance. Beside that, many of the Ægyptians, whose houses and families were become a prey & booty vnto the insolent Turks, promised him, That if he would by night come to Caire, they would raise such a tumult in the citie, as should easily worke the confusion of the Turks; forasmuch as they all hauing endured most horrible indignities and villanies, could no longer abide those most insolent men to rage and raign ouer them. They sent him word also, that the Turks huge army was now brought to a contemptible number, most part of them being slain in the battell at Caire: and the rest being for the greatest part brought to extreame weakenesse with wounds and sickenesse. For which causes, as Tomombeius his forces increased daily, so hope also, which neuer failed the poore vanquished and distressed king, began now also to reuiue in his inuincible heart, aboue the condition of his miserable estate. So that fawning fortune, which euen then most cruelly and despightfully went about vtterly to supplant him (of all other distressed princes most miserable) seemed but then first to change her frowning countenance, and to promise vnto him more happie and prosperous successe.

Albuchomar discouereth to Selymus the power of Tomombeius, and the trecherie of them of caire.

Whilest Tomombeius was making this preparation, one Albuchomar, an Ægyptian, for authoritie and wealth the greatest man by far in all the countrey of Segesta, whether it were to auert the miserie of the present war out of his countrey; or else by the pleasure of his reuolt to gain the good liking of Selymus, vpon whom all things seemed to fawne, came and certified him both of Tomombeius his strength, & of the new practises of the citizens of Caire. Whereupon Selymus caused strong watch and ward to be kept in all places of that great citie: and such citizens as he suspected to fauor Tomombeius, he shut vp into the castle; which being before abandoned by Tomombeius, was then together with the citie in his possession: and placed al alongst the Riuer, boates furnished with men and artillerie, to keepe and defend the farther banke

Whilest Tomombeius was making this preparation, one Albuchomar, an Ægyptian, for authoritie and wealth the greatest man by far in all the countrey of Segesta, whether it were to auert the miserie of the present war out of his countrey; or else by the pleasure of his reuolt to gain the good liking of Selymus, vpon whom all things seemed to fawne; came and certified him
F both of Tomombeius his strength, & of the new practises of the citizens of Caire. Whereupon Selymus caused strong watch and ward to be kept in all places of that great citie: and such citizens as he suspected to fauor Tomombeius, he shut vp into the castle; which being before abandoned by Tomombeius, was then together with the citie in his possession: and placed al alongst the Riuer, boates furnished with men and artillerie, to keepe and defend the farther banke.

of Nilus, and to impeach Tomombeius his passage ouer. Yet considering with himselfe, with G how great danger he had so many times fought with those desperat enemies, and what a difficultie it would be to intercept Tomombeius, (protracting the war in those vast and vnknowne countries, and still preparing greater forces, without whom he could nothing assure himselfe of all his former victories) to proue if he might be woon by clemencie and bountie, he resolued to send Embassadours vnto him, to persuade him to lay downe armes, and after so manie ouerthrowes, at length to acknowledge the fortune of the victor: and withall to promise him vpon the faith of a Prince, That if he would come in and submit himselfe, he should of the curtesie and bountie of the conquerour, vpon conditions reasonable repossesse that his late Kingdome, which he should neuer be able by force to regaine. But if he would needs desperatly proceed to make head againe, forgetting his offered grace, together with his own disabilitie, he should afterward when the matter was againe tried by battell, by his owne iust desert H neuer more find at the hands of his angrie enemie, any regard of his princely state or dignitie.

The causes mooning Selymus to send Embassadors to Tomombeius.

For Selymus seeing himselfe by the course of his victories drawn into a far country, and not without cause fearing with so small a power as he had left, to be oppressed in that so great and populous a citie, euen with the verie multitude, men of doubtfull faith; thought it better by some honorable composition to assure himselfe of some great part of that he had woon, than by going on, to thrust himselfe with his armie into new dangers, with the hazard of all. Besides that, he was certainly aduertised, That the Mamalukes before fled into diuers countries, were in euery place leuying new supplies of horsemen: and that the fleet which gone into the Arabian gulfe against the Portugals, was dayly expected at the port Suezzia, wherein were three I thousand Mamalukes, vnder the leading of Amyrases and Ray Salomon, two expert captaines, with great store of good brasse ordnance: by which good helpes Tomombeius stood in faire possibilitie to recouer his former losses, and to returne againe to Caire, whither he was by his secret friends most earnestly inuited. But aboue all things, the care he had of the Persians most induced him to think of peace: for feare that if the Bassa whom he had left at the mountain Taurus, should not be able to withstand the forces of the Persian King, he should so be excluded out of Asia the lesser, and Syria also, before his fleet could from Constantinople arriue with new supplies of men and victuall at Alexandria.

Selymus his embassadors slaine by the Mamalukes.

Wherefore he sent certaine of the most reuerend of his Turkish Religious, and with them some of the most honorable Ægyptians, Embassadors to Tomombeius: who passing ouer Nilus, into the country Segesta, were without further hearing, with more than barbarous crueltie K slaine by certaine Mamalukes which chanced vpon them: thinking thereby to gratifie Tomombeius, as yet not knowing of any such matter, and to manifest their affection towards him, as also that they were not desirous of any peace with the Turks.

This proud and insolent fact vtterly brake Selymus his patience, and shortly after made an end of that mortall war, together with the honour of the Mamalukes. For he being a man of an hot and cruell nature, euen when he was nothing at all mooued, could by no means brooke that his enemies, so often vanquished and put to flight, should so lightly reiect his offers vnto them as the case stood, both honorable and profitable; and that worse was, violate his Embassadors against the law of Nations, most religiously kept euen amongst the most barbarous and L sauage people. Wherefore prouoked by so great an iniury, he carefully prouided for all things necessarie for his expedition into Segesta against Tomombeius. And because it stood not with his honour (as he tooke it) nor with the good of the present seruice, to passe the riuer by boats, he gathering together all the small vessels and lighters he could possibly, made therof a large and strong bridge ouer Nilus.

Tomombeius vnderstanding by his espials, and from his friends at Caire, of the preparations of Selymus, & of the bridge he had made; fearing also the reuolt of the country people, whom he probably suspected to be alienated frō him, by the reuolt of Albuchomar, a man of so great power and authoritie amongst them; determined once again to proue the fortune of battell, which had so often deceiued his expectation. For he justly measuring of his own strength, and finding himselfe in all things inferior to his mightie enemie, wel saw that he was neither able M to protract the wars, neither in open field to abide his comming with all his forces; and to flie further into the deserts, was as he deemed it, nothing else but to make shipwrack of that small remainder that was left of his honour and credit. Wherefore by the aduice of his best captains (which

A (which was the last indeuor both of himselfe and of the Mamalukes) he departed betime out of the prouince of Segesta with foure thousand Mamalukes, and twice as many Moores and Arabians, and trauelled day and night without intermission to come to the riuer Nilus. By that despetat attempt to deceiue the Turks, suspecting no such thing from their vanquished & weak enemy: as also by celeritie to preuent the fame of his comming; hoping so by his sudden & vnexpected approch to ouerthrow that part of the Turkes army which should first passe the riuer, before they could possibly be relieued from the other side. Neither was hee deceiued in the computation of the time, which he hauing before exactly cast, with the maner of his trauell, fel out so fitly, that he came to the place he desired, euen at such time as the Asian horsmen were come ouer the bridge, as he had before guessed. The harbengers & pa-
B ges of Selymus his chamber, which were gone somthing further than the rest, to make choice of the most commodious place for the erecting of the Emperors pauilion; by the rising of the dust, first perceiued the comming of the enemie: and Mustapha the great Bassa aduertised therof, suddenly raised an alarum: which so vnexpected a matter brought a great feare both on them which were already past ouer, & also on them that were on the further side of the riuer.

Tomombeius distresseth the Turks in passing the bridge made ouer Nilus.

Tomombeius presently assailing his enemies, as yet but putting themselues in order, and repairing to their ensignes, at the first onset slew such as made resistance, and the rest he discomfited and put to flight. Neither was Mustapha the great commander (although he did what possibly he could, by his owne example to haue incouraged them) able either by his own inuincible courage or other persuasion, after his first rankes were ouerthrowne, to repaire his dis-C ordered battell, or stay the flight of his men: for in that so hot and sudden a skirmish all was full of tumult, slaughter, doubtfulnesse, and feare; and all alongst the banke of the riuer, both aboue & beneath the bridge, were to be seen fearfull companies of the Turks, ruthfully looking vpon the riuer, and crying vnto their fellowes on the other side for helpe. Many forced by the furious enemy, tooke the riuer and there perished: others striuing at the end of the bridge, to returne that way, and ouerborne by their fellowes or others continually sent from the further side, or els amazed with feare, fel into the riuer, & were there drowned: the bridge was so broad, that foure horsemen abrest might easily passe ouer at once, and so great numbers of them in short space bee conueyed ouer. But when the great ordnance (the Turkes chiefe strength) was also to be transported, fewer troupes of horsemen were sent ouer, than either
D the greatnesse of the present danger, or suddennesse of the chance required. Neither did their great artillerie as then stand them in any stead, for that it could neither so speedily be conueied ouer, nor without great hurt be discharged from the hither banke to the further, by reason of their owne men standing betweene them and the enemie.

In the meane time Selymus, who in the beginning of the skirmish came downe to the riuers side, filled a great number of boats and other small vessels with his Ianizaries with their harquebusies, and withall hasted his horsemen ouer the bridge to relieue their fellowes distressed on the further side: in which boats the nimble watermen vsed such diligence in landing of some, and presently in fetching ouer of others, that in short time they had transported diuers bands of those most ready and valiant souldiers: whose comming wonderfully comforted the E Asian soldiers, euen now at the last cast, and readie to haue giuen ouer. Canoglis also, the Tartar kings son and Selymus his brother in law, encouraging his horsemen to take the riuer, with losse of some few of his men recouered the further side, to the great admiration of the beholders: which in that nation was not so much to be maruelled at, as they which by troupes with their horses had oftentimes swam ouer the great riuers Taurus and Volga, no lesse dangerous than was the riuer Nilus.

Tomombeius at the same time, for that he saw speedy victorie to consist in one thing especially, ferring his troupes together, strained himselfe with might and maine to haue gained the head of the bridge, that by plucking away some few of the first boats, he might shut in his enemies already come ouer; and by cutting the cables wherby the boats were fastened to the F banke, all the bridge with the Turks vpon it, might be born away with the force and violence of that great riuer: whereupon rise a most cruell and deadly fight, for the resolute Mamalukes in the front of their battell fought valiantly: and Mustapha well considering the danger, had drawn to that place both his ensignes & his best soldiers: so that there was fought such a fight, as a matter of so great consequence required: the Mamalukes plainly seeing, that if they could obtain the place, they ſhould ſhortly after with little ado, ouerthrow all the former victories G of their enemies. And the Turks no leſſe ignorant, that except they kept the bridge whole, they were all but loſt men that were already come ouer; and that the reſt of the army together with their Emperor ſo far from home, and in the midſt of his enemies, muſt of neceſſity ſhortly after run the ſame fortune. But Muſtapha well relieued by the Ianizaries and the Europeian horſmen, which were now come ouer in great number, not only receiued his enemies charge; but preſſing vpon them, gained ground, and by little and little inforced them to retire. This is that Muſtapha the Hungarian, and Baiazet his ſonne in law, which for his owne glory and perpetuall fame, built that notable, ſtately, and ſumptuous ſtone bridge (of the ſpoiles of this vi-ctorie) ouer the riuer Stremon, which at this day men paſſing ouer into Thracia, wonder at, as at a worke beſeeming the greatneſſe of the Roman Empire. H

Tomombeius, to giue a time of breathing to his Mamaluks, who, their horſes for wearines now fainting vnder them, were not able longer to ſhew their wonted courage; & deſirous by them againe to proue the vttermoſt fortune of the battel, exhorted the Moores & Arabians, a while to charge the enemy, which thing they after the maner of their fight valiantly performed: and and renewed the battel; with ſuch fury, that Selymus doubting the victorie (although hee was by his moſt faithful counſellors perſuaded to the contrary) yet doubted not to aduenture the bridge, and in perſon himſelfe to go and relieue his diſtreſſed ſouldiers: who by his comming

In all the East a king more blest was no where to be found, Nor in the East one more accurst liu'd not vpon the ground,
Than Tomombeius, Ægypts griefe, sometime for store of gold,
Of power great for martiall force, and kingdome he did hold.
But taken by his cruell foe, may good example be Both to the happie and distrest, of mans vncertaintie.
Why do'st thou fondly laugh? Why do'st thou vainly crie?
Canst thou from henceforth stay thy selfe, and thinke th'art borne to die?
My garments were the royall robes, I wore the crowne of gold,
With richest stones most richly set, most glorious to behold:
My necke adorn'd with richest gems which I did sometimes weare:
but now trust vp in shamefull rope, behold me hanging here.

The Ægyptians in doubt of their estate beside the death of Tomombeius.

This miserie befell Tomombeius the 13 of Aprill, in the yere 1517, vpon the Munday in Easter weeke. There were many which shed teares to behold that so cruell and lamentable a spectacle, who by their wofull countenance and pitifull lamentation seemed to detest that foule and vnworthie death of their late Sultan: notwithstanding that the Ianizaries reproued them therfore, and threatned them with death, who like giddie braind fooles (as they termed them) enured to the slauery of the Mamalukes, ioyfully and thankfully accepted not of their deliuerance; for the Ægyptians were as yet vncertaine of their estate, and therefore as men in suspence (not without cause) stood in doubt what should become of themselues: fearing lest the Turks, a warlike nation, and a terrour to all the princes of Europe and Asia, nothing more courteous than the Mamalukes, should with no lesse insolencie rage and tyrannize ouer them, vnder their warlike and cruell Emperor. Besides that, the wofull sight of Tomombeius hanging in the gate, as the vnworthy scorne of fortune, wonderfully wounded their hearts: for why, it was yet fresh in their remembrance, that he with the good liking of all men, and general fauor of the nobilitie, with good fame rise vp all the degrees of honor both in field and court, vnto the height of regall dignitie; and therfore grieued the more to see him by ineuitable destinie cast downe headlong, so shamefully to end his life and empire together. A notable spectacle vndoubtedly amongst the rarest examples of worldy fragilitie, both to the happie and vnfortunat: the one, not to be too proud, or too much to flatter themselues in their greatest blisse; and the other, to learne thereby with patience to indure the heauie and vnworthy changes and chances of this wretched and miserable world. And so much the more did Tomombeius so hanging, moue men to compassion, for that the maiestie of his tall and strong bodie, and reuerend countenance, with his long and hoarie beard, well agreed with his imperiall dignitie and martiall disposition. The same fortune with Tomombeius ran also diuers of the princes of the Mamalukes with some others of the common sort also.

Tomombeius thus taken out of the way, and all the Mamalukes almost slaine, and no power of the enemie to be heard of in all Ægypt to renew the war: Selymus diuiding his forces, sent them forth with his captaines, to take in the countries and prouinces of Ægypt lying further off. They of Alexandria after the battel of Caire hauing thrust out the garison, and easily surprised the castle of Pharus (which the weake defendants chose rather vpon hope of present reward to deliuer, than with doubtfull euent to defend) yeelded themselues many daies before vnto the Turks. Damiata also, called in antient time Pelusium, opened their gates, and submitted themselues to the victors. There was no citie betwixt the riuer of Nilus and the borders of Iudea and Arabia, which yeelded not to the obedience of Selymus. The kings also of Affricke bordering vpon Cyrenaica, tributaries or confederats of the Ægyptian Sultans, sent their embassadors with presents to Selymus.

There remained now none but the wild Arabians (a people neuer to be tamed) & especially they of Affricke, who hauing lost many of their friends and kinsmen in aiding Tomombeius.

would not (as it was thought) submit themselues vnto the Turkish obedience. This wandering kind of people, liuing for most part by theft, had filled the countries from Euphrates, where it runneth by the Palmyrens, with all the inner parts of Ægypt and Affricke vnto the Atlantick sea, with huge multitudes of men: and being diuided into many companies vnder diuers leaders haue no certain dwelling places, but liue an hard and frugall kind of life in tents and waggons, after the manner of the Tartars: their greatest wealth is a good seruiceable horse, with a launce or a bundle of darts: they were alway at discord & variance amongst themselues, by reason whereof they could neuer agree for the expulsing of the Mamalukes, who otherwise had not bin able to haue stood against them, if they should haue ioined their forces together. So that the late Ægyptian Sultans seemed to hold their state and empire among so populous a nation, rather by their discord than their own strength: wherefore Selymus hauing now by fit men, vpon his faith before giuen, allured many of their chiefetains and greatest commanders to Caire, honorably both entertained and rewarded them. By whose example others moued, came also in daily: and hauing receiued their rewards, gaue the oath of their allegeance to Selymus. Others which could by no faire promises or words be won, being cunningly intercepted by other captains, and deliuered to Selymus, indured the paines of their vaine obstinacie and malice. The other remote nations toward Æthyopia, as they had in former time rather acknowledged the friendship than the command of the Ægyptian Sultans, so now induced with the fame of the victorie, easily ioyned in like amitie with the Turke.

Selymus cunningly reduceth the Arabians to his obedience.

About the same time, Selymus sent certaine troupes of horsemen to Suezzia, a port of the red sea (of old called Arsinoe) about three daies iourney from Caire: in which port Campson the great Sultan (a little before the comming of the Turks) had with infinit charge and foure yeares trauell built a strong fleet against the Portingals, who by their conquests in India had taken away all the rich trade of the Indian marchandise into the gulfe of Arabia, to the great hinderance of the Ægyptian kings customes: ouer which fleet (a little before the beginning of the Turkish warres) Campson had appointed one Amyrases and Ray Salomon Generals, with a strong power of Mamalukes and great store of ordnance, against the Portingals. These valiant captains hauing yet done nothing in the seruice they were appointed vnto, as they lay at Gidda (the port of the famous citie of Mecha, wherein is the temple of their great Prophet Mahomet) vnderstanding of the death of Campson, and of the comming of Selymus into Ægypt, fell at variance betwixt themselues; one of them being willing to continue his obedience towards the new Sultan, & the other no lesse desirous to follow the good fortune of the victor. Whereupon a mutinie arising among the soldiers, Amyrases, who fauored Tomombeius, was inforced to flie to Mecha. But shortly after, Ray Salomon requiring to haue him, & threatning all hostilitie except he were forthwith deliuered, he was apprehended by them of Mecha, fearing to haue Gidda their port spoiled, and so sent back again to the fleet. Ray Salomon, that he might be Admirall alone, his associat being taken out of the way, and by some notable fact to insinuat himselfe into the fauor of the conqueror, caused Amyrases in the night to be cast ouerboord: and giuing to the soldiers two months pay, and swearing them to the obedience of Selymus, in few daies sailing came backe again to Arsinoë, where leauing the fleet, he came directly himselfe to Selymus at Caire, of whom he was graciously receiued. After that, all the princes which were before tributaries or confederats to the late Sultans of Ægypt, euen to the confines of Dauid, the most mighty king of Æthyopia (whom some call Presbiter Iohn) without delay entred into the like subiection or confederation with the Turks.

Ægypt, with all the prouinces thereunto belonging, thus brought into subiection, Selymus about the beginning of Iuly, sayled downe the riuer of Nilus to Alexandria (Cortug-Ogli, a famous pyrat of Halicarnassus, sitting at the helme of his gallie) there to take view of his fleet but lately come from Constantinople with new supplies both of men and victuals, sent from Pyrrhus Bassa and his sonne Solyman: which after he had well surueyed, and diligently viewed the wals of the citie, and of the castle of Pharos, he returned againe to Caire. In the meane time, the Mamalukes in durance at Alexandria, were by his commandement murthered euery mothers sonne, in the entrance of the prison. At which time also aboue fiue hundred families of the noblest and richest of the Ægyptians were commaunded to remoue from Caire to Constantinople, and a great number of women and children, of the race of the Mamalukes, were transported thither also in ships hired for that purpose. Into this fleet besides the kings of his soueraigne the most certaine tokens of his heauie displeasure: yet as he was a man of great spirit, answered boldly, That he had forbidden the soldiers wages to be augmented, contrary to his maiesties command, not vpon any euil meaning to haue inuerted that mony to his own vse, neither thereby to haue drawn any man of purpose into disgrace, as was by some his malicious enemies suggested but; vpon great reason, therby to prouide for his maiesties cofers wonderfully emptied with those late wars: beside that, the constant report of new troubles like to arise out of Persia, gaue good occasion for him to spare vnnecessarie charges: Whereas on the other side, as he said, the garrison souldiers were already inriched with the plentifull spoiles of Ægypt, & in a most goodly city possessed the sumptuous houses & lands of the Mamalukes, feeding vpon the goods of the Ægyptians, & had already receiued both greater pay & more bountiful rewards from him, than euer any soldiers had from any his predecessors the Othoman kings: in which case, if they were not past al modestly, they might wel enough take it in good part, if they were somthing restrained in their vnreasonable requests. He alledged moreouer, that great princes which retain their soldiers in reasonable pay in time of peace and war, ought sometime for warlike discipline, to require of them a moderation of their desires; lest whilest they all striue with greedinesse for their priuat gain, there want mony afterwards in the common treasurie to maintain a greater and more necessarie charge, wars still rising vpon wars; seeing that no commander, were he neuer so valiant or fortunat, euer did any great matter in wars, if he wanted coine, the most proper instrument & very sinues of war, answering vnto his other most heroicall parts & sufficiencie. But as he was yet thus speaking, Selymus full of wrath and indignation interrupted him; for if he should haue suffered him in longer discourse to haue recounted his former deserts & worthy seruice done, aswell in the time of his father Baiazet, as of late euen in his owne presence, he was like enough to haue had of them that were able to do most with him, intercessors for him: and so without further delay, caused him euen there in his own presence to be executed: saying moreouer, that others which would arrogantly presume to prescribe vnto their soueraignes what they had to do, should for euer after by the example of that most insolent seruant, be admonished of their duty and condition. It is reported, that the souldiers in despight of Selymus wonderfully lamented the vnworthie death of this so worthy a man: for he, beside his notable & rare valour, so many times to his great honor in sundry battels approued, had by the dexteritie of his Grecian wit, comelines of personage, militarie eloquence, & gallant maner of liuing, so won the loue and fauor of all men, that there was few or none in all the army which did not acknowledge himselfe some way indebted & beholden vnto him; & did therfore condemne the Emperors crueltie. They then began to tel how Mustapha syrnamed Caloger, a man of wonderful credit and authority both with Baiazet & himselfe, was in the heat of his furie slain without hearing: and that in like maner of rage, old Chendemus a man of greatest honor & integritie of life, and of all the chiefetains which came out of the great Emperor Mahomets nurserie, the most skilful, had bin for his graue and wholsome counsell onely, without cause murthered: neither was then Bostanges his son in law forgoten: neither Cherseogles (the one most honourable for the great place he held in court and the marriage of Baiazets daughter, and the other a man of no lesse marke being his great Admiral, & bearing himselfe high vpon his infinit wealth, but more vpon his wife one of the daughters of Selymus) both which two noble gentlemen about a yeres before had their heads strucke off, no man wel knowing wherfore; and their dead bodies cast out at the court gate, to the terror of the beholders, as a miserable spectacle of their own miserie and the Emperors cruelty. Yea the remembrance of his old tirannie (renewed as it were with this late outrage) presented a fresh vnto al mens eys the reuerent old Emperor Baiazet his father, with his two brethren, Achomates & Corcutus, by right both called vnto the empire before himselfe; with many other yong princes of the Bloud, of great hope & expectation, who as all men knew, perished through the vnnaturall and execrable cruelty of this most merciless man. So that men generally did both feare him and hate him. Forasmuch as he without all feare of God or regard of worldly shame, accounted no practise wicked, or deuise detestable, that might serue for the better establishing of his kingdome; and had set downe in his minde, (long before corrupted with ambition and tyrannie) That it was far better for the assurance of his estate, to be feared of all than beloued of many: and therfore spared no mans life, of whom he had but the lest suspition. Howbeit that the seueritie [illegible] him vsed against this so great a man and

and so gracious with the people, may in some sort be excused, as iustly moued thereunto by the presumptuous and malicious dealing of the proud Bassa vnder-hand, contrary to the charge giuen him by his lord, to the peril of those his great but late conquests both in Ægypt and Syria.

This great Bassa, whilest he yet liued and flourished in the court, in nothing so much offended the minds of the people (who generally both loued and honoured him) as by the crueltie by him shewed vpon the person of the faire Lady Manto his best beloued wife. Who being a Greeke borne, and adorned with all the good gifts of nature, whereunto her louely conditions were also answerable, was by Zebalia her first husband (a man of great honor) carried with him into the wars, as his greatest treasure and chiefe delight. But he slaine, and she by misfortune falling into the hands of the Turks (her enemies) remained so prisoner with them for a time; vntill that this great Bassa Ionuses shortly after (seeing her amongst the other captiues there taken, so far to exceed the rest as doth the Sun the lesser starres) surprised with her incomparable beautie, became of her amorous: and in too curious viewing of the captiue Ladie, was by her himselfe taken prisoner. Where finding her outward perfections graced with no lesse inward vertues, and her honourable mind answerable vnto her rare feature, tooke her vnto his wife; honouring her farre aboue all the rest of his wiues and concubines: and shee againe in all dutifull loyaltie seeking to please him, for a space liued in all worldly felicitie and blisse, not much inferiour vnto one of the great Sultanesses. But long lasteth not the Summer fruit of wanton loue, blasted most time in the blossome, and rotten before it be well gathered: for in short time the Bassa more amorous of her person, than secured in her vertues, and after the manner of sensuall men, still fearing lest that which so much pleased himselfe, gaue no lesse contentment to others also: began to haue her in distrust, although he saw no great cause, why, more than his owne conceit, not grounded vpon any her euill demeanor, but vpon the excesse of his own liking. Which mad humor (hardly to be ouer purged) of it self still more and more in him increasing, he became so froward and imperious, that nothing she could say or do could now so please or content him, but that he still thought some one or other, although he wist not who, to be therein partakers with him. So fearefull was the iealous man of his owne conceits. Yet could he not chuse but loue those great perfections; whereat he could not enough wonder, although he found no contentment therein, tormenting still both himselfe and her whom he so dearely loued with his owne passionat distrust: vntill at length, the faire ladie grieued to see her self thus without cause to be suspected, and wearied with the insolent pride of her peeuish husband, together with his imperious commands, determined secretly to depart from him, and so to returne againe into her owne country. Which her purpose she discouered vnto one of her Eunuches, to whom she had also deliuered certaine letters to be by him conuaied vnto such of her friends, as whose helpe she was to vse in her intended flight; which letters the false eunuch opened, & so for the more manifesting of the matter deliuered them vnto the Bassa his master. Who therewith inraged, and calling her vnto him, forthwith in his furie, with a dagger stabd her to the heart and slew her: so together with the death of his loue, hauing cured his tormenting jealousie. The liuely counterfeits of these two so notable personages thus vnworthily slaine, the one by the imperious commaund of his soueraigne, and the other by the cruell hand of her husband, thou maiest in the pages following behold, as they are by Boisardus expressed.

Reijce Sultani titulos, Nilotica Memphis
Quos confert : erit hic inuidiosus honos.
Regna Tomombeo, Campson, cum rege reliquit : Virtutis Selymus dicit id esse tuæ.

Reject the Sultans titles, which proud Memphis doth thee show:
From such great honours oftentimes doth greatest danger grow.
That Campson with great Tomombey lost both their state and fame:
Vnto thy valour, Selymus doth yet ascribe the same.

Formam si spectes, nihil est formosius ista :
Pectoris & casti gratia rara fuit.
Sed dum dissimuli vixit male iuncta marito :
Infelix misera morte perempta iacet.

RICH. KNOLLEVS.

If feature braue thou do'st respect, thou canst none fairer see,
Nor in whose chast and constant brest, could greater graces lie.
But whilst mismatcht she liu'd to mourne, inthral'd to iealous braine, Vnhappie she with cruell hand, was by her husband slaine.

But leauing this great Bassa with faire Manto vnto their rest, his course thus run, to returne againe vnto Selymus; who now come into Syria, was by letters from the Himbracor-Bassa or master of his horse (whom he had left vpon the frontiers of his kingdome to attend the motions of the Persians) aduertised, That the Persian preparations which had raised such a hoat rumor of wars in the beginning of Winter, was growne cold in the heat of Sommer: and that he had seene in all the time of his abode in those quarters, none but certaine stragling companies, making shew as if some greater power had bin comming, which had many times made sudden roads into the countrey, with whom he had sundry times prosperously encountered:

& it was generally reported by [illegible] prisoners as he had taken, & by his own espials also, that Hysmael, troubled with the Hyrcanians and Tartars, had conuerted the greatest part of his forces against those nations: so the Winter now drawing fast on, and deepe snowes alreadie fallen vpon the mountaine Taurus, he could not though he would that yeare looke after Asia the lesse, or Syria. There were that reported, that the Tartars which dwell betweene the two riuers, Tanais and Volga, were by Selymus his procurement, and mony, set a worke to keep Hysmael busied, by inuading the Iberians and Albanians, which were vnder his protection: which thing he wrought by the means of Mahomet his father in law, the Bosphoran king, who being of the same language and nation, by rewards easily induced the needy captains of the Tartars his friends and confederats, to take vp armes against their neighbours.

Many men maruelled that Hysmael the Persian king neglected so faire an opportunity, whereby he might (as most men thought) haue thrust Selymus quite out of Asia and Syria, whilest he was thus busied in Ægypt, yea and easily haue destroied him, shut vp with all his power, especially at such time as the Ægyptian Sultans Campson and Tomombeius made so great resistance. But they which could better iudge of the matter, saw that Hysmael was not of so great power and strength abroad, as at home: for his armie for most part consisted of gentlemen, or such as were by custome bound to serue him in his defensiue wars, voluntary men, and such as serued without pay. These as they were the most valiant horsemen of the East, so did they with singular valour worthily defend the kingdome of Persia, and also as occasion required, make war with their neere neighbours: but if any longer expedition were to be taken in hand, that they could by no meanes away withall, accounting it a grieuous thing to depart from their wiues, vnto whom they are so addicted, that oftentimes they carrie them with them into the wars; and being a wanton & fine kind of people, are not able without wages to draw after them according to their accustomed manner, so many carriages and horses as might serue both for their necessarie and wanton vses. With which difficultie, the great king Vsun Cassanes, Hysmael his grandfather by the mothers side, was much troubled in his wars against Mahomet the great: but was now much harder for Hysmael to doe, for that he hauing obtained his grandfathers kingdome by the meere good will of the people, easing them forthwith of their heauie impositions, alwaies thought the loue of his subiects (which is easily gotten with bountie and iustice) the surest riches of his kingdome; and that to command only ouer the bodies and goods of his people, their hearts altogether alienated and lost by most heauy and grieuous exactions, seemed not the part of a gracious and naturall prince, but of an outragious and momentarie tyrant. Whereas Selymus on the contrary part, who had by force, mischiefe, and most detestable practises stept vp into his fathers seat, had after the manner of the Othoman kings reposed his greatest and most assured strength in a seruile & mercinarie kind of men, whom he might for pay as his owne creatures, at his pleasure draw farre from home, and as he best liked lead them from place to place, and countrey to countrey, for the enlarging of his empire, and eternising of his name: and therefore according to the qualitie of his people, deemed true and ready power to consist only in money, and the seueritie of his owne command; whereby he had learned with most happie successe, in short time to obscure all the victories of the former Othoman kings, with the greatnesse of his owne.

1518 All the Winter following, Selymus staied with his armie in Syria, spending the time in visiting the ports & cities of that prouince, and setting of things in order, for the better assurance thereof. But vpon the approch of the Spring, when he certainly vnderstood, that by the procurement of Leo the tenth, then bishop of Rome, the Christian Princes were entered into consultation to make war vpon him, and that supplications with great solemnitie were made for that purpose, and honourable embassadors sent into all prouinces to stir vp the greatest kings of Christendome against him, he (leauing Gazelles his lieutenant in Syria) by great iournies returned to Constantinople: from thence as at hand to behold the deuises and motions of Christian Princes his enemies. In the mean time, fearing no alteration to arise in the prouinces of Syria and Ægypt, forasmuch as he well saw, that Cayerbeius and Gazelles, his lieutenants, being at deadly hatred betwixt themselues (as well for old grudges, as for the late treason of Cayerbeius, the great cause of the ruine of the Mamalukes kingdome) would neuer agree in one against him, but rather with a certaine emulation striue betwixt themselues with diligence, faithfulnesse, & moderation, who should deserue best in well gouerning the prouinces by him committed committed to their charge, as indeed they did during the short time of his raigne. 1519

Selymus being arriued at Constantinople, and purposing from thenceforth to turne all his forces vpon the Christians, caused wonderfull preparation to be made for his wars, but especially at sea: whereby it was thought, that he would haue either attempted the strong Iland of the Rhodes (a great moat in his eye) or else some part of Italie. But as he was hatching this mischiefe, or some other of no lesse importance, and in the meane time delighted himselfe with visiting the cities of Grecia and Thrace, and solaced himselfe in the pleasant countrey about Hadrianople, he was suddenly attached with the hand of God, and strucken in the reins of his backe with a canker: which melancholie and deuouring maladie contemning all cure, did by little and little so eat and corrupt his body, as that he before so much honored, became now loathsome and odious both to himselfe and others.

Selymus purposing to inuade the Christians, striken ouer the reins of his backe with a canker.

As he lay thus languishing, his incurable disease still increasing, leaning his head in the lap of Pyrrhus the Bassa, whom of all others he most loued, said, O Pyrrhus, I see I must shortly die without remedie. Whereupon the graue Bassa tooke occasion to discourse with him of many matters: and amongst others, that it would please him to giue order for the well bestowing of the great wealth taken from the Persian merchants in diuers places of his empire: persuading him to bestow the same vpon some notable hospitall for reliefe of the poore. To whom Selymus replied, Wouldst thou Pyrrhus, that I should bestow other mens goods, wrongfully taken from them, vpon workes of charity and deuotion, for mine owne vaine glorie and praise? assuredly I will neuer doe it: nay, rather see they be againe restored vnto the right owners. Which was forthwith done accordingly: to the great shame of many Christians, who minding nothing lesse than restitution, but making ex rapina holocaustam, doe out of a world of euill gotten goods cull out some small fragments, to build some poore hospitall, or mend some blind way; a poore testimonie of their hot charitie.

Selymus lying thus sicke to death, and rotting aboue the ground in his tent, as he was vpon the way going to Hadrianople, sent before Pyrrhus and Achmetes, two of his greatest Bassaes, to prouide for the solemnising of the great feast, which the Turks call Bairam (and is as it were their Easter) purposing to come after himselfe at leisure, as his weake bodie would giue him leaue: and kept with him onely Ferhates, the third of his greatest Bassaes and priuie Counsellors. But such was the furie of his foule disease, continually attainting him with intollerable paines, that shortly after the departure of the other two Bassaes, hee breathed out his cruell ghost, in the moneth of September, in the yeare 1520: neere vnto the citie Chiurli, in the self same place where he had somtime most vnnaturally assailed his aged father Baiazet, with purpose to haue slaine him, had not the fortune of the old Emperor in a great battell preuailed both against his force and the treason of his owne people. Thus intending the mischiefe he could not performe, cut off by a loathsome and vntimely death, he to the great ioy of all Christendome ended his daies, when he had liued six and fortie yeares, and thereof raigned eight: which time of his raigne was nothing else but a most horrible and dreadfull time of bloudshed. His dead bodie was afterwards solemnly by his son Solyman buried in a new temple at Constantinople, which he to the imitation of his father and grandfather, had for that purpose before built. Vpon his tombe is ingrauen in the Greeke, Turkish, and Sclauonian Tongues, this short Epitaph.

The death of Selymus.

The iust iudgement of God.

Hic maximus adsum Selymus, qui orbem domui.
Non bella relinquo, sed pergo inquirere,
Non vlla me fortuna potuit euertere:
Licet ossa iacent, animus quarit.

Phi. Lonicerus Turcicæ Historiæ, Tomo primo, li. primo.

In English thus:

Lo here I lie great Selymus, which held the World in feare:
The World I leaue, but not the wars, which I seeke, though not here.
No fortunes force, or victors hand, could take from me the spoiles:
And though my bones lie buried here, my ghost seekes bloudie broiles.

He

Selymus before his death commendeth the tuition of his son Solyman to Pyrrhus the Bassa.

He vsed commonly to say, That nothing was sweeter than to raigne without feare or suspition of his kindred. A little before his death, he commended his son Solyman to Pyrrhus Bassa, straightly charging him, that after his death he should leaue the Persian, and turne his forces altogether vpon the Christians. And the more to incense him to the effusion of bloud, he left him the liuely counterfeit of himselfe hanging at his bed side, with sundrie bloudie precepts breathing forth his cruell and vnmercifull disposition.

The Inscription of the Table.

Sultan Selymus Othoman King of Kings, Lord of Lords, Prince of all Princes, the sonne and nephew of God.

On the right hand of the Table were written Greeke Verses to this sence.

The Prince that safely seekes to raigne, and hold his state in quiet rest, Must neuer suffer troubled care to harbour in his princely brest:
Nor thinke it sinne to spill the bloud of his most neere and deerest kin,
Not of his brother, so thereby assured safetie he may win.
Law, Faith, Deuotion, and such like, to breake them all he must not spare, Nor conscience make of any thing, to rid him from aspiring care.
This is the way and onely meane that may protect a princes State,
And set him safe without all feare, whilest none may liue whom he doth hate.

The bloudie & tyrannical precepts left by Selymus to his son Solyman, which hee afterwards most assuredly kept as is to be seene in his life following.

On the left hand of the Table was written in the Sclauonian tongue,

Of him that seekes to worke thy woe, deserue not to be counted kind:
But take him for thy mortall foe, and plague him with reuenging mind.
The rotten lym is cut away for feare of doing further harme:
The gentle prince doth beare small sway, if no abuse can make him warme.
Forbearance makes men more offend, and to presume of further grace,
It doth but strength to rebels lend, to thrust their soueraigne out of place.

At the lower end of the same table was written in Turkish verse,

What Prince in person dareth not in open field to meet his foe,
And there with vnapplauded heart, his deadly darts himselfe to throw:
But hides his head for feare of harme, and shuns the danger of the field,
When martial minds with courage bold withstand their foes with speare & shield:
Let him well know, how that in vaine he beareth armes but for a show,
And that the honour of the field will neuer such a coward know.
Ne let him hope to gaine the spoile by any warres he takes in hand,
That feareth with couragious mind his enemies forces to withstand.

His fathers Empire Solyman doth rule with mightie power,
And Christian kingdomes ceaseth not with slaughter to deuour.
The antient Rhodes, with Naxos Isle, and Paros he did take,
And on the coasts of Italie did wofull hauocke make:
Faire Hungarie with armies great he often did annoy,
And with a world of men had thought Vienna to destroy.
But whilest to Sigeth he laied siege, in hope the same to haue, Cut off by death in his great pride, went naked to his graue.

THE LIFE OF SOLYMAN, THE FOVRTH AND MOST MAGNIFICENT EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

C THE death of Selymus was with all carefulnesse concealed by Ferhates the only Bassa then present, for feare lest the Ianizaries and souldiers of the court getting knowledge thereof, should after their wonted manner in the time of the vacancie of the empire, spoile the merchants and strangers in places where they lay in garrison, and especially in the imperial citie: and not so contented, after their accustomed insolencie prescribe vnto the greatest Bassaes at their pleasure. For preuenting whereof, Ferhates dispatched a trustie messenger with letters in post to Solyman the only sonne of Selymus, then lying at Magnesia; certifying him of the death of his father; and that he should deserue well of his peaceable subiects by hastening his comming to Constantinople, whilest all things were yet in good order, in time to represse with his presence the feared disordered proceedings of his men of warre.

D Solyman hauing to his great content perused the Bassaes letters, as one desirous enough of the empire; yet considering the cruel disposition of his father (who vpon a meere iealous conceit of his aspiring mind, and for certain words by him let fall in dislike of his fathers extream dealing, had practised most vnnaturally to haue taken away him by poison: which danger he escaped only by the carefulnesse of his mother, who misdoubting the worst, caused the poisoned rich shirt sent to him from his father, to be first worne by one of his chamber, whereof he in short time after died) and also that the letters were signed onely by Ferhates, and the newes not seconded from any of the other Bassaes: fearing some hidden and secret plot of his father tending to his destruction, durst not aduenture to remoue from his charge, but returned the messenger as one to whom hee gaue little or no credit. Ten daies thus spent, and the death of Solyman hardly perswaded that his father was dead.

E Selymus nothing as yet suspected; Ferhates vnderstanding by his messenger the warinesse of Solyman, and that he expected more assured aduertisement, sent presently vnto the other great Bassaes Pyrrhus and Mustapha at Hadrianople, that they should without delay repaire vnto the court: vnto whom at their comming hee declared the death of the Emperour. Which after they had seene to be true, they by another secret and speedie messenger aduertised Solyman again therof, confirming those letters with all their hands & seals: wherby Solyman now assured of his fathers death, presently put himselfe vpon the way, and by long and painfull iournies in few daies came to Scutarium, called in antient time Chrisopolis, ouer against Constantinople. Where he was met with the Aga or captain of the Ianizaries, and by him transported in a gallie ouer that straight passage to Constantinople; where at his landing the Ianizaries by

F the appointment of their captaine were readie to receiue him, knowing as yet nothing of the death of Selymus, vntill that Solyman being now in the midst of them, the captaine with a loud voice said vnto them, Behold your Emperor. Whereupon they all with great acclamation cried out, Long liue the great Emperor Solyman: which consent of the men of war, is vnto the Turkish Emperours the greatest assurance of their estate. And so with much triumph he was by them brought into the roiall pallace, and placed in his fathers seat in the yeare 1520: in which yere also Charles the fift was chosen Emperour of Germanie. The Ianizaries disappointed by the Bassies of the spoile of the merchants, especially Christians and Iewes, receiued of the bountie of Solyman a great largious; and in the beginning of his raigne had their accustomed wages somewhat augmented also, to their wonderfull contentment.

Solyman was about twentie eight yeares old when hee began to raigne, and was at the first supposed to haue bin of a mild and peaceable disposition: so that the princes to whom the name of Selymus was before dreadful, were now in hope that a quiet Lamb was come in place of a raging Lyon. But in short time they found themselues in their expectation far deceiued; and especially the Christian Princes bordering vpon him, vnto whom he became a far more dangerous enemie then was his father before him; conuerting his forces most part of his long raigne vpon them, which Selymus had almost altogether imployed against the kings of Persia, and Ægypt, the greatest Princes of the Mahometan superstition.

The first that felt his heauie hand was Gazelles Gouernour of Syria: who presently vpon the death of Selymus, thinking himselfe now discharged of the oath of obedience which hee had giuen to Selymus, but not to his successors; and earnestly desiring to restore again the kingdome of the Mamalukes lately ouerthrowne, gathered together the remainder of the dispersed Mamalukes, which speedily resorted vnto him out of all parts of Asia and Africke: and alluring with rewards the leaders of the wild Arabians, with great numbers of the countrey people of Syria, discontented with the Turkish gouernment, entred into open rebellion, and by force of armes draue the Turkes garrisons out of Byrtha, Tripolis, and diuers other cities of Syria, taking them into his owne possession. And the better to effect that hee had taken in hand, he sent embassadors to Caire, vnto Cayerbeius, who had of Selymus receiued the gouernment of Ægypt, the vnworthie reward of his horrible treason; persuading him by any means to take reuenge of the iniurie and wrong before done to the Mamalukes, and by killing of the Turkes garrisons to make himselfe Sultan of Ægypt, and restore againe the kingdome of the Mamalukes, offering him therein the vttermost of his deuoire and seruice. But Cayerbeius, either not trusting Gazelles his old enemie, or ashamed by new treason to augment his former dishonor, or els (which was most like) misdoubting his owne strength in performance of so great an enterprise; after he had attentiuely heard what the embassadours had to say, caused them presently in his own sight to be put to death stra itors, and with all speed certified Solyman therof: who without delay sent Ferhates Bassa with with a strong army into Syria. Which thing Gazelles hearing, and hauing in his power most of the cities of Syria, retired himself, with all his armie into the strong citie of Damasco; whither at length, Ferhates the great Bassa by long march came also. Gazelles resolued to trie the fortune of the field, and so either by speedy victorie or honourable death to end the matter, rather than to suffer himselfe to be shut vp within the wals of the citie (vpon the comming of the Bassa, valiantly issued forth with all his power, and gaue him battell; which for the space of six houres was most cruelly fought, and many slaine on both sides. At length Gazelles being oppressed with the multitude of his enemies (being eight times more in number) and hardly assailed on either side, was enforced to fight in a ring, and there performing all the parts of a worthie Generall and valiant soldier, honorably died together with his Mamalukes in the midst of his enemies, leauing vnto them a bloudie victory. Gazelles thus slaine, the citie of Damasco with all the country of Syria without any more adoe yeelded again vnto the Turks obedience, which the Bassa took in so good part, that he would not suffer his soldiers to enter into the city, then richly restored with commodities of all sorts, brought thither by merchants out of diuers parts of the world.

Gazelles gouernor of Syria rebelleth against Solyman.

Gazelles slaine.

Syria thus pacified, the Bassa went to Caire in Ægypt, and there commending Cayerbeius for his fidelitie, confirmed him in his gouernment; and enuaying against the cruelty of Selymus (so to please the Ægyptians) wished them to hope for all happinesse vnder the peaceable gouernment of the new Sultan Solyman. And so when he had set all things in order in both the prouinces of Syria and Ægypt, returned againe to Solyman.

The yeare next following, Solyman by the counsell of Pyrrhus Bassa his old tutor (a mortall enemie vnto the Christians) and by the persuasion of the Ianizaries resolued to besiege the strong citie of Belgrade, otherwise called Taurunum, scituat vpon the borders of Hungarie, where the riuer Sauus falleth into Danubius. Which city his great grandfather Mahomet (surnamed named the Great, and before him the warlike Amurath) had with all their power, long time before to their great losse and dishonour, vainly attempted. Wherein vntill that time were reserued the ensignes, then taken from the Turks, to their no small griefe, with other trophies of the glorious victories of the worthie captaine Huniades, and the great King Matthias Coruinus his sonne. Wherefore Solyman sending his armie before, was come as far as Sophia, a citie in Seruia (the place where the Turks great lieutenant in Europe is alwaies resiant) before that the Hungarians were aware of his comming: for they liuing at ease all the time that Vladislaus raigned, and now sleeping in securitie vnder the young King Lodouicus his sonne, a man of no experience; who contenting himselfe with the title of a King, suffered himselfe to be pilled and poled by his nobilitie and great clergie men (inuerting all the wealth of the land to their owne priuat gaine) that he was not able to raise any sufficient power to go against his puissant enemie; especially his nobilitie, in whose hands rested the wealth of his kingdome, promising him much, but performing indeed nothing. Huniades with his hardie souldiers, the scourge and terror of the Turks, was dead long before; so was also Matthias that fortunat warriour: after whom succeeded others giuen to all pleasure and ease; to whose example the people fashioning themselues, forgot their wonted valour, and gaue themselues ouer to sensualitie and voluptuous pleasure: so that Solyman without let, presented his armie before the citie of Belgrade, and with batterie and vndermining in short time became Lord thereof, hauing lost few of his people in that siege. How much the losse of that strong citie concerned the Christian common wealth, the manifold and lamentable miseries which afterwards insued by the opening of that gap, not vnto the kingdom of Hungarie only, but to all that side of Christendom, did, and yet doth, most manifestly declare. It was woon by the Turkes the nine and twentieth day of August in the yeare, 1521.

Belgrade woon by Solyman.

After the taking of the strong citie of Belgrade, Solyman returning to Constantinople, brake vp his armie and there lay still almost all the yeare following. During which time, hee caused great preparation to be made at Calipolis and other his ports, for rigging vp of a great fleet: which caused the Italians, Venetians, and them of the Rhodes, to looke about them, as men carefull of their estates, fearing that those forces would ere long bee imployed against some or all of them. 1522

About the same time Philippus Villerius a man of great wisedome and courage, then following the French court, was in his absence by the knights of the Rhodes chosen Great master of that honourable companie: who embarking himselfe at Marcelles, after a long and dangerous iourney (being not without the knowledge of Solyman hardly laied for at sea by Cortug-Ogli a famous pyrat of the Turkes, whose two brethren the knights of the Rhodes had but a little before surprised at sea and slaine, and then held the third in prison) arriued in safety at the Rhodes, where he was with great ioy and triumph receiued.

The great Bassa, by whose graue aduise Solyman was contented in all his waightie affaires to be directed, consulting with the other Bassaes, of diuers great exploits which was first to be taken in hand, for the honor of their Emperour and inlarging of his empire, were of diuers opinions concerning the besieging of the Rhodes. Pyrrhus the Bassa of greatest account, dissuaded the taking in hand of that action, as too full of difficultie and danger: producing for proofe thereof the example of the great Emperor Mahomet, Solymans great grandfather; by whom it was vnfortunatly attempted, and in fine shamefully abandoned. But Mustapha next in place and reputation to Pyrrhus, extolling the power and fortune of Solyman, said, That the greatnesse of their Emperor was not to be concluded within the attempts of his predecessors as well appeared by the late taking of Belgrade; from whence first Amurath, and after him; Mahomet, two of the most warlike Princes of the Turks, had with great dishonour been repulsed: and should no doubt with like good fortune preuaile against the Rhodes also, being able (if need were) to bring more men before it than were stones in the wals thereof. Which he so confidently affirmed, with extenuating the power of the Rhodians, that hee seemed to make no doubt of the good successe of that war: presumptuously affirming, that vpon the first landing of Solymans great armie, they of the Rhodes would without delay yeeld themselues and their citie into his hands.

Amongst others of great experience, whose opinions Solyman was desirous to haue, before he would take so great a matter in hand, was the famous pirat Cortug-Ogli, a man of a mischienous and cruell nature, but of great experience in sea matters. Who presented to Solyman by Mustapha and Ferhates, two of the greatest Bassaes, going before him, after due reuerence done, and commanded to deliuer his opinion, spake vnto Solyman, as followeth:

Corsug-Ogli the pyrat perswadeth Solyman to besiege the Rhodes.

The greatnesse of your deserts (most mightie and puissant Emperour) maketh me (beeing by you so commanded) at this time frankly to speake what I thinke may be for the glorie and honour both of your Maiestie and Empire. I daily heare the pittifull lamentation of the miserable people of Mitylene, Eubœa, Peloponesus, Achaia, Caria, Lycia, and all alongst the sea coast of Syria and Ægypt, bewayling the spoyle of their countries, the ransacking of their cities, the taking away of their cattell and people, with other infinite and incredible calamities, which they dayly suffer of the crossed Rhodian pyrats, no man withstanding them: Many a time haue these wretched people holden vp their hands to mee for helpe, most instantly requesting mee to bee a meane for them to your imperiall Maiestie, wherby they might be protected from the iniurie, rapine, and slaughter of these cruell rouers. Wherefore in their behalfe I beseech your sacred Maiestie, by the most reuerend name of the holy Prophet Mahomet, and by your owne most heroicall disposition, to deliuer your afflicted subiects from these their most cruell enemies, and at length to set them free from the furie, captiuitie, and feare, of these pyrats, more grieuous vnto them than death it selfe: and consider with your selfe, that this iniurie and insolencie tendeth not so much to the hurt of your poore subiects and oppressed people in priuate, as to the dishonour and disgrace of your imperiall name and dignitie, which if any other Christian King or Prince should offer, your Maiestie I know would not suffer vnreuenged: And will you then suffer these robbers, cut-throats, base people gathered out of all the corners of Christendome, to waste your countries spoile your Cities, murther your people, and trouble all your seas? For who can passe by sea to Tripolis, Damasco, Alexandria, Caire, Chalcide, Lesbos, Chios, nay vnto this your imperiall citie of Constantinople, without most certaine and manifest danger of these rouers? What haue we heard euerie Spring this many yeares, but that the Rhodians had taken some one or other of your Ports, led away your people into most miserable captiuitie, and carried away with them the rich spoiles of your countries? And that which is of all other things most dishonourable, this they doe vnder your nose, and in your sight, in the middest and heart of your Empire. Pardon mee I beseech you most Mightie Emperour, if I too plainely speake what I thinke: For whatsoeuer I say, I say it to no other end, but that you should now at length doe that which should many yeares agoe haue beene done. Wee your most loyall subiects may not, nor ought not, for the increase of our Mahometan religion, and for the enlarging of your Empire and Honour, to refuse to aduenture our goods, our bodies, our liues, to all hazard and danger whithout exception. If you likewise be carried with loue of glorie and renowme, or rauished with the desire of neuer dying Fame, in what warres can you more easily gaine the same, or better imploy vs your seruants, than in vanquishing and subduing the Rhodes, the reputed bulwarke of Christendome, which onely keepeth vs from their countries? But some will perhaps say, your ancestours haue in former times vnfortunately attempted that citie: so did they also Belgrade in Hungarie: yet hath your happie fortune to your immortall fame brought the same vnder your subiection, beeing farre more strongly fortified than it was in times past: and doe you then despaire of the Rhodes? Cast off such vaine and needlesse misdoubt. The Turkish Empire hath alwaies growne by aduentures and honourable attempts: Therefore make haste to besiege it both by sea and land. If your subiects mourning vnder the heauie burthen of the Christian captiuitie, built it with their owne hands for the Christians; cannot they now at libertie, desirous of reuenge, and fitted with opportunitie, with like hands destroy the same? If it please you to vouchsafe but to looke into the matter (most dread Soueraigne) you shall see that there is a diuine occasion by the procurement of our great Prophet Mahomet, presented vnto your most sacred Maiestie, now that the Christians of the West are at discord and mortall warre amongst themselues. Your Maiestie is not ignorant, that in managing of wars, the opportunitie of the time is especially to be followed, and that when occasion serueth, all remissnesse and delay is to be carefully auoided: the changes of times are most tickle, and if you suffer your good hap now to passe ouer, you shall perhaps in vaine afterwards pursue the same when it is fled and gone.

Solyman by nature an ambitious yong prince, prickt forward this also by the perswasions of Corsug-Ogli and others, seeking their further credit and preferment by fitting his ambitious humor: but most of all by the instigation of the Bassa Mustapha, resolued to go in person himselfe selfe against the Rhodes. And first to make some proofe of what spirit and courage Villerius the new chosen Great Master was of, in whose sufficiencie the greatest part of the defence of the citie was supposed to consist: to him by way of a little cold friendship, he sent a messenger with this short Letter thus directed:

Solyman by the grace of God, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, greatest Emperour of Constantinople and Trapezond, most Mightie King of Persia, Arabia, Syria, and Ægypt; Lord of Asia and Europe; Prince of Mecha and Aleppo, Ruler of Hierusalem; and Master of the Vniuersall Sea: to the reuerend Father, Philippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Master of the Rhodes, and Legat of Asia, greeting.

Solymans letter to Villerius, Great master of the Rhodes.

I am glad of thy kingdome and new promotion, which I wish thou maiest long and happily enioy: for that I hope thou wilt in honour and fidelitie exceed all them which before thee ruled in the Rhodes: from whom as my ancestours haue withdrawne their hand, so I after their example ioyne with thee in amitie and friendship. Ioy thou therefore, my friend, and in my behalfe reioyce of my victorie and triumph also: for this last Summer passing ouer Danubius with ensignes displayed, I there expected the Hungarian King, who I thought would haue giuen me battell: I tooke from him by strong hand Belgrade, the strongest citie of his Kingdome, with other strong holds thereabouts: and hauing with fire and sword destroyed much people, and carried away many moe into captiuitie, as a triumphant conqueror, breaking vp mine armie, am returned to my imperiall citie of Constantinople, from whence farewell.

The Great Master hauing read these Letters, and well considered of the same, perceiued forthwith Solymans meaning; and that peace was offered him in words and shew, but war in deed and meaning. Which because he was readie by force to repulse, he rewarded the Turks messenger, and sent backe with him another of his owne, a priuat person. For the Rhodians did seldome vouchsafe to send any honourable embassadours to the Turkish Emperours (with whom they for most part liued in hostilitie) either the Turkes to them. By this messenger he answered Solymans Letters with other of like vaine, as followeth:

Philippus Villerius Lilladamus, Great Master of the Rhodes, to the Turke.

The answer of Villerius to Solymans letters.

I right well vnderstand your letters which your messenger brought vnto me. The friendship you write of, is as pleasing to me as displeasing to Cortug-Ogli your seruant, who went about to haue intercepted me vpon the sudden, as I came out of France: but failing of his purpose, stealing by night into the Rhodian Sea, he attempted to haue robbed certaine merchants ships bound from Ioppe to Venice: but sending my fleet out of my hauen, I staied his furie, constrained the pyrat to flie, and for hast to leaue behind him the prises he had before taken from the merchants of Crete. Farewell, from the Rhodes.

By this answer Solyman perceiued, that he was well met withall in his owne fineneſſe, and that he should not so easily carrie the Rhodes, as he had before done Belgrade. Yet being fully in himselfe resolued to trie his fortune therein, he called vnto him certaine of the chiefe commanders of his warres, to whom he opened his whole determination in this sort:

Solymans Oration to his men of war, declaring his purpose of besieging the Rhodes.

Although I doubt not, worthie chiefetaines, but that you are of the same mind now that you haue beene alwaies of, in the inuading of other Nations; yet I haue thought it good in matters tending to the common glorie, and good of vs all, to vse your generall aduice and counsell. Since the time that my father left this world, wee haue made warre with diuers Nations and people. The Syrians by nature vnconstant, and prone to rebellion, we haue by force reduced to their former obedience. The Sophi, that mightie king, nephew vnto the great King Vsun-Cassanes, by his daughter the sister of king Iacup, in heart and deed our mortall enemie, not contented with the kingdomes of Assyria, Media, Armenia the greater, Persia, and Mesopotamia, wee haue with our forces shut vp within the compasse of his owne dominions. The last yeare running through Hungarie, both on this side and beyond Danubius wee tooke Belgrade the strongest fortresse in that Kingdome; And whatsoeuer else wee attempted, was subdued. Yet for all that (to speke plainly of my selfe) my minde greater in conceit than my Empire, and the blood of Othoman, findeth no contentment in these victories. For whatsoeuer you haue yet done, although it be great, yet I deeme it all but little, in regard of your worth: my desire carrieth me further. This haue I alwaies aboue all things most earnestly desired, to set vpon the Rhodes, and vtterly to root out all the strength and forces, yea the very name of those Rhodian souldiers. And haue not you also no lesse than my selfe desired the same? How often haue I heard you crying out, The Rhodes, The Rhodes? I haue expected the time that beeing discharged of other warres, I might heere employ my whole strength and power. That we so long desired, is now come: there was neuer greater opportunitie of good successe offered, a great part of the walls of the citie of the Rhodes now lying euen with the ground; which cannot in short time bee repaired, especially in their want of coyne. Beside this, the garrison in the castle is but small, and their aid from France farre off, which wil either come too late when the citie is lost, or that which I rather beleeue, neuer. For neither will the French King (being at mortall warres with the Germane Emperour, and Lord of Italie) suffer his storehouses to be disfurnished, or his ports bared of the necessarie defence of his shipping. Neither doe you beleeue that the Spaniards (distressed at home with famine, warre, and ciuile discention) will easily come hither out of Sicilia and Campania with supplies of men and victuall. But you may perhaps thinke, that great danger is to be feared from the Venetian fleet, and the Isle of Crete, which I assure you is not so: for I know (although I will not now manifest the same) how I haue preuented that mischiefe. Wherefore couragious souldiers (borne to the subduing of all Christendome, much more of the Rhodes) with cheerefull hearts follow me your soueraigne against these your most perfidious and cruell enemies. How long I pray you will you suffer that staine and disgrace to sticke vpon the Othoman Familie, and generally vpon all the name of the Turkes, which these Rhodians cast vpon vs the last time they were besieged? Which was not so much done by their valour, as by the vnfortunate counsell of my great grandfather Mahomet, calling home Mesithes Palæologus his Generall in that war, for one vnluckie assault. But admit that their valour gained them victorie, will you therefore alwaies suffer these pyraticall excursions vpon our Maine and Islands? The ransacking of cities and countries? The carrying away of your cattell and richest substance? The captiuitie and slaughter of your wiues and children? The slauerie of your neerest friends and kinsmen. So helpe me great Mahomet it shall not so be: I vow in despight of Christ and Iohn, in short time to set vp mine ensignes with the Moone in the middle of the market place of Rhodes. Neither doe I seeke any thing vnto my selfe, more than the honour of the enterprise; the profit I giue vnto you my fellow souldiers, their coine, plate, iewels (which is reported to be great) their riches and wealth is all yours, to carrie home with you vnto your wiues and children. Wherefore let vs now with all our forces and courage set forward to the besieging of the Rhodes.

Solymans purpose thus made knowne, and the same with one accord of all his captains well liked: Pyrrhus the eldest Bassa and of greatest authoritie, who at the first dissuaded the warre, standing vp in the middest of the rest, said:

I cannot but much admire the great wisedome and rare vertues of our young Emperour, who so wisely and aduisedly hath declared all the deepe counsels of a worthie chiefetaine in taking of warre in hand. Blessed be Mahomet, thrice and foure times blessed is this empire, blessed is our estate, and blessed are we with such a Prince, which carrieth with him in his warres not onely men and habiliments of warre, but most deepe wisedome and policie. Which wholesome manner of proceeding, if we had alwaies before our eyes, and would follow, we should in short time bring vnder our subiection not the Rhodes onely, but all the kingdomes of the Christians. Yet beside that which our Emperor hath most carefully and considerately deuised, mine age and experience would exhort you, by gifts, promises, rewards, and all other meanes whatsoeuer, to corrupt if it were possible the very chiefe and principall citizens of the Rhodes, thereby to enter into their most secret deuices and counsels: which how it may be wrought, I will in few words giue you to vnderstand. I as a man indifferent, desirous of peace and quietnesse, will by messengers, and letters induce the Great Master to send some honourable embassage to our dread Soueraigne, which if I can once bring him vnto, then let me alone with the rest.

Solyman worketh preparation against the Rhodes.

This counsell of the old Fox pleased all the hearers wel, but aboue others the emperor himselfe, who gaue him in charge with all diligence and speed, to proue what he could doe: the other captains he commanded to prepare the greatest forces they could, both for land & sea seruice.

Which preparation was so great both at Constantinople and other places, that it could not long be kept so secret, but that newes therof was brought to the Rhodes the fourth day of Februarie: which newes dayly increasing and still confirmed by more certaine reports, Villerius the Great Master for more certaine intelligence, sent a Christian of Epidaurus, who could perfectly speake the Turkish language, as a spie to Constantinople; who by secret letters from thence gaue him knowledge that the Turks were preparing a great fleet, and raising a mightie armie, aduertising him also of a wonderfull proportion of artillerie prepared for batterie: but against whom was not commonly knowne, some deeming it to be for the inuasion of Italie, some for the Rhodes, others supposing it to be for Ciprus or Corcira: which diuersitie of coniectures, made many (whose conceits auerted from themselues the fortune of that war) to be more careless and secure. But whilest euery man was of opinion, that it was made against any man rather than himselfe: certaine aduertisement was giuen to the Rhodians from diuers places by Letters from their friends and confederates, That the Turkes did with extraordinarie diligence keep strait watch and ward in all their ports thereabouts along the sea coast, otherwise than they were before accustomed: which seemed to prognosticate some farther matter than the defence of their frontiers. Villerius carefull of his charge, as the marke whereat th enemie aimed, prouided with all possible diligence great store of victuall, armor, weapons, shot, powder, and whatsoeuer else necessarie for the defence of the citie.

Villerius prepareth to make resistance against the Turkes.

The new wals of the citie, and Auergne fortresse, by Basilius enginier to the Emperour Charles the fift (a worke begun in the time of Fabritius Caractus the late Grand master, but not yet finished) was now with all diligent labour set vpon, euery man putting his helping hand vnto so necessarie a worke. Whilest these things were with so great endeuour and labor a doing, a messenger came from Constantinople, (sent from the old Bassa Pyrrhus) a sharpe witted and cunning fellow; who with much filed speech in most ample manner doing his message, by the way, painted forth the great towardlinesse and courteous nature of the Turkish Emperor Solyman, with the great commendation of Pyrrhus Bassa his master: deliuering from both of them letters vnto the Great Master of this purport.

Solyman by the grace of God King of Kings, Lord of Lords, &c. to the reuerend father Phillippus Villerius Liladamus, Great Master of the Rhodes, and Legat of Asia, greeting.

I am certainly informed that my letters are deliuered vnto thee; which for that thou vnderstoodest them aright, I cannot expresse how much it pleased me. Trust to it, that I am not contented with the victorie I got at Belgrade; I hope for another, nay I assure my selfe thereof, which I will not hide from thee whom I am alwaies mindfull of. Farewell from Constantinople.

Solymans letters to Villerius.

Pyrrhus, great Counsellour to the mightie Emperour Solyman, to Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great Master of the Rhodes and Legat of Asia, greeting.

Your Letters, greater in meaning than character, I haue deliuered vnto our most mightie Emperor: but the bearer thereof I would not suffer to come to his presence, lest hee should be too much offended with so base a messenger. Vnto whom from henceforth send men of worth commendable for their yeares and discretion, with whom his Maiestie may (if he so please) conferre and conclude of matters concerning the common good: which thing if you shall doe, it shall neither repent you of the doing thereof, nor me of my counsell. The messenger I send, bringeth letters vnto you also from our great Emperour; to whose diuine excellencie how you are to answer, you are alreadie admonished. Farewell from Constantinople.

Pyrrhus Bassa his letters to Villerius.

These letters being openly read, drew the minds of the Rhodians diuersly. Such as altogether wished for peace, measuring others after their owne plaine meaning and integritie, commended the counsel of Pyrrhus, saying, That he being an old man of great experience, was not so desirous of our quiet, as of the quiet of his prince & country: and therfore wished by wisdom to order that which the yong prince sought for by war, fearing the vncertainty of mans fragilitie, fragilitie, the common chance of war, the violence of fortune, which hath oftentimes in a moment with a handfull of men ouerthrowne most mightie kings with their strong armies. The persuasion of these men tooke such effect, that one of the knights of the Order called Raimund March, a Spaniard a noble gentleman of great courage, and very eloquent, skilfull also in the Turkish tongue, and then Muster-master, was appointed to haue been sent Embassadour vnto the Turkish Emperour. Many there were of a contrarie oinion, which suspecting fraud and deceit, said it were good to beware of the enemies counsell: asking, to what end this embassage were? For should wee proclaime warre (say they) against the most mightie tyrant, not yet our professed enemie, who writeth all peace? Or should we intreat for peace, no warre as yet proclaimed; that he which as yet is afraid himselfe, may now vnderstand that he is of vs feared? Besides that, with what securitie, with what face can our Embassadors go, vnrequested of the Turkish Emperor, without his safe conduct thorow those countries which we daily burn & spoile? But they shall shew Pyrrhus the great Bassaes letters forsooth, his protection, his credit and authoritie shall defend them from all iniurie and wrong; as though the seruant should prescribe laws to his master, & such a seruant as is most like vnto his master (that is, disloyal, false of faith, a hater of all Christians, but especially of vs Rhodians: whom the merciles tyrant hauing in his power, with his nauy & army in readines, shall with cruel torture inforce to discouer vnto him our prouision, the secrets of our city and Order. This opinion of the wiser sort, was greatly confirmed by the too much curiositie of the messenger which was sent, who with all diligence enquired of the state and scituation of the citie, of the number and strength of the Order. Wherefore in conclusion he was sent backe againe accompanied but with one priuat souldier to carrie the Great masters letters vnto the Turkish tyrant: the tenure whereof was thus:

Philippus Villerius Great Master of the Rhodes, vnto the Turke greeting.

Villerius his answer to Solymans letters.

That you are mindfull of me grieueth me nothing; and I am also mindfull of you. You repeat your victorie in Hungarie, wherewith not being contented you hope for another: nay you promise and assure your selfe thereof, before you haue attempted the warre. Beware you deceiue not your selfe; mens expectations neuer deceiue them more than in warres. Farewell, from the Rhodes.

The other letters written to Pyrrhus, were to this effect:

Philippus Villerius Liladamus Great Master of the Rhodes, to Pyrrhus the Bassa.

Villerius his answer to Pyrrhus the Bassa his letters.

I haue aduisedly considered thy letters, with the behauiour and disposition of thy messenger. As I contemne not thy counsell, so I will not follow the same, whilest my men of warre do spoile the countries and ports of thy lord and master, which I beare with all, by reason of the iniuries they haue sustained of the Turkish pirats. But I will call them home, and will send Embassadors vnto thy great Lord: so that thou before send me safe conduct vnder thy masters great seale, for their safe comming and returne. Farewell, from the Rhodes.

But these letters were neuer deliuered vnto the great Turke, or the Bassa: for as soon as the Turkish messenger was come ouer into the maine, he presently tooke horse, which was there in readinesse for him, and posted towards Constantinople with as much speed as he could, leauing the Christian messenger his companion behind him, who returning backe againe to the Rhodes, and telling what he had heard and seene, gaue them all great occasion to dispaire of peace: whereupon Villerius sent into Crete to hire certain companies of Cretensian archers.

In the meane time aduertisement was giuen vnto the Great master by letters from the Island of Naxos, That the Turks were readie to put their fleet to sea with the first appearance of the new moone: which thing they most superstitiously obserue in the beginning of all their great actions. The same newes was brought also by certaine merchants of the Island of Pathmos, who came to the Rhodes with a great ship laded with corne from Euboea, vnder the colour, of the sale whereof, they (by the commandement of the Turkes, to whom they were tributaries)

A ries) diligently noted all that was done in the citie, shortly after besieged. The great master with no lesse diligence, sent diuers of his small gallies amongst the Islands and alongst the maine, to learne what might be of the enemies doings. Ioannes Lupus one of the knights of the order, and captaine of one of these gallies, meeting with a great ship of the Turks laded with corne, tooke her and brought her home to Rhodes. But Alphonsus captaine of another of the gallies, lying in harbour in one of the Islands, and suffering his men to straggle too far into the land, was set vpon by a Turkish pirat and taken.

About the same time the Turks by often fires made vpon the maine in the night season, gaue signe vnto the Rhodians, that they were desirous to haue some parly with them, as their manner was. Wherupon one Meneton a French man, one of the knights, by commandement of B the rest of the Order, was sent with a gallie well appointed to the maine to see what the matter might be; and with him was ioined Iacobus Xaycus a paymaster for the gallies, that he might of the inhabitants of the place, and his friends there dwelling, diligently enquire of all things concerning the intended warre: for this Xaycus, besides that he was a skilfull sea man and one that knew the coast well, had also good experience in ciuile affaires, and was wonderfully beloued & made of by the Turkish merchants whose language he had perfectly learned. Drawing neere the shoare, he found the Turkish merchants making merrie vpon the main, with their carpets, cotten wooll, and such like merchandise about them as they vsed to exchange with the Rhodian merchants for woollen cloathes: vnto these merchants he gaue due salutations, gaging his faith for their safetie, & they likewise to him. But being requested to come ashore
C to make merrie vntill one of his familiar and old acquaintance might be sent for, who as they said was not far off; he answered, that he could not so doe, except they would first deliuer a pledge for him a shipboord. The perfidious Turks laughing as it were at his needlesse feare, willingly sent their merchandise, & a pledge aboord the gallies. Xaycus then going ashore, and embracing the Turkish merchants which met him: vpon a signe giuen, was forthwith beset on euery side and taken prisoner, and by post horses conuaied with all speed to Constantinople; where he was with most exquisit torments that could be deuised for any man to endure, enforced to confesse whatsoeuer his cruel enemies could desire. After Xaycus was by treacherie thus lost, then began their prouident wisedome to be highly commended, which h were the occasion, that the decrece made for sending embassadors vnto the Turke, was againe re-D noked. The hostage giuen for Xaycus, being brought to the Rhodes and examined, was found to be a simple countrey fellow whom the Turkes had of purpose well apparelled to deceiue the Rhodians: who frankly and plainly according to his simple knowledge, answered to all things that were of him demanded; as that the Turks were making great prepatation for sea, vpon the coasts of Caria and Lycia, and had taken vp many souldiers in the countries thereabouts to send into the frontiers of his dominions towards Syria, for defence of the same against the Persians. All which was true: for Solyman to put the Rhodians out of all suspition of inuasion (whom he knew carefully to obserue his doings) sent the souldiers whom he had leuied in the countries neerest to the Rhodes, far away against the Persian, as if he had meant nothing against the Rhodes, and so vpon the sudden to set vpon them with his armie brought E out of Europe, before they were aware. But this his deuise serued to small purpose: for the great Master perceiuing by many circumstances, but specially by that late calamitie of Xaycus, that the Rhodes was the place the Turkish tyrant longed after; & fearing that delay might bring farther danger, caused a cessation from al other busines to be proclaimed, vntil all things necessary for defence of the citie were accomplished: watch & ward was kept in euery street, the great artillerie planted vpon the wals and bulwarks, companies appointed for the defence of euery place, the publick armorie of all warlike prouision was open, all the streets were ful of men carrying weapons, some to one place, some to another. At which time a general muster was taken by the chiefe men of the Order, where were found about 5000 men able to beare armes, among whom were 600 knights of the Order, &. 500 souldiers of Crete; the rest were F for most part mariners, able bodies, who in the time of the siege did great seruice, encouraged by their sea captains: the Island people which repaired into the citie, serued to little other purpose but to dig and carry earth vnto the rampiers; and the citizens (except it were some few of the better sort) were for the most part weak and of smal courage, not able to indure any labor or paines, and yet hardly to bee kept in order and gouerned, great speakers, but small doers,

greater in shew than in deed. The Great Master hauing carefully prouided and ordered all C things needfull for defence of the citie, and fearing nothing more than the faint hearts of the citizens, caused them all to be called together; for incouragement of whom, hee spake vnto them as followeth:

Valiant Gentlemen and worthie Citizens, wee heare that the Turke our mortall enemie is comming against vs, with a huge armie raised of diuers Nations: from whose naturall crueltie and wonted periurie except we defend our selues by force, one and the selfe same danger is like to befall me, my knights, and you all. For we haue with common consent and hand grieuously spoiled him both by sea and land, and you are by booties taken by strong hand out of his dominions, inriched: and at this day we keepe his people in grieuous seruitude, and he ours; but he iniuriously, and we most iustly: For his ancestours (wearie of the darke dennes and caues of the mountaine Caucasus, their naturall dwelling) without right, title, or cause, incited onely with couetousnesse, ambition, and the hatred of our most sacred religion, haue driuen the Christians out of Syria: and afterwards oppressed the Grecians in Grecia; where not contented to haue destroyed the people, with one simple kinde of death (as barbarisme is euer cruell and merciless) they haue with most exquisit and horrible torments butchered many thousands of that Nation. All whom, this wicked proud youth (whose mischiefe exceedeth his yeares) an euill neighbour to all men, not contented with the dominions of Arabia, Syria, Ægypt, the greatest part of Asia, and of many other places moe, seeketh in tyrannie, murther, spoile, periurie, and hatred against Christ and Christians, farre to excell: and forceth himselfe to the vttermost of his power, to take from vs our I Islands, and to subdue the Christian Countries; that so at length being Lord of all, and commander of the World, hee may at his pleasure ouerthrow the Christian cities, kill the Christians, and vtterly root out the Christian name, which hee so much hateth. For the repulsing of which intollerable iniurie, wee haue especially chosen this Island of the Rhodes for our dwelling place, because the same seemed more commodious than any other for the annoying of this barbarous Nation. We haue done what in vs lay, holpen by you: we know by proofe your great valour and fidelitie, which we now haue not in any distrust. Wherefore I will not vse many wordes to persuade you to continue in your fidelitie and loyaltie, neither long circumstance to encourage you to play the men: sithence worthie mindes are not with wordes either encouraged or dismayed. But concerning my selfe and my Knights of the Order, I will K speake a few words. I with them, with whom (as I hope) the Christian Princes and other my knights of the West will in good time ioyne their forces, are most readie and prest to defend your selues, your children, your wiues, your goods, the monuments of your ancestours and sacred Temples, dedicated to the seruice of our God. Which opinion, that it may remaine firme and fix in your minds, if nothing else, my faithfulnesse in your warres, my bodie not yet altogether spent, but able enough to endure paines and trauell, the nobilitie of these worthie knights of the Order, their loue towards you, and their hatred towards your enemies were sufficient to confirm: but beside this, the strength of this citie, which this noble Order hath with infinit charges so notably fortified with ditches, wals, towers, and bulwarkes, against all the force and furie of Artillerie, is such, as that no citie may worthily bee compared, much lesse preferred before the same. It is wonderfully stored with all kind of weapons and warrelike prouision: wee haue layed vp plentie of wine, flesh, and corne, in vaults, so that neither wet weather nor wormes can attaine L the same: of wood and wholesome water not to be taken from vs, things necessarie for men besieged wee haue plentie, and able men ynow for the defence of the citie. All which things promise vnto vs assured victorie, and such end of the warre as we wish for. Besides this, Necessitie, which giueth courage euen vnto cowards, will enforce vs to fight. Yet standeth on our side true Religion, Faith, Conscience, Deuotion, Constancie, the loue of our Countrey, the loue of our Libertie, the loue of our Parents, Wiues, Children, and whatsoeuer else we hold deare: Whereas they bring with them the proud command of their captaines, Infidelitie, Impietie, Vnconstancie, a wicked desire of your bondage, of your bloud, and the bloud of your parents, wiues, and children. Out of doubt (beloued citizens) our good God will not suffer so many good vertues to be ouercome by their foule vices. Wherefore be you in minds quiet and secure, and trouble not your selues with forboding feare of your enemies; onely continue in the fidelitie and loyaltie which you haue alwaies kept inuiolat and vnspotted toward this sacred and honourable M fellowship, in most dangerous warres, and hardest chances of fortune: and if need shall so require, with couragious hand shew your valour against your enemies, and make it knowne vnto the Spaniards, French, Italians, Hungarians, and English, That the Rhodians are of power to daunt the Turkish pride, and to auert their fleets and armies from Italie, which they haue so many yeares threatned with fire and

A and sword: and will no doubt thither with all speed hasten and come, if (that which my mind abhorreth to speake) they should here preuaile. Neither will his ambitious youth, in courage, falshood, and cruelty exceeding Hannibal, imitate him in that, that hauing ouerthrowne the Romans in the great battell at Cannas, knew not to vse his victorie: but he will presently with more than Cæsars celeritie, bring forth the treasures his father got in Ægypt, and with great fleets and huge armies inuade Apulia, Calabria, and Scicilia: from whence he will foorthwith breake into France, and afterwards into Spaine, and other Christian Countries, raging through them with all kind of crueltie. But I am carried away further than I purposed, and than need is; For your fidelitie and valour (most worthie citizens) to endure the siege, and repulse the enemie, is such, as needeth not my persuasion, and of greater resolution, than that it can be shaken with the dangers incident to men besieged: yet the greatest and most forcible miseries of all, which is hunger and thirst, I assure you, you shall neuer feele;
B which pinching calamities for all that, some people (in faithfulnesse, courage, and valour nothing comparable to you) haue neuertheless most constantly endured. For they of Petelinum, besieged by the Carthaginensians, for want of victuall, thrust their parents and children out of the citie, the longer to hold out the siege, and liued themselues with hides and leather sod or broyled, and leaues of trees, and many other homely things, by the space of eleuen moneths: and could not be ouercome vntill they wanted strength longer ▪stand vpon the wals, & to hold their weapons in their hands. They of Casilinum, besieged by Hannibal, held out vntill a poore mouse was sold for much money. You must of necessitie keepe watch and ward in your Stations; if your houses chance to be beaten downe with the enemies artillerie, you must haue patience: for why, they shall be repaired againe, and it is not a matter of such
C importance, that we should therefore yeeld vnto our enemies, in whose courtesie and fidelity no assurance is to be reposed. For besides that he is by nature cruell and vnfaithfull, he can by no meanes be gentle and faithfull towards vs, which haue done him so much harme, who onely (as he himselfe saith) haue oftentimes to his griefe interrupted the course of the victories of him the conqueror both of sea and land, whom he hath so many times assailed by open force with all his strength, wit, crafts, deceit, and policie: yet alwaies hitherto in vaine, Almighty God still protecting vs, whom aboue all things (most deare citizens) I wish you to serue and call vpon, for except he keepe and defend the city, the watchmen do but watch in vaine.

This cheerfull speech wonderfully encouraged the hearers, especially the vulgar sort, easily carried away with pleasing words. But whilest they in their iolitie dreame of nothing but
D of triumph and victorie, the wiser sort possessed with care, ceased not to do what in them lay, to procure, That the good commonly forewished, might in fine come to effect. Among others Clement Bishop of the Greekes, a man both for his place and deuout manner of liuing had in great reputation amongst them, laboured earnestly by dayly exhortations, to perswade the Greekes his countriemen in that great and common danger with heart and hand to ioin with the Latines in defence of the citie: for although the gouernment was altogether in the Great Master and his Knights, which were Latines, yet the people both of the Iland and citie were for most part Greekes, who liked not altogether so well of the Latine gouernment, but that they did many times repine thereat. Howbeit the matter was at that time so ordered by the E good perswasion of the Bishop, & good gouernment of the Great Master, that they all agreed as one man to spend their liues in defence of the citie; and were so far from feare of the comming of the barbarous enemie, that many of the vulgar people, in whom appeareth commonly more heat than wit, wished rather for his comming than otherwise. But looke what they had fondly wished, proued afterward to their costs ouer true. For within a few nights after, the Turks by fire made in the night time vpon the maine, gaue signe of parley vnto the Rhodians. Whereupon a gallie well appointed, with a long boat, was presently sent forth to see what the matter was: which drawing neere vnto the shore, was hailed by a Turke, accompanied with a troupe of horsemen, desiring the captaine of the gallie to send some on shore, with whom they might more conueniently parley: which thing the captaine refusing; What,
F said the Turke, art thou afraid of Xaycus fortune? to whom the captain in threatning maner answered againe, Xaycus whom you haue contrary to your faith and oath taken, troubleth me not; neither am I afraid of you, whom I trust not; but if you haue any thing to say let me heare it, or els get you further off, otherwise I will speake to you by the mouth of the cannon. Then one of the Turkes comming to the water side, laid downe letters vpon a stone, saying, that in them them was contained that they had in charge: which said, he presently set spurs to his horse, G and departed with the rest of his companie. The captaine sending out his long boat for these Letters, found them directed in this sort:

Solyman, by the grace of God King of Kings, Lord of Lords, most mightie Emperour of Constantinople and Trapezond, &c. vnto the reuerend father Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great Master of the Rhodes, to his knights, and all his people in generall.

The purport of which Letter was as followeth:

Solymans threatening letters to the Rhodians.

The compassion I haue of my distressed subiects, and the great iniurie you doe me, hath moued me to H wrath. Wherefore I command you without delay to yeeld vnto me the Island and citie of the Rhodes, willingly and charitably graunting you leaue safely to depart with all your riches, or to tarrie if you so please vnder my obeisance, your libertie and religion in no part infringed with any tribute or imposition. If you be wise, preferre friendship and peace before bloudie warre: for vnto them which are by force subdued, are reserued all extremities which the miserable vanquished vse to suffer of the angrie conqueror: from which neither your owne force, nor forreine aid, nor huge wals, which I will vtterly ouer-throw, shall be able to defend you. Fare you well. All which shal assuredly be performed, if you shall make choice rather of my friendship, than of my force: wherein you shall neither be deceiued nor circumuen-ted; I take to witnesse God the Creator of heauen and earth, the foure writers of the Euangelicall histo- I rie, the fourscore thousand Prophets descended from heauen, and amongst them our highest Prophet Mahomet, the reuerend ghosts of my father and grandfather, and this my sacred and imperiall head. From our pallace at Constantinople.

When these letters were openly read in the counsell chamber at the Rhodes, some were of opinion, That it was good to answer the Turkish tyrant roundly, therby to giue him to vnderstand that they were not afraid of his threats: other some thought it no wisedome with hard words to prouoke so great an enemie to further displeasure. Thus whilst euery man would haue framed an answer according to his owne disposition, in conclusion it was agreed vpon, to giue him no answer at all.

The same day these letters came to the Rhodes, which was the fourteenth day of Iune, one of the Turks great commanders at sea with thirty gallies, the forerunners of the Turkish fleet, K arriued at the Island of Chos, famous in antient time for the birth of Hippocrates the great physition, and the wonderfull picture of Venus left there vnperfect by Apelles, which for the excellencie thereof neuer man durst afterward take in hand to perfect: which fruitfull and pleasant Island was then at the arriuall of the Turks, part of the dominion of the Rhodes. The Admiral of this fleet here landing his Turks, began to burn the corne which was then almost ripe, with the countrie villages round about. With which iniurie, Preianes Gouernour of the Island (a man of great courage and valor) moued, with a chosen companie of footmen, and certain troups of horsemen, suddenly set vpon the Turkes, in diuers places dispersed abroad far into the countrie, with such a terrible crie of the countrie people, and instruments of war, L that the Turks being therewith amazed, ran away as if they had bin mad, and were many of them slaine without resistance; and had not the gallies lien neere the shore, to receiue them that were able to flie thither, there had not one of them which landed escaped the hands of the Island people. The Turks hauing receiued this losse, left the Island, and put to sea againe.

The Rhodians for the most part now assured and out of doubt of the comming of the Turks, by the persuasion of Gabriel Pomerolus vicemaster, and other men of great experience, pluckt downe the suburbes of the city, & laid them euen with the ground, their pleasant orchards also & gardens neere to the citie, they vtterly destroied; the great master for example sake beginning first with his owne, being a place of great delicacie, lying vnder the wals neere to the French Bulwarke: & taking into the city all such things as they thought needful for the M inditing of the siege, they vtterly destroied al the rest, were it neuer so pleasant or commodious, within a mile of the town, leauing all that space as euen and as bare as they could possibly make it; to the intent, that the enemy at his comming should find nothing neere the city wherof to make vse. But whilst the pleasures & delights of the suburbs are thus in defacing, another more

The feare of the countrey people.

A more heauie and wofull sight presented vnto the eies of the citizens, filled the city with greater mourning and pensiuenesse than did the comming of the enemy. The miserable multitude of the poore countrey people, some bringing wood, some corne, some cattell, some foules, and other such necessaries as they had out of the countrey into the city (for so the Great Master had commanded) after whom followed great numbers of women and children weeping, with dischiueled haire, scratching their faces and teating themselues after the manner of the countrie, wringing their hands, and casting vp their eies to heauen, beseeching God with heauie countenance and flouds of teares to defend the noble citie of the Rhodes, and themselues from the fury of their enemies. Which multitude of country people with their prouision be-
B ing packt vp into narrow roomes in the houses of the citizens, and their cattell staruing for want of fodder, afterwards corrupted the aire; whereof insued rotten agues and the flix, during the time of the siege. But after the city was giuen vp, such a plague and mortalitie followed as destroied great numbers of the Turkes and poore Christians, which knowing not whether to go, chose rather there to die, than to forsake their natiue country.

The Generall of the Turkish fleet which landed in the Island of Chos, and was of purpose sent by Solyman to prouoke the Rhodians to battell at sea; before he with his whole power came to besiege the Island, came daily with twentie gallies halfe those narrow seas ouer, betwixt Lycia and the Rhodes, leauing the rest of his fleet riding at anchor at the promontorie
C called Gnidum (not far from the citie of Rhodes) readie to aid him as need should require: this manner of brauerie he vsed many daies together, hoping thereby to allure the Rhodians out of their hauen to giue him battell; knowing, that if he should therein obtaine the victorie, it were at that time little lesse than the taking of the citie, or if hee could by cruell fight but weaken the forces of the Rhodians, hee should therein doe his master good seruice, and greatly further his victorie by diminishing the number of the defendants. When he had madaies without intermission in this proud manner come halfe seas ouer, and sometimes passing further came and lay at the mouth of the hauen, as it were daring them to fight: the Rhodians not wont to be so braued at their owne doores, moued with the intollerable insolencie of this proud Turke, by their continuall importunitie caused the Great Master to call a counsell, to consider whether they should fight with this fleet of the Turks or not. The counsellors
D by the appointment of the Great Master assembled: the Chancellor, a man of great authoritie and spirit, famous for his noble acts both at home and abroad, and chiefe of them which were of opinion this fleet of the Turks was to be fought withall, said:

The chancellor his speech perswading the Rhodians to fight with the Turkes gallies.

So great disgrace was not longer to be suffered, but presently reuenged: For (said he) the bugie fleet of the Turkes, I doe not say at whose force and sight, but at whose very name many men doe tremble and quake (which for all that is vnto vs no great noueltie, for euery yeare we heare of the like) is as it were to be ioyned vnto these pyraticall gallies, as members; and then will it be most expedient (which will be a most easie thing for vs to doe, hauing the better both for strength of shipping and number and valour of men) to giue that great head such a blow and wound, by cutting off these limbes, that it shall euer after stagger and faint for want of strength: or else there is no other fleet at all prepared against E vs to follow this, and then this discomfited we shall be at quiet. Which thing in my iudgement (though others which feare their owne shadowes and the falling of heauen, say otherwise) is most like to be true; for the great Turke is not so sottish to come hither, the fittest time of the yeare being so farre spent, in the latter end of Iune, to besiege this citie, and such a citie as hee knoweth to bee most strong, wanting nothing that is needfull, and thorowly manned with valiant souldiers, from whence his ancestours haue beene with losse and shame repulsed: when as the remainder of the Sommer will be spent before he can encampe himselfe and place his batteries; and Winter time as you know is vnfit for euery siege, especially in this Island, wherein they can find no hauen or harbour to rest in. Wherefore in God his name let vs set vpon our proud enemies; and let vs not for a few threatening words sent vnto vs from a fearefull youth, vpon a fineneſse and policie lest we should follow the tayle of his fleet bound for some F other place, sit still like cowards within our wals with our hands in our bosomes, as men which for feare and dread durst not shew their heads. Which our cowardise and want of courage we forsooth call Fabius his policie: But I would to God we were like Fabius, but I feare we shall proue more like Antiochus, the Aetolians, the Vitellians, all whose courage consisted in words, vainly hoping to gaine the victo-rie by sitting still and wishing well. But the helpe of God is not to be gotten with womens prayers and supplications or these faint-hearted polices, which cowards call aduised counsell . but victorie is gai- G ned by aduenturing and exposing our selues to danger and perill.

With these and such like speeches he so moued the multitude, which commonly conceiueth most courage vpon the greatest vncertainties, that they desired that they might fight; saying, That they would wash away that foule disgrace with the bloud and slaughter of their enemies: for why, they wanted not weapons, courage, or hands (as they said) to do it withall.

For all this, the grauer sort of the counsel (without whose consent the master might in such cases doe nothing) thought it not good in so dangerous a time to aduenture any great part of their forces, which they should afterwards want for the defence of their city. The Turkish Generall deceiued of his expectation, and perceiuing that the Rhodians would not be drawne H forth to battel at sea, withdrew his fleet twelue miles off, vnto a place called Villanoua; where casting anchor and landing his men, he burnt the corne all thereabouts which was now almost ripe, but forsaken of the people as a thing desperat: as for the people themselues, they were all fled, and had retired themselues either into the citie of the Rhodes, or else into strong castles in other places of the Iland.

At the same time certain troupes of horsemen sent forth to haue skirmished with the Turks that were burning of the corne, were by a messenger sent from the Great Master, commanded to retire: for the prouident Generall sought by all meanes to reserue his soldiers for greater dangers, which he iustly feared in the expected siege: during which time he shewed himself a The wise thie commendation of the Great Master. most politicke captaine and braue soldier, he would many times by day eat his meat with his I soldiers, as one of them, & most part of the night keep watch himselfe, walking vp and down, resting himselfe when hee was wearie vpon some stone or piece of timber, or other homely seat, as it chanced. In time of assault he was alwaies more forward and aduenturous than the graue counsellors wished, fearing neither shot nor enemie; yet did he alwaies more commend discreet counsell grounded vpon reason, than prosperous actions commended but by their euents. And that which a man would wonder at, amongst so many cares in middest of such dinuers & dangerous chances, he carried alwaies such a grace and maiesty in his cheerful countenance, as made him to be of the beholders both reuerenced and loued. All the time he could spare from the necessarie cares of his weighty charge, from assaults, & the naturall refreshing of his body, he bestowed in praier & seruing of God; hee oftentimes spent the greatest part of the night in the church alone praying, his head piece, gorget, & gantlets lying by him: so K that it was often said, that his deuout prayers and carefulnesse would make the city inuincible.

The Turkis fleet descried at sea troubleth the Rhodians. The 26 day of Iune early in the morning, newes was brought into the citie from the watch tower standing vpon S. Stephens hill about a mile from the citie, That a most hugie fleet was descried at sea, making thitherwards all alongst the Westerne coast of Lycia. This bad newes much troubled the city, although it was not of most men vnexpected, all places was filled with tumult and hurly burly, euery man measured the greatnesse of the danger by the measure of his owne feare, & such a pittifulcrie was in euery place as is vsuall in cities presently to bee besieged. Hereupon publicke praiers were made through all the citie, and euery man with great deuotion besought the God of heauen, That as it was his pleasure that the Rhodians L should at that time bee the champions of the Christian religion, so hee would giue them strength & victorie against their enemies, and to turne the calamities of war vpon the enemies of his Name. Their deuotion ended, the gates of the city were shut vp, & people from al places ran vnto the wals, great flocks of women, children, and aged men not able to stand without a staffe going forth of their houses to gaze vpon the dreadfull fleet (wherein was aboue 200 The order of the Turks fleet. sailes as is reported) filled the streets, the tops of the hie towers & houses. The formost of the fleet was the Admiral of Calipolis, to whom Solyman had committed the charge of all his nauie, & to assaile the city by sea: the Rearadmirall was Cara Mahometes an arch pirat, who was afterwards slain with a great shot out of the citie. The Viceadmirall in the middle of the fleet M with a great squadron of gallies, hauing a faire Westerly wind, strucke saile directly before the mouth of the hauen (which was on both sides defended with two strong towers wel furnished with great artillerie) & began to row toward the city: whereupon an alarum was raised, the trumpers sounded, & many hasted vnto the bulwarke which defended the left side of the hauen, which the enemy seemed to direct his course vnto, & was indeed more subiect to danger than

A than the other. But the Turke seeing himselfe in danger to be hurt with shot from the bulwarke, was glad to get himself fe further off vnto the rest of the fleet: the Rhodians from the wals with loud outcries scornfully deriding him for his fooliish attempt. This great fleet in exceeding brauerie and triumph passing by the citie in sight of the Rhodians (standing vpon the wals with ensignes displaied) did not more terrifie them, than they were themselues terrified to behold the strength of the citie, and cheerfulnesse of the defendants. But passing on, they came to the promontorie which the inhabitants call Bo, about three milies distant from the city, Eastward. Which small harbor being not able to receiue so great a fleet, many of the gallies were inforced to ride it out at sea, where they were by shot out of the citie oftentimes indangered & inforced to get them further off. Whilst the enemy was there landing his great B ordnance & other instruments of war prepared for the siege, chusing a place for his camp, transporting his land souldiers from the maine into the Iland, viewing the strength and scituation of the citie, and in what place he might with most ease assault the same: the Rhodians in the mean time were not idle, but sunke diuers deepe founds in many places of the citie neere vnto the wals, to discouer the enemies mines; and fortified their bulwarkes with greater rampiers; in which work euery man put too his helping hand without respect of age or calling. The Grand Master about that time sent Lodouicus Andugus one of the knights of the Order, into Spaine to Charles the Emperor; & Claudius Ducenuillus another of the Order also, to Rome to the Cardinals, & Italian Knights of the Order; and from thence into France vnto the French king with letters: craiuing the aid of these Christian princes, for reliefe of the city, by sea & land C besieged. But all in vain, for they caried away with the endlesse grudge of one against another, or respecting only their own states, returned the embassadors with good words, but no reliefe. The Great Master by his embassadours craueth aid of the christian princes.

At this time Prejanes Gouernor of Chios (of whom we haue before spoken) a man comparable with any of the captains of that age, an excellent soldier both by sea and land, valiant & thereto fortunat, of an inuincible courage, brought vp in the wars from his childhood; when hee had by the space of two or three daies hid himselfe in the rockes at sea, for feare of the Turks great fleet, came by night in a small pinnasse to the Rhodes, hauing deceiued the Turks watch: at whose comming the Rhodians wonderfully reioyced, for the souldiers reposed greater confidence in no man, than in him: and if any great exploit were to be don, him the Master trusted aboue any other: he alwaies in armes during the siege, incouraged the souldiers, fear- The commendation of Prejanes D ched the watch, suruaied the bulwarks, repaired the breaches, & such labors as others accounted extream miseries, he cheerfully indured, as if they had bin but his pleasures and recreations. At the same time also, Gabriel Martiningus of Brixia, a most skilfull enginier, came to the Rhodes out of Creta; by whose industrie and cunning, 55 mines which the Turkes did with infinit labor and charge make (by reason of the springing of the water, and hardnesse of the rockes) during the siege, were all by countermines disappointed and defeated.

The citie of the Rhodes is scituate on a plaine ground, on euery side to be besieged, only The description of the Rhodes. Northward it is defended with a goodly hauen, from whence it lyeth all Westward: betwixt it and the hils round about it, lieth a stony plain ground, not verie broad, but of greater length; these hils are ful of springs, and orchards planted with Oliues, Fig-trees, Vines, and such other E fruits as such drie and sandie ground will beare. But what by nature wanted, was by the hand and industrie of man supplied; for it was compassed about with a most strong double wall, and deepe trenches, threatening the enemie with thirteene stately towers: and sure against all assaults, with fiue mightie bulwarks: with diuers goodly faire gates: and that which was the greatest defence of all, within the citie was alwaies kept a most exact and strait form of warlike discipline. The defence of the whole citie was thus proportioned: from the French tower (which with the greatnesse and heigth thereof seemed to mate the skie) stood the French men with the French Lillies in their ensignes, vnder their Commander Ioannes Abbinus, a noble knight of he Order: from thence to S. Georges gate lay the stout Germans, with the Eagle in their ensignes: in the third station were placed the French Auergnoys, with the Spaniards, F for that the ditches in that place were neither so deep nor broad as elsewhere: in the fift place lay the English garrison, ouer whom the Grand Master himselfe commanded: after them succeeded they of Narbona: and last of all the Italians, in valor not inferior to any of the rest, vnder the leading of Petrus Balinus & Gregorius Morgutas. In euery one of these stations were diuers valiant knights of the Order, whose names (worthie of eternall memorie) for breuity we passe passe ouer, all men of themselues sufficient to haue taken vpon them the whole charge.

A Turkish woman slaue, conspireth to fire the citie.

The enemie was not busier without the citie in placing his batterie, but traiterous minds were as busie within to haue betraied the same. A Turkish woman, slaue to one of the rich citizens, had conspired with certaine other her complices, at such time as the Turks should giue assault vnto the towne, at one instant to set on fire the houses wherein they dwelt in diuers places of the citie, that the defendants drawne from the wals to quench the fire, the Turkes in the meane time might the more easily enter. But this treason was in good time reuealed, and the offenders worthily executed.

The Turks had not as yet placed their batterie, when as they tooke a certaine hill, whereon stood the church dedicated to Cosmus and Damianus, directly ouer against the English station: from thence (as it seemed, rather for exercising of their soldiers than for any great harm they could do so far off) they began with small battering pieces to shoot into the citie: and afterwards they began to dig mines, and to cast vp trenches: for the performance of which kind of worke, and for the filling vp of the towne ditches, they had brought with them fiftie thousand pioners, men better acquainted with country labor and keeping of cattell, than with wars; which being inforced vnto their labor day and night, somtime with stripes and somtime with death, did with incredible celeritie bring that to passe, which was before thought impossible. They cut waies through the most hard stony rocks, raising the plains as hie as mountains, with earth brought two miles off, and laying the mountains euen with the plaines, & yet they neuer wrought in safetie, but were miserably rent in sunder with the great ordnance out of the towne: and that which most of all troubled them, the Rhodians sallying out vpon those ouer-labored people, hauing neither courage nor skil to defend themselues, but trusting only to their heeles, slew great numbers of them, and not of them only, but of others also appointed for their defence, whom the Rhodians (taking courage of their feare) fiercely pursued & slew down-right. And when many others issuing out of the campe in great companies, thought to haue relieued their fellowes, the great ordnance before of purpose placed to most aduantage, so thundred from the wals among the thickest of them, that the ground lay couered with the bodies and weapons of the dead Turks. With which manner of fight, after the Rhodians had twice or thrice troubled the enemy, the Turks for their more safety wrought most vpon their mounts by night, keeping most strong watch for defence of their pioners, which for more assurance they doubled in the day time, and bent their artillerie against the places which the Rhodians vsed to sallie out at: which did not so much keep them in, as the feare of weakning themselues by often sallies, knowing that one man was vnto them a greater losse, than vnto the enemie an hundred. Amongst others which in the beginning of this great siege forced the vttermost of their deuices to the destruction of the Turks, were certain mariners, who hauing the Turkish language perfectly, by leaue of the Graund Master (disguising themselues in the habit of Turkes) departed by night out of the hauen in a small boat, loaded with apples, plums, peares, millons, grapes, & such other fruits as the time of the yeare afforded; and in the darknesse came along the coast, vnto that part of the Island wherunto the passage was out of the main. There as if they had bin Turks come from the maine, they landed their commodities, which the Turkish soldiers bought greedily. When they had thus sold their fruits, and in selling therof diligently noted the speech and talke of the soldiers concerning the siege, and were now readie to depart, certaine Turks which greatly disliked the hard beginning of this siege, seeing themselues if they did but stir, in danger to be set off with shot out of the towne, earnestly requested the mariners to take them with them into the maine: which to doe, at the first the marriners dissembling, refused, as a thing dangerous; & besides that, their boat was too little to receiue so many as would willingly haue gone with them. Yet with much adoe, they suffred themselues to be intreated to take in seuen or eight, such a number as they could wel master; who in hope of passing ouer into the maine, were (contrary to their expectation) brought prisoners to the Rhodes, where they were by Preianes brought vp to the top of the highest tower of S. Iohns church, from whence they might see all about the country, and well deserie all the maner of the Turks camp, which they simplie discouered vnto the captain, and what soeuer els they were demanded: and amongst other things confessed, that the souldiers were greatly discontented with the siege, hauing in the beginning thereof lost so many men, and that they were readie to rise in mutinie against their captaines, and would hardly by them be

The painfulnesse of the Turkes pioners.

The Turks deceiued by the christian mariners.

A be commanded out of their trenches and cabbins, saying, that all they did was but lost labour, and that they should find it another peece of worke to win the Rhodes, than they had at Belgrade: wherefore if they were wise, they should in time depart before they had receiued further harme both from the enemie, and for want of necessaries, wherewith the souldiers began alreadie to be pinched. Al which was then supposed to haue bin spoken by the captiues to please him in whose power they now were: yet it appeared afterwards to be all true. For Pyrrhus Bassa considering the troubled state of the camp, & the general discontentment of the soldiers, whom he was at that time gladder to please than to punish, writ vnto Solyman at Constantinople, That if he would the siege should goe forward, he should without delay come in
B person himselfe to the campe, for that the souldiers without regard of shame were ready to rise in mutinie and to abandon the siege, refusing to be commanded by their captaines.

In the meane time whilest Solyman prepareth himselfe to set forward, the Turkish captaines vnderstood by certaine fugitiues (whereof in all wars some are to be found) that the high steeple of S. Iohns church serued them of the towne for a watch tower: for which cause, and for despight of the Crosse standing vpon the top thereof, they laboured nothing more, than with continuall shot to beat downe that tower; which whilest they were doing with great diligence, Solyman himselfe came into the campe the 28 day of August in the afternoone: where finding in his armie all the signes of cowardise and feare that could be spoken of or deuised, and nothing done according to the command of such as he had appointed for that charge, but all things out of order, he tooke more griefe to see that great disorder, than he did pleasure
C and good hope of two hundred thousand souldiers which were in his armie. Yet, for all that he was inwardly chafed with the heat of youth and indignation, against his owne people as well as the Rhodians, he moderated himselfe betwixt his owne rage and the offence of his souldiers, and calling them together, caused them to be disarmed, not leauing among them so much as a sword: and compassing them in with fifteene thousand harquebusiers whom hee had brought with him well appointed, hee stept vp into his royall seat, there set on high for that purpose; where sitting downe, he paused a good while without any word speaking, as if he had considered with himselfe, whether he should onely punish the authors of the mutinie, or else with the punishment of many to reuenge so foule a sedition, little differing from open rebellion. But following of himselfe the milder resolution, he thought it sufficient to correct
D the multitude and common sort of souldiers with sharpe and bitter words: and after generall silence made, brake out into this chollericke speech.

Solymans chollerick Oration to his souldiers.

Slaues (quoth he) for I cannot find in my heart to call you souldiers, What kind of men are you now become? are you Turkes? men woont both to fight and ouercome? Verily I see the bodies, countenances, attire, and habit of my souldiers; but the deeds, speeches, counsels and deuices of cowardly and vile traitors. Alas how hath my opinion deceiued mee? that Turkish force and courage is gone, the valour and strength both of bodies and mindes, wherewith the Arabians, Persians, Syrians, Egyptians, Seruians, Hungarians, Bulgarians, Epirotes, Macedonians and Thracians were subdued, is lost: forgetting your countrey, your oath, the command of your captaines, your obedience, and all other warlike
E discipline; you haue against the Maiestie of my Empire refused to fight, like cowards betaken your selues to flight, for vaine feare of death and danger, not beseeming men of warre. If any man should at home but haue named the Rhodes in your feasts, amongst your pots, in your assemblies or great meetings, you could then with your tongues bragge to pull it downe, you had much adoe to hold your hands: here, when I would make proofe of your force and courage, it is nothing. But you thought perhaps, that the Rhodians so soone as they saw your ensignes before their gates, would straight way yeeld themselues and their Citie into your power: Let all men cease so to say or thinke, and beleeue me that know the truth, This base and infamous denne (which you see) is full of most cruell beasts, whose madesse you shall neuer tame, without much labour and bloudshed. Yet shall wee tame them; for why nothing is so wild but at length it may be tamed; which except I bring to passe, I am fully F resolued and haue vowed vnto my selfe, Either heere to die, or spend my daies; And if euer I doe or say otherwise, let this my head, my fleete, mine armie, and Empire, bee for euer accursed and vnfortunate.

And so without further speech, desiring rather to be accounted of his soldiers gentle than seuere seuere, he pardoned them all their former offences, and swore them all againe to his obedience. This mutiny so appeased, all things were afterwards done with better successe, and greater care both of the souldiers and commanders. First, they planted in diuers places twelue great bombards, wherewith they threw vp stones of hugie weight into the ayre, which falling downe into the citie, might breake downe the houses and whatsoeuer else they lighted vpon: with the fall of one of these, the Great Master was like to haue bin slaine. Howbeit this proued a deuise of more terror than danger, for with 200 such shot were but ten men slaine; which thing amongst others, Apella a traiterous fugitiue declared vnto the enemy, with whom he had intelligence, as he himselfe confessed being taken vpon suspition and examined: for which his treason he was justly executed.

Apella a traitor

The force of the batterie was more feared, wherein the Turks had planted fortie great pieces of batterie, and amongst them twelue Basiliskes (so aptly named of the serpent Basiliscus, who as Plinie writeth, killeth man or beast with his sight) with these pieces the Turks battered the wals continually; but lying somewhat far off, did no great harme.

The Turks batterie.

At the same time also Solyman caused batterie to be laid against the tower of S. Nicholas, standing vpon a narrow piece of ground pointing far into the sea, defending the hauen vpon the right hand, where sometime stood the great Colossus of the Sun, accounted the greatest amongst the seuen wonders of the world. Which castle was both strongly and sumptuously built at the charges of the Dukes of Burgondie, as appeared by their armes there engrauen in many places in marble. This tower was valiantly defended by Guido a French man, who had the charge thereof, with 200 souldiers, amongst whom were 30 knights of the Order.

The Turks artillerie planted against the tower, was by the skilfulnes of the Christian canoniers in short time dismounted with shot from the tower, and many of the gunners slaine: so that they were glad to surcease any more to batter the tower by day, but lying still all the day they began to batter the same by night, wherein they preuailed no more than they had before done in the day time; for the defendants warily obseruing such places as were likest for the enemie to place his batterie in, did so aptly place their ordnance against the same, and to so good purpose, that the Turks swore, their doings were by some meanes discouered vnto the enemies. So when they had in vaine bestowed 500 great shot, and made a small breach which they durst not once attempt to enter, they shamefully abandoned that place also.

At this while Pyrrhus was busie in working of mines to vndermine the citie, two and thirty of which mines the defendants frustrated with countermines; in which kind of worke many were lost on both sides: yet for all the carefulnesse of the Christians, the English bulwarke was vndermined by the enemie, & vpon the fourth of September part thereof blown vp, with such violence, that vnto them in the city it seemed at the first to be a generall earthquake; and therewith diuers English men were there ouerwhelmed. The Turks attempting presently to enter, were by the Grand Master and his followers with great slaughter repulsed.

But Mustapha the Bassa comming on with fresh supplies, and crying out of the cowardise of them which retired, renewed the assault: where for a while was fought a most sharpe & cruell fight, the leaders cheerfully encouraging their soldiers, and they likewise doing what was possible for men to doe. All mens eares were filled with the thundering of the shot, noise of trumpets and drums, and crying of men. And vnto the Turks it seemed that ouer their heads it rained deadly shot, stones, and fire: for the townsmen and women mingled with the soldiers cast downe vpon the Turks, fire, stones, timber, and whatsoeuer els came to hand: so that they vnable longer to indure the courage and force of the Christians, turned their backs and ran away by heaps, not expecting any signe of retreat, euery man seeking to saue one: among whom as they fled, the great ordnance shot off from the wals made wonderfull slaughter. At this assault of the Turks were slaine (as some write) almost 2000, and among them the master of the Turks ordnance, a man whom Solyman greatly loued: which victorie the Christians gained not without some losse, for besides some few others that were slaine, fiftie knights of the Order (men worthie of eternall memorie) there ended their daies also.

The Turks assault the English bulwarke the second time, and are againe beaten.

The fift day after (which was the ninth day of September) Solyman by the persuasion of Mustapha the great Bassa, commanded a fresh assault to be giuen to the English Bulwarke, which was attempted by the Turkes with greater resolution than the first. Seuen ensignes of the Turks were broken in by the ruins of the bulwarke, & had inforced the defendants, oppressed with with number to giue ground, when the Graund Master comming in with the ensigne of the Order, guarded with a companie of most valiant knights, draue them out againe by force, and made good the place. Mustapha seeing his men retire, couragiously restored the battell by bringing on of new supplie, and other captains with threats, strokes, and terrour of death, enforced the souldiers (who had before turned their backs) now againe to fight. So that there began a more cruell fight than had before been from the beginning of the siege, which was vnto the Christians more dangerous, for that they were ouerwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkish shot. But in that extremitie no man regarded either danger, or life, only this they remembred, That those were their barbarous enemies, whom they must either victoriously ouercome, or die therefore: with which furie the assault was continued by the space of three houres, vntill at length Mustapha with his Turks discouraged, with the losse of 2000 of their fellowes, and of three great noble men, whom Solyman especially fauored, and sore beaten by the Spaniards out of their flankers, were inforced to retire. Few of the Christians in respect of so many enemies, were slaine: yet had the ensigne of the Order bin then lost, Ioachimus Cluys the ensigne bearer hauing both his eies shot out, had not Emericus Rinaulx an Auergnois, and one of the knights of the Order, with incredible courage rescued the same.

After this second assault, falling out so vnluckily vnto the Turks, Mustapha the great Bassa began to grow in contempt with Solyman: and Pyrrhus to keepe his credit by doing something, with continuall batterie of 17 great pieces, did batter the mount neere vnto the Italian bulwarke. At which time also Cassius Gouernor of Bythinia, another of the Turks great commanders, laboured by vndermining to haue ouerthrowne the French bulwarke: so glad they were to attempt any thing to content their imperious great lord and master. But the indeauors of Cassius was by countermines through the careful diligence of Gabriel Cheresius, hauing charge of those workes, frustrated: and Pyrrhus in the other place after hee had by hot assault slaine them which were appointed for the defence thereof, and gained the mount, and brought a great feare vpon the citie, was againe with great losse shamefully repulsed, and by the commandement of Solyman caused to retire. At this assault the Gouernor of Euboea, Solyman his Lieutenant generall, a man of great honour (if any of the Turks slaues are so to be accounted) was slaine, for whose death Solyman was exceeding pensiue and heauie.

Mustapha the Bassa finding himself in disgrace with Solyman for the two vnfortunat assaults by him giuen at the English station, determined if it were possible by a third to recouer his lost credit: and for his better successe therein, agreed with Achimetes another great commander, at the same time to assault the Spanish bulwarke: according to this resolution Achimetes hauing with a mine suddenly blowne vp a great part of the wall of the Spanish station, in the thicke of the dust and smoke, presently entered his men, who by the ruins of the wall recouered the top of the rampiers. Mustapha also at the same instant hardly charged the English, so that in both places was made a hard and doubtfull fight. Mustapha, desiring nothing more than with better successe now to redeeme his former dishonour, did what he might to incourage the soldiers, calling vpon them by name, and putting them in remembrance of their former victories. The Rhodians on the other side mindfull of their former honour, with the greatnesse of the present danger, valiantly repulsed the enemie, and forced him with shame to retire. In this assault many Englishmen were slaine, and Preianes also sore hurt, hauing before slaine many of the Turks. Mustapha beside the losse of his men, had also two of his ensignes taken by Christopherus Vauldericke, Commendator of the German knights. Achimetes hauing won the top of the wals, had there set vp the Turkish ensignes; but by the valiantnes of the defendants, & by means of certain small pieces of ordnance, by Martinengus aptly placed in the houses before the new made breach, and by force of shot out of the flankers on both sides of the breach, wherof none fell in vaine, he was again inforced to forsake the wals and to retire.

The English bulwark assaulted the third time by Mustapha.

The Turks ensignes aduanced to the top of the wals, are againe cast downe.

The three and twentieth day of September, the Turkish captaines hoping by meanes of a mine which they had made against the Auergne bulwarke, to enter and win the citie; approching the wals with great multitudes of souldiers, ready to haue entred vpon the blowing vp of the mine, which being met with a countermine out of the citie, wrought not such effect as was by them expected: so that hauing receiued some harm, standing in a place of great disaduantage, and done nothing, they returned again into the camp. Yet all the expert captains probably coniecturing that the wal might be inwardly shaken by the mine, though it were not by them them outwardly perceiued caused that part of the wall to be most violently battered all the rest of that day and night following: and by the fury of their artillerie, made a faire and large breach. All that night was heard in the Turkes campe an vnwonted clattering of weapons, and of men running too and fro, as if there had bin some great matter a doing; which the Rhodians coniecturing (as the truth was) to be a signe of some great assault to be shortly giuen.

Solyman resoluing the next day with al his force to assault the new made breach, after he had by himselfe in a melancholly mood walked vp and downe in his tent a great part of the night, sent for the chiefe commanders of his army, to whom he declared his mind as followeth:

Your valour and wisedome (worthie captaines) needeth not any exhortation, yet the desperate madnesse of our enemies maketh me to speake vnto you these few words. Who whilest they yet doe, as from the beginning, as men without reason desperatly defend their citie rent with our artillerie, shaken with our mines, their Churches and houses beaten downe about their eares, wearied and worne out with slaughter, labour, and wounds, which must needs befall men so oftentimes assaulted, they worthily [illegible] vnto our souldiers men of inuincible force and courage; which opinion to haue removed, much concerneth the happie and wished successe of our assault. Wherefore I would haue you with effectuall persuasion and bountifull promises to hearten on our men to the winning of this citie. Besides this, you shall open vnto them my purpose and intent, and that they should not thinke that they are brought hither to besiege one citie; but that in taking this one, they shall vpon the matter make a way into all the dominions of the Christians. Heere be the kinsmen, aliance, and friends of all the Kings, Princes, and Potentates of Christendome: heere is all our enemies treasure, the spoile whereof promised vnto our souldiers may serue to great purpose to encourage them forward: here is the store of ordnance, armour, and other warlike prouision, which shall both furnish vs, and in time to come miserably confound the rest of the Christians. We shall beside this, enioy a most goodly and rich citie, with a hauen of all others most commodious, from whence all things necessarie for war may at all times as occasion shall require, by land and sea be supplied: which as they shall be to vs things of great importance, so shall we despoile our enemies of far greater. This is their castle, storehouse, treasurie, and armorie: thus is the very receptacle and place of refuge for all such as trouble the Turks by sea: from hence shall we haue free scope and passage into Apulia, Calabria, Sicilia, and many other Christian countries. But as for your selues valiant captaines, when as I consider how that you haue within these few moneths by your valour and wisedome subdued vnto my Empire the strong citie of Belgrade, which my great grandfather Mahomet that mightie Emperour could not with all his power get; I rest in great hope that these fierce and obstinate Christians shall not long be able to defend themselues in these their dens and lurking places.

Hauing ended this speech, the captaines euery one vnto his companie, made knowne what the great Emperors will and pleasure was, and open proclamation made thorow all the camp, wherein the spoile of that rich city was all granted vnto the souldiers, as a prey and reward for the paines they were to take.

Solyman heauie with sleepe and care, laied himselfe downe vpon his pallat to take his rest. But the Great Master (to whom the vnaccustomed stirre of the enemie portended some great matter) all that night in armes, painefully viewed euery part of the citie, cheerefully encouraging his souldiers to remember, That they did watch for the safetie of their countrey, their liues and libertie. Fortuned the same night, that a poore Christian ferning a Turke in the campe, calling secretly vnto the watchmen vpon the wals, gaue them warning that the Turks prepared the next day to giue a generall assault vnto the citie. Which thing when the Great Master vnderstood, because he would haue nothing done rashly or fearefully (as it commonly happeneth in things done vpon the sudden) called together his Knights, and spake vnto them, as followeth.

The Great Master his oration vnto his knights

I am glad sacred companions and fellowes in armes, that the time is come when in one battell getting vnto your selues great honour, and defending your countrey, you may bee iustly accounted the worthie defenders and reuengers of the Christian commonweale and name. The people against whome wee are to fight to morrow, assaileth vs only presuming vpon their multitude: But if wee measure valour, not by number, but by courage and prowesse, vndoubtedly a few resolute men will easily ouercome a multitude of cowards. You know your enemie, and the manner of his fight: you are to fight (most (most worthie knights) with them whom you haue alwaies vanquished at sea, and in iust battell sometimes ouercome by land, at such time as with their whole power they assaulted your wals: omitting in the meane time many hot skirmishes, wherein you euer put them to the worst: Wherefore you and they in the assault ■ morrow shall haue such courage, as conquerors and men conquered vse to haue. Neither will they fight, because they dare fight, but because the great tyrant and violent command of their captaines enforceth them thereunto. Wherefore remembring what you are by birth, what opinion the Christian commonwealth hath conceiued of you, where you are, and what you haue taken vpon you; take vp your armes with iust furie and indignation, and fight against them, following one franticke youth, as if you saw your slaues bearing armes against you: whereunto you are inforced, not onely by the indignitie of the wrong by them offered, but also by necessitie, which of it selfe is of power to make cowards valiant and hardie. For here we are in an iland from whence we cannot escape, and in a citie, whose rent and battered walls doe not so much protect and defend vs, as our weapons; wherefore to morrow we must heere either vanquish them, or die therefore: ■ morrow shall giue vnto vs either ioyfull victorie, or a most honourable death.

As he was yet thus speaking, newes of approch of the enemie caused him to make an end: and euery man hasted with speed vnto the place of his charge. The enemie comming fast on, with a most horrible crie (as their manner is) fiercely assailed the citie in fiue places, where the English, Spanish, Italians, Narbonenses,, and Auergnoys had their stations. To the assault of euery of which places, Solyman had appointed ten thousand Turkes. Mustapha the Bassa calling vpon the name of his great Prophet Mahomet, and promising vnto the souldiers the rich spoile of the citie, fiercely assailed the English station, from whence he had beene three times before shamefully repulsed. Pyrrhus the other great Bassa, with like furie assaulted the Italian station. In both places was maintained a cruell and deadly fight; the Turks fighting for the prey, and the Rhodians for their liues and libertie. Neither was there any, of what degree or order soeuer, which did not that day fight for the defence of the citie. The priests and religious were not then exempted, but fought among other souldiers; women, children, and with them the aged fathers, beyond the strength of their bodies and courage of their minds, brought weapons vnto the defendants, some stones, which they had digged out of the streets, some burning pitchbarrels, some hoops with wild fire, some scalding oyle, some boiling pitch: which being cast down vpon the enemies, troubled them so, as nothing was more feared; for vpon whomsoeuer it fel, it stucke fast, and so scalded their bodies, that they were glad to cast down their weapons to teare off their clothes, wherewith many of them rent off the skin and flesh also. All which things fel so thick vpon the Turks, as if it had rained fire & stones, besides the deadly shot, which amongst such a multitude of enemies neuer fel in vain. The Great Master hauing a careful eye ouer euery part of the city, after he had well relieued the Italian station, which was at the first hardly distressed by Pyrrhus, left there Antonius Monterollus, one of the knights of the Order, with such company as he thought conuenient for the safety of that place, & went himselfe with the rest vnto the English station, which was then hardly laid to by the Bassa Mustapha. But whilest he was there busied in repulsing the enemie, & had now well relieued the place, a sudden crie ran alongst the wals, that the Spanish bulwarke was already possessed by the enemy: with which heauy news he was not a little troubled, but leauing there Emericus Gombaulus, one of the knights of the Order, with a chosen companie of soldiers for the defence of that place; he with his guard hasted vnto the Spanish station, which he found by a wonderful chance already taken by the enemy. In the beginning of the assault, certain Turks to shun the danger of the shot, had for feare hidden themselues at the foot of this bulwarke, among the stones, which had before bin beaten downe with the batterie: in the meane time, other Turkes of the same regiment, vnder the leading of the valiant captain Achimetes, hotly charged the Spaniards on the right hand of the bulwarke, not medling with the bulwarke it selfe, as a thing of greatest strength: the valiant soldiers appointed for the defence of the bulwark, seeing their fellows & countrymen distressed fast by them on the right hand, could not indure to stand stil as lookers on, but left the bulwark, & went to the place so hardly assaulted: where whilst they were valiantly incountring the enemy, the cowardly Turks who had before hid themselues for feare, hearing al still ouer their heads, & therby guessing (as the truth was) that the defendants were drawn thence to another place more distressed; to color their feare, & proue

The Spanish bulwarke taken by the Turks.

Now my fellowes (most valiant souldiers) what great things you indure for mine honour, and the glorie of your Emperor. This continuall threatnings of the heauens, this immoderate raine, this terrible thunder and lightening, the coldnesse of the weather, the want of necessaries, with the manyfold miscries of this long siege, do much perswade me, to giue you leaue to lay downe armes and to take your rest.
But if (as we consider of vnto men of courage it be not a dishonour, for the tediousnesse of paine and trauell, to leaue vnto our enemies the victorie alreadie in our hands, and shamefully to forsake our trenches, mines, and entrapping not onely the wals of the citie, but mating the heauens, with such other like works made with my instant charge and your great trauell, all for the taking of this citie. Truely this were either honor not base beene taken in hand at all, or being once begun, is to bee ended for the honour of the Ottomain empire. Which for so much as it could not be accomplished in Summer; the extremitie of whose cowrse in common, and the regard of the commoditie of euerie one of you in priuat, enforceth vnto performe it in Winter. For if wee shall from hence depart with our armie, who doubts but the enemie, not onely for desire of reuenge, but also strained by necessitie, hauing lost all hee had of his owne, will prey vpon your countries, houses, and goods, and will bring you, your wiues, and children, into a farre more miserable slaverie and bondage, than that wherein he himselfe now is? Wherefore I admit no excuse to continue the siege, and neuer to depart before you haue attained vnto the end of your desires.
And admit there were no necessitie in the matter, yet the honour and fame of the action ought to impose vpon you a resolution both of bodie and mind to indure the siege: For the eies and countenances of all nations, especially the Christians, are fixed vpon you; whom when they shall vnderstand not to be able to endure the seuerest Winter, they will of right call you Summer birds, which so soone as any stormie weather looke after your houses and places of repose. It is reported, that the Grecians for a strumpet besieged Troy ten yeares; and shall not the Turkes, vexed and oppressed with slaughters, robberies, inua-sions both in sea and land, and that more is with the seruitude of 214 yeares, endure one Winters siege?
They will say, that the terror of your name is but vaine, and that fame hath encreased the same (as many other things moe) which not seene, are more feared in far countries amongst men of small experience:
And that now euerie man may safely enough abide your force, which make your inuasions rather vpon a furie and braverie than vpon any good resolution, which in all kind of war (but especially in besieging of cities) is most necessarie: whereof many being by naturall scituation and fortification impregnable, time hath with her handmaides, Famine and Thirst, ouercome and vanquished, as it shall doe this citie of the Rhodes: against which beloued in armes there is a secret mischiefe prepared, which may not in this open audience be published; for it is as necessarie that the vulgar sort should be ignorant of some things, as to know the same.

Many thought, that this was spoken rather of policie than vpon any good ground: and although his hot perswasion had little moued the cold courage of his despairing souldiers, yet the regard of dutie in that most loyall nation, with the greedie expectation of so great a secret, ouercame all other difficulties; so that they departed (at leastwise in shew) contented to indure whatsoeuer should befall.

Achimetes authour of this great expectation, and the onely hope of Solymans successe, came oftentimes and assailed the Vamures of the Auergne station, which although they were not verie high, yet were they alwaies valiantly defended by the Rhodians. It fortuned, that this warlike captaine dayly attempting the Vaumures, in the end by force obtained the same, and so possessed of the place he so much desired, desperatly kept it vntill greater helpe came running in, who with wonderfull expedition (with matter for that purpose before prepared) clapt vp a strong and defensible couering in manner of a penthouse against the towne wal, betwixt the wall and the Vaumure, vnder which they shrowded themselues from the defendants; which was an easie matter for such a multitude to do, the ditches of the towne in that place being now filled vp so high, that the defendants could not out of the flankers scoure the ditch, nor yet without manifest danger come to cast any thing downe vpon them from the top of the wals: for the Turks harquebusiers which lying vpon their mounts, higher than the battered wals of the citie, suffered none to appeare vpon them without danger. So that the Rhodians who erst thought themselues at great quiet, were now ouertaken with a sudden and an vnexpected mischiefe: which at the first filled the citie with feare and heauie silence, which straightwaies after brake out into pittifull outcries and lamentations. The Turks lurking vnder their penthouse, laboured with mattocks and pickaxes to dig vp the foundation of the

A the wall; and Preianes forward and couragious to do what might be done threw downe vpon the Turks, fire, scalding oyle, burning pitch, wild-fire and such things. But when the miserable men which shrunke from the worke for feare of the fire, were againe beaten forward by their imperious commanders, and presently slaine if they made any delay, and fresh men still thrust on in stead of such as were hurt or slain: the fatall worke begun the seuenth day of October, went apace forward, with the great and continuall labour of these wretched slaues. A great number of the common souldiers whom the Turks call Asapi was imployed in this worke: of whom Solyman in this siege of the Rhodes, and other his expeditions, made not much more account but as of pioners to worke in mines and to cast vp trenches, and oftentimes with their bodies to fill towne ditches to make a way for the Ianizaries to passe ouer vpon: they by

The miserable state of the common souldiers of the Turks, and the small account is made of them.

B the constraint of Achimetes vndermined the wall, and as they wrought, shoared vp the same againe with timber, whereunto they afterwards set fire, hoping by that means to ouerthrow the wal, which falling not out according to their expectation; for that they had not far enough vndermined it, they assaied with great hooks and strong ropes to haue pulled it downe. But the Rhodians with their great ordnance from the Auergne bulwarke, quickly put them from that mad worke with great slaughter, and frustrated all their long labor. Achimetes thus disappointed of his purpose, stood in great doubt whether he should giue ouer the enterprise, for that he saw he laboured in vain, or else in that dangerous place to expect some better hap, the onely meane to saue him from the tyrants heauie displeasure; who as he knew measured all things by the euent. Solyman vnderstanding by Achimetes that the wall (although it was not

C ouerthrown as was expected) was yet sore shaken and weakned with vndermining, caused his batterie to be planted against that part of the wal so vndermined: which so many waies weakned, & now sore battered, fell downe daily more and more. For remedie wherof, the Rhodians laboured day and night to raise a new wall, in stead of that which was beaten downe.

At the same time, Solyman perswaded by the generall opinion of all his great captaines, that the citie was that day or neuer to be taken, determining to giue another generall assault, caused proclamation to be made thorow his camp: wherein he gaue the spoile of the citie vnto his souldiers, and the more to encourage them, spake vnto them in few words, as followeth:

D Fortune at length valiant souldiers, hauing notably proued your courage and patience, now offereth vnto you the worthie rewards of your labour and paines. The victorie and wealth of your enemies which you haue so much desired, is now in your hands. Now is the time to make an end of this mungrell people, of whom more are slaine than left aliue; and they not men, but the shadowes and ghosts of men, feeble and spent with hunger, wounds, wants and labour; who will I know resist you, not because they so dare, but because of necessitie they so must, enforced thereunto with all extremities. Wherefore now reuenge your selues of the fashood, cruelties, and villanies of these Christians, and make them a wofull example to all posteritie, that neuer man hereafter presume to offer iniurie to a Turke, in whatsoeuer state he be. The way is already open into the citie, there is a faire breach made whereby thirtie horsemen may at once enter, nothing wanteth but courage in you to assaile the same.

Solyman encourageth his souldiers to a fresh assault.

E The souldiers encouraged with this speech of their Emperour, made great shew of cheerfulnesse, and promised to doe their vttermost deuoire, threatning vnto the Christians most horrible death and miserable captiuitie.

In the meane time, the great shot flying continually thorow the breach, did beat downe many houses in the citie; but the countermure new built against the breach standing vpon a lower ground, it seldome toucht, to the great good of the Rhodians. The ratling of the falling houses, the horrible noise of the enemie, with the thundering of the great artillerie, wonderfully terrified the miserable citizens: in euery place was heard the lamentation of women and children, euery thing shewed the heauinesse of the time, and seemed as altogether lost and forlorne. The day thus troublesomely spent, the night followed much more troublesome; and

F after the night, the day of assault of all other most dreadfull: for with the dawning thereof, the glistering ensignes of the enemie were seene flying in the wind, and the Turks cheerfull with the hope of spoile and victory, hasted towards the breach with great outcries and songs, after their countrey manner: and there before one of the gates of the citie called S. Ambrose gate, set downe a great number of their ensignes decke with garlands, in token of victory. The

The distressed estate of the Rhodians and their courageous resolution therin.

Turks great fleet also at the same time sayling too and fro before the hauen; made shew as if it would haue assailed the citie on that side: who had seen the citie so beset, would haue said that it would at one instant haue bin besieged both by sea and land; and to most mens iudgements, it seemed that the Rhodian state should that day haue taken end & bin destroied. Yet for al these extremities, the Rhodians were nothing discouraged, but looking vpon their weapons as the onely remainders of their hopes, not regarding any danger, vpon the alarme giuen came running out of their houses by heaps vnto the wals, like desperat men opposing their bodies in stead of their battered wals against their enemies in defence of their countrey. There needed neither exhortation nor command of captaine, euery man was vnto himselfe a persuader to fight valiantly in defence of the citie; and one of them propounded vnto another the cruell death, the miserable seruitude, the mockes and taunts they should indure, if they should chance to come into the proud enemies hand: all which was to be auoided either by honorable victorie or death. The Turks conducted by Achimetes, fiercely assailed the breach, which was by the Rhodians (standing vpon the ruins of their wals valiantly defended. In the meane time the dismaied matrons and maidens, some in their houses, with heauie hearts expected the wofull destruction of the citie & themselues, others some in the Churches with flouds of tears and lamentable cries, poured forth their praiers to the Almightie, crauing his helpe in that their hard distresse, and to protect them against their barbarous enemies. The deadly fight at the breach, was on both sides with great courage and force maintained. The Turks were in good hope forthwith to win the city, if they did but a little more straine themselues: & therfore to terrifie the Rhodians the more, oftentimes in their fighting gaue out most terrible outcries: and the Rhodians accounted the Turks as good as vanquished, for they being so many in number, and in a place of such indifferency, had not yet preuailed: beside that, they were greatly incouraged with the greatnesse of the common danger, and the sight one of anothers valor, so that by their inuincible courage the Turks were inforced shamefully to retire. The Rhodians seeing their enemies turne their backes, gaue a great shout in derision of them: the Turks disdaining that they in number many (and now victors, if they should with a little resolution maintain the assault they had begun) should be so derided of a handfull of men as good as already vanquished, with great indignation returned again to the breach, & more furiously assailed the Rhodians than at the first. At which time the citie had vndoubtedly bin taken, had not they which defended the ends of the wal, yet standing on both sides of the breach, out of their baricadoes with their shot ouerwhelmed the Turks thronging in at the breach; & others with murthring shot out of the flankers of the new built wal so cut them in sunder, that a greater slaughter for the time was hardly in any place seen. Achimetes beholding the wonderfull slaughter of his souldiers, and that he fought with great disaduantage and losse, against desperat men, who resoluing to die, feared no danger, gaue ouer the assault, and againe retired: leauing behind him in the breach and town ditch, the carkasses of fiue thousand of his dead Turks besides many more which afterwards died vpon the hurts there receiued.

The Turks trouble the Rhodians with continuall alarms, and by casting vp of trenches get into the city

This assault was giuen vnto the town the last day of Nouember, a day dedicated to S. Andrew: after which time the captains of the Turkish army, although they dispaired not of the victorie, yet terrified with so great slaughter of their men, resolued with one accord no more to attempt the city with any notable assault; but by sundry great trenches to be made thorow the midst of the ruins of the wals, to get into the city; & with matoks & pickaxes to ouerthrow the new made wall and another barricado which the defendants had made within the same: and in the mean time whilest this was in doing, to keepe the Rhodians still busied with continuall skirmishes and alarmes. This deuise put in execution by the wonderfull labor of such a multitude of people, serued the enemie to greater purpose than all that he had before done: who daily ouerthrowing or destroying the new fortifications which the Rhodians made in stead of them which were before ouerthrown, and by little & little creeping on further, draue the defendants to that extremity, that they were glad to pul down many of their houses, therwith to make new fortifications, and to make their citie lesse, by casting vp of new trenches: so that in short time they were brought to that point, that they could not wel tel which place to fortifie first, the enemie was now so far crept within them: for the ground which the enemie had thus gained within the city, was almost 200 paces in breadth, & 150 paces in length.

Solyman, although he did now assure himselfe of the victorie, and was by nature cruell and desirous

A desirous of reuenge; yet persuaded by Achimetes and Cassius (two of his most valiant captaines) that for the inlarging of his empire, nothing was better than the fame of clemencie: commanded Pyrrhus the old Bassa to proue if the Rhodians might by parley be drawne to yeeld their citie vpon reasonable conditions. Whereupon the Bassa sent one Hieronimus Monelia, a Genoway, vnto the wals, who crauing of the defendants safe conduct, said he had something to say tending to the common good of the distressed city. Al mens minds were presently filled with expectation of some great matter, & he commanded to speake. Who answered, that he might not deliuer his message openly, but would either by speech in secret, or by letters deliuer the same vnto one Mathias de Via his countryman, one of the citizens of the Rhodes. When Fra. Fornouius, one of the knights of the Order, a Frenchman of a chollericke disposition, whose great courage was well seene in all that siege (hauing as it is reported, with shot out of Saint Georges tower himselfe slaine 500 Turks during the time of that siege) being now present, and moued with indignation to heare a motion made of priuat conference with the enemie: bent his piece vpon the messenger, & caused him forthwith to depart without doing his message. Many who in time of the assault feared not any danger, but were altogether become desperat and careles of themselues, after that they had vnderstood that the enemie had offered parley, and that they began to conceiue some hope of life: resorted vnto the Great Master, requesting him, that he would prouide for the safetie of his louing people, whose warlike forces was with many assaults sore weakned, the citie beaten downe about their eares, and most of them which were left, either wounded or sick. They had (as they said) now sufficiently proued both their force and fortune: wherefore he should do well, to beware, lest while he were too long in consulting, the enemie should conceiue a further indignation in seeing his offers refused. With these and such speeches they inforced the great master to send embassadors to Solyman. The men that were sent, were Anthonius Groleus a Frenchman, ensigne bearer for the Order, a man of great reputation for his wisedome and experience, and with him Robertus Barusius, a man of great grauitie, and skilfull in the Greeke tongue: for whom was receiued as pledges, a kinsman of the great captaine Achimetes, and a certaine Epirot which fled out of the city vnto the Turks, because one of the Grecian captaines had struck him with his open hand, a man of a sharpe wit, and one that could perfectly speake the Greeke, Turkish, and Italian tongues, as appeared to his great credit amongst the enemies, beeing had of them in great regard D although he was not knowne whilest he dwelt in the citie, that he was any such man. After that came also Solymans enterpreter, for he himselfe could speak no other language more than his owne, accounting it a great disgrace, and against the Othoman empire to vse any other language. The embassadors admitted vnto Solymans presence, told him, That they were sent to know, for what cause he had sent to require parly? Who in a flaming heat, as if he had known nothing thereof, said there was no such matter: and commanding them presently to void his campe, sent them away with letters to the Great Master and the citizens, to this effect.

Parley offered by the Turks to the Rhodians.

Secret parley refused.

Solymans letter sent to the great master and the Rhodians, by their embassadours.

E If I had not compassion of humane infirmitie, which oftentimes tumbleth headlong mens ambitious and hautie minds, into most dangerous and vnnecessarie mischiefs, truly I would not haue directed vnto you these letters at this time; but as you haue well deserued, persecute you with death and most miserable seruitude: which how easie a thing were it for me to doe, you your selues know. But hauing now sufficiently tried my force, if you be wise make proofe of my clemencie. You haue already satisfied your owne furie, your owne mad humour: and now aduise your selues, lay your hand vpon your heart, and without delay yeeld your selues as I command; your liues I giue, I giue you your wealth, and more than that, your choice to tarrie there still, or to depart: Refuse not the grace frankly offered, which was of you to haue bin most heartily desired. It shall not alwaies be lawful for you (as at this present) to make choice of both. From our campe.

F Vpon the returne of the embassadors, the poore of all sorts flockt together to the Great Master his house not far from the breach: where after the multitude of the common people was dismissed, and the chiefe of the burgers sent for, the imperious letter of the Turkish tyrant was openly read before the knights of the Order, and the better sort of the citizens. Whereunto the Great Master accounting it both honor enough, and sufficient tearme of life honorably to die, answered in this sort.

The great Master at the instance of his people condeth vnto dishonours to Solyman.

The Great Master his opinion concerning that Solyman demanded by his letters.

You heard (sacred fellowes in armes, and valiant citizens of the Rhodes) these imperious and sorrow- G full letters: whereunto how we are to answer, requireth no great deliberation: we must as resolute men either yeeld or die, all hope of the victorie is gone, except forraine aid come. Wherefore if you will follow my counsell, let vs with weapons in our hands, vntill the last gaspe and the spending of the last drop of our bloud, like valiant men defend our faith and nobilitie receiued from our ancestours, and the honour which we haue so long time gotten both at home and abroad: and let it neuer be said, that our honour died but with our selues.

This speech of the great Master seemed vnto many, heauier than the imperious commandement of the Turkish tyrant: and a great while men stood silent, heauily looking one vpon another, many with changing of their countenance and outward gesture, more than by words expressing what they thought in heart. At length a certaine Greeke priest, with great compas- H sion of mind (as it seemed) and teares trickling down his cheeks, brake forth into these words:

A notable speech of a Greeke priest, perswading the Great Master to yeeld.

And I would also hold my peace, if I were a priuat man; and not first of all in so great and troubled assemblie, broach mine owne opinion. But forasmuch as the regard of our common preseruation, calwring a word out of no mans mouth; and all men know, that now is the time to speake and say what euery man thinketh best, which shall neither alwayes nor long bee graunted vnto vs; I will not let it now ouerpasse and slip away: Wherefore let vs suppose, that no commaund of a most mightie prince besieging vs, were come vnto vs, but that I were reasoning as a priuate man with his neighbour, or one friend with another by the fire side, or in our cups without care, without any great affection to either par-tie, as men indifferent, not liking or hating (as men oftentimes do of princes affairs which concerne them I nothing) and then (as I hope) my speech shall be vnto you neither vnpleasant nor vnprofitable. We Greekes and Latines, with ioyned armes, haue now these six moneths withstood our deadly enemies, not onely abroad before our wals, but also in the very bowels of our citie, without any forreine helpe: which as wee haue of long time all vainely looked for, so are we now euery one of vs out of hope thereof. And yet our enemie either moued with the secret goodnesse of God, or else ignorant of our strength and forces, spent with wounds, slaughter, sicknesse, and perpetuall labour, doth voluntarly offer that vnto vs, which was of vs to be most of all desired and earnestly sued for. Your publicke and priuate treasures the bodies of your selues, your wiues and children hee keepeth vnviolated; he taketh from vs onely the citie, which he hath for most part alreadie beaten downe and taken. Worthie Great Master, and you most valiant knights, I haue knowne prowesse and valour in many battels at sea, but K especially in this siege; whereof seeing there is no more vse in this our desperate estate, I doe appeale vnto your wisedom and discretion. Since all is now the conquerours, in that he leaueth vnto vs our liues and goods, that is to be accounted gaines, and the yeelding vp of the citie and Island no losse, which the victorious enemie alreadie commandeth: which although it be a heauie matter and grieuous vnto the nobilitie, yet your fortune perswadeth you thereunto. Wherefore if you be to be mooued with any compassion, I account it better to yeeld, than to bee slaine our selues, or to see your wiues and children by law of armes to be led away before your faces into miserable captiuity and seruitude. If any Christian compassion remaine in your warlike mindes, I beseech you seeke not the vtter destruction of this innocent people, who (I may with modestie say) hath not euill deserued of you, whom Christ Iesus, whom the enemie himselfe would haue preserued. That I say this which I speake vnto you for Christian charitie, and for no other cause, let this be a sufficient testimonie, That so long as you were able to resist by your owne power, L or hoped for aid from forreine princes, I neuer spake word, or once thought of yeelding: but now seeing the fatall ruine of all things about vs, our common estate brought vnto the vttermost extremitie, our deadly enemie in the heart of our citie, no hope, and that the warre cannot longer bee protracted; I wish you to yeeld, and for my part had rather make choice of peace than war, and to proue the enemies fauour, than his furie.

Most of them there present, were of the same mind with the priest. But as nothing can bee so reasonably spoken as to content al men, so this speech was not of them al liked: some there were (though not many) which considering the harmes they had done vnto the Turkes, and M doubting with what safetie they might yeeld themselues into the power of that faithlesse people, had rather to haue fought it out to the last man, and so to haue left vnto them a bloudie victorie. Amongst these, one bold spoken fellow step forth, and in presence of them all dissuaded the yeelding vp of the citie, in this sort:

I haue

A most resolute speech of a common soldier, dissuading the yeelding up of the Rhodes.

A I haue not beene with any thing more vnacquainted, than to deliuer my opinion before princes, or in such great and publicke assemblies; being alwaies more desirous modestly to heare other mens opinions, than impudently to thrust foorth mine owne. But now, seeing extreame necessitie will not longer suffer me to keepe my wonted course of silence, I will frankly speake my mind, and tell you what in my opinion is to be answered vnto the heauie message and imperious commaund of the most perfidious tyrant.
This cruell enemie hath ouerthrowne our wall, and is entred three hundred foot and more within our citie, and as a most troublesome guest liueth and conuerseth with vs as it were vnder the same roofe.
Such as list not longer to indure such an vnwelcome guest and troublesome neighbour, perswade you because he is troublesome, to giue him all: but (worthie and sacred knights) I am of farre different opinion; neither doe I thinke a possession of two hundred and fourteene yeares is so lightly to bee deliuered vp, and the ground forsaken: but rather that this troublesome intruder is in like manner to B be himselfe troubled, and with deadly skirmishes continually vexed: whom after wee had by force of armes and vndaunted courage maugre his head, held out fiue moneths, at length he brake into our city, not by any valour in himselfe but holpen by time, which tameth all things: and since his first entrance is is now almost fortie daies in which time for all his hast, hee hath scarcely got forward a hundred and thirtie paces, hindered by the blockes we haue laied in his way, and will not cease continually to lay, if we be wise men and mindfull of our former valour. Destroy me you heauenly powers, before I see with these eies these sacred knights to yeeld vp this famous citie of the Rhodes; the antient bulwarke of Christian religion, vnto our mercilesse enemies, polluted with the infamous superstition of Mahomet: who be- sides the insatiable thirst they haue of our bloud, how faithlesse and mischieuous they are by nature, if we know not, we need not make example of our selues, but we may take example by the calamitie of Con-C stantinople, the late miserie of Eubœa, and that which later was, of Methone, as also by the Mamalukes at Caire, miserably slaine contrary to the league, contrarie to the faith and promise by the Turkish Em-perour himselfe before giuen. What, doe you not remember how the death of the most noble captaines at Belgrade was of late procured by the fashood, craft, and deceit of the same faithlesse miscreants? Let vs then, being men of wit and vnderstanding, trust these mad beasts, let vs giue our selues into their power, which haue no regard of right or reason, of religion, or any thing else: whose couetousnesse and cruelties it is hard to say which is greater; which for these many yeres haue plotted and laboured nothing more, than how by policie or force they may vtterly root out the very name of the Rhodians, which they so deadly hate. They keep vs shut vp and besieged now the sixt moneth feeling together with vs extream D dangers and endlesse labour, slaine by heapes before our wals and fortresses, and cannot be remoued hence with thunder, leightening, stormes, tempests, and all the calamities of Winter, a time which giueth intermission of all warre, both by sea and land; so desirous they are of reuenge, and greedie of our bloud: and that not altogether without cause, for we haue also shed theirs, and gladly would still so do, if it lay in our power. But seeing it seemeth good vnto God otherwise, and that we are surprised with inuitable neces-sitie, yet let vs whilest we are at libertie, and haue power our selues, by honorable death amongst the Christian ensignes, eschew the torments and reproches which our cruell enemies hope to inflict vpon vs: so shall we enioy eternall fame and glorie, prepared both in heauen and earth for such as honourably die in defence of their prince and country: which honour it becommeth not them to enuie vnto thy most noble name and vertue, worthie Grand Master, which hauing for many yeares enioyed the commoditie and profit of peace, and greatly enriched by bountie of this sacred militarie Order, refuse now to beare this last E burden of warre.

At these words an antient Greeke, for his wisedome and discretion of great reputation both with the Greekes and Latines, perceiuing his countreymen wrongfully touched, and the desperat holding out of the citie vainly perswaded, tooke hold, and interrupting this yong gallant; in answer of that he had said, spake as followeth:

The former speech notably answered by a Greeke, and the yeelding of the citie vrged.

That griefe of minde and desperation can make men rather eloquent than wise, as you haue many times heard before this, so you might this day perceiue also, most valiant gentlemen: for aduised mode-M stie neuer falleth into obloquie, neither confoundeth falshood with truth; it desireth not the slaughter
F of the citizens, it perswadeth not furie nor exhorteth men to madnesse: but it is by nature so engraffed in many, that when they cannot by their owne wisedome and policie deliuer themselues from their troubles, they yet seeke to draw others into the fellowship of the same danger: so greedie haue malice and miserie alwaies been of companie. But if you (worthie Commaunder) will giue me also leaue to speake,

a man amongst his countrymen not of meaneſt place and authoritie, which thing both the preſent calamitie and vrgent neceſſitie might of you eaſily obtaine, I would alledge ſuch reaſons, and lay downe ſuch matter, as ſhould not only refell the copious and glorious words of this ſharpe witted Orator, ſcrapt together of purpoſe to flouriſh out the matter, but alſo ſuch as might ſtirre your mind to that which is honeſt, profitable, and neceſſarie; expulſing hatred, feare, trouble, or deſpaire. This Gentleman, whom we all know, not onely to bee a vehement Orator, but ſometime a man moſt terrible, whereas for all his great words he is by nature mild, and ſo mild, that he neuer had the heart to kill, nay not ſo much as lightly to wound any one of them whom he calleth barbarous, mad, cruell, whoſe perfidious dealing he deteſteth, whoſe crueltie he accurſeth, whoſe manner of liuing he exclaimeth againſt, as altogether without law, without reaſon, without order, without regard: and now in time of truce, and whileſt the ſhowers of arrowes, yron bullets, fire and ſtones doth ceaſe, creeping out of his caue, maketh much adoe, and keepeth a great ſtirre; and not knowing in what danger he is, doth now with glorious words call vpon death, whereof he hath hitherto ſhewed himſelfe too much affraid, and all forſooth (as hee ſaid) leſt hee ſhould be enforced to endure the mocking and ſcorning of the enemie. But this is meere pride, not Chriſtian fortitude or humilitie. But our enemie neither threateneth nor purpoſeth any ſuch matter, nothing ſo perfidious or cruell as he would make him, rubbing vp the ſlaughter at Caire, Eubœa, Methone, and Conſtantinople, cities taken either by force or warlike policie, and not yeelded by compoſition, vpon faith giuen betwixt the beſieger and the beſieged: who becauſe he would ſpare vs, will not ſuffer vs to doe that whereby we ſhould vndoubtedly periſh. But whereof proceedeth this new found clemencie? This vnwonted fauor toward the people of the Rhodes? I am not of the tyrants priuie counſel, neither euer curiouſly ſought after the reaſon of another mans bountie, but am glad to receiue it when I need it. Yet for all that, I will not diſſemble what I thinke in a matter ſo doubtfull: he is willing (as I ſuppoſe) in this ſiege and conqueſt of the Rhodes, to ſhew vnto other nations whom he purpoſed to inuade, both his power and his patience: leſt alwaies ſatisfying his cruell nature, he ſhould make deſolation in places he would raigne ouer, and ſo for euer alienating the minds of men, be inforced to fight with all men with fire and ſword: by which rigour he hath not ſo much hurt his enemie as himſelfe. For this cauſe (as I ſuppoſe he leaueth vnto vs life and goods, leſt whileſt hee in going about to take them from vs by force, and we ſeeking to keepe them by deſperatneſſe, we ſhould both fall into great deſtruction, no leſſe lamentable vnto the conqueror than to the vanquiſhed. Beſides that, if he ſhould kill all here, truly he might then enter the breaches of the citie on the bodies of the dead, no men now leſt aliue to reſiſt him. But Lerus is ſhut vp, Arangia is ſtrongly fortified, Lyndus is by ſcituation impregnable: heere he knoweth are weapons, armour, and men; here he muſt begin a new warre, except he will haue the remainder of your warre, the fatall plague of his empire, to prey ſtill vpon his ſubiects: all which ſtrong places he ſhall haue without ſlaughter, without bloudſhed (as reaſon is) if he ſhould let you and vs poore wretches depart in ſafety with a little traſh. Except theſe worldy conſiderations haue moued him to mercy and compaſſion: then out of doubt it is wrought by diuine power and the ſecret fauour of God towards vs, and of our Sauiour Chriſt Ieſus crucified. Whereunto if you be men well aduiſed, if religious, if mindfull of the dutie of Chriſtians, it becommeth not you to oppoſe any obſtacle, and with the ruine of your ſelues to deſtroy this miſerable people, which for this halfe yeares ſiege, hath ſcarcely had ſo much reſt as might ſuffice the neceſſitie of nature, ſtanding for you in battell, enduring both wounds and death for your honour and victorie: by whoſe faithfull labour and diligence you haue bin alwaies holpen both at home and abroad; whether you inuaded the Turke by land in Mytilene, Naupactus, Methone, Patras, or other parts of Peloponeſus; or els by ſea thruſt him out of the poſſeſſion of the Ionian or Ægeum: whereby it may appeare euen vnto a blind man, how iniurious it is, and farre from truth, to obiect vnto vs, That inioying the fruits of peace, we refuſe the charges of warres; nay we neuer refuſed warres. But now it is come to that point, that if we would neuer ſo faine make warres, we are not able ſo to doe, the flower of our youth being ſlaine: and the ſmall remainder that is left, not onely weakened in bodie with wounds, ſickneſſe, watching, and reſtleſſe labour; but alſo in mind diſcouraged, whileſt all things fall out proſperouſly to our enemies, and to vs aduerſe: the greateſt and beſt part of our great artillerie beeing broken with continuall vſe, which if it were whole, we could haue thereof ſmal vſe or profit, for want of pouder, which not only this city now wanteth, but alſo your ſtrong holds, Lerus, Lyndus, Halicarnaſus, Arangia. I was neuer deſirous or curious to look into other mens doings, much leſſe into your maner of war: but yet (Great Maſter) you cannot deny, but it is ſo; who haue cauſed ſoldiers to be brought from thence hither openly, and gunpouder ſecretly: by which policie you haue withſtood your fortein enemy theſe ſix months, & deceiued the trechery of one or two domeſtical traitors. But I gladly admit we haue al theſe things, things, I ſtand not vpon the truth, I ſay not what moſt men ſay, but I ſpeake to pleaſe a few: and ſuppoſe we wanted neither armour nor courage, I would then aske you this, whether they would aduiſe you to vſe them to your defence, or to your deſtruction? For vnto both it cannot be, no more than at once to bee a freeman and a ſlaue. To vſe them to your deſtruction, that were madneſſe and ſenceleſſe pride, hatefull to God and man; you ſhould therefore vſe them to defence: but how ſhall we defend a citie (I doe not ſay, as the truth is) alreadie loſt and poſſeſſed by the enemie, wherein he raigneth, raungeth, and turneth all vpſide down? but hauing the wals battered downe, a great breach in the Spaniſh ſtation, and another not like, but euen now as good as made in the Italian ſtation, how ſhall we be able to keepe this vnfortunate towne, battered and rent at the French, Engliſh, and Anergne ſtations, and the tower of S. Nicholas? Which if it were not ſo battered and bared of al warlike prouiſion, but ſound and thorowly furniſhed with munition and victuall, yet neceſſitie enforcing, and reaſon perſuading, you ought to forſake it, forſomuch as all power of further reſiſtance is taken from you. Doe you not ſee how eaſily and almoſt without any trouble the enemie (by meanes of the caſtle he hath new built vpon the mount Philermo, not paſt two miles diſtant) can take from you all manner of prouiſion both by ſea and land, and reſtraine you from going out or in? Truely notable gentlemen, honourable for your martiall proweſſe, you ſee and haue long agoe foreſeene theſe things better than I, altogether ignorant in martiall affaires, altogether buſied in the trade of merchandiſe, and caring for my family: yet ſuffer me to ſay the truth. All the powers whereby this kingdome ſtood, are departed and gone; againſt the force of our enemies no policie of force remaineth; and to expect armies of angels or ſouldiers from heauen, and other ſuch like miracles, is in my iudgement more and more ■ prouoke God to anger, although in his anger he bee vnto vs mercifull. Wherefore being deſtitute of all worldly helpe, let vs as we may, prouide for our ſafetie. I beſeech thee (worthie Great Maſter) by theſe my aged teares, by the naturall pietie ingrafted in thy noble nature, expoſe not this miſerable citie to the ſpoile of the enemie, our old and middle aged men to the ſword, our wiues and daughters to be raviſhed, our boyes and youths to the vnnaturall filthineſſe of our barbarous enemies, and to be corrupted with the mad and groſſe opinion of the vngodly Mahometane ſuperſtition. I would (noble knights) you had ſeene with what teares, with what mourning our heauie families and children crying about their mothers, ſent vs hither, and what praiers they made for vs at our departing: I would you knew with what minde and how great hope they expect their ſafetie from your clemencie and aduiſed reſolution.

This ſpeech of the aged Greek might haue moued a heart of flint: but the Great Maſter; who in his countenance ſhewed a greater courage than his preſent ſtate required, commanding euery man to his charge: after the matter had bin thus moſt part of the night diſcourſed, gaue then no other anſwer, but, That he would be carefull of all their well doing. The next morning he ſent for Preianes, Martiningus, & a few other of the greateſt iudgement & experience; by whom he was fully reſolued, that the citie in ſo many places by the enemie laid open and ſhaken, was not poſſibly to be long defended: whereupon he cauſed a common counſell to be called of all the knights of the Order together with the burgeſſes of the citie: where after long debating, whether they ſhould fight it out to the laſt man, or yeeld vpon ſuch conditions as was to be obtained? it was by generall conſent concluded, that the city ſhould be yeelded, and thereupon a decree made which was by the Great Maſter pronounced. Whileſt theſe things were thus in doing, a truce was taken with the enemy for foure daies, but full of feare & danger. During which time, diuers of the Turks preſuming vpon the truce, came by great companies to behold the wals & rampiers of the citie: wherwith Fornouius the Frenchman (of whom mention is before made) being ſore moued, in his choler without further command diſcharged a tire of great ordnance among the thickſt of them, contrary to the truce taken. At which time alſo the Rhodians receiued into the citie ſecretly by night a ſhip loaded with wines out of Crete, & in her Alphonſus a Spaniard, chiefe pilot of the Rhodian gallies, & with him 100 voluntary ſouldiers all Latines, all which went out of Crete without the knowledge of the Venetian Senat: for at that time the Venetians were in league with Solyman. The Turks iuſtly offended with the breach of the truce, and the taking in of new ſupplies, which they ſuppoſed to haue bin far greater than in truth they were; without command of any captain or enſigne diſplaid, in great numbers thruſt in thorow the ruines of the breaches into the city as farre as the rampiers and baricadoes new made, and furiouſly aſſailed the defendants: In which conflict many were ſlaine and wounded on both ſides. But after the Turkes had to their coſt againe made proofe of the courage of their enemies, as without commandement they began that skirmiſh, ſo of themſelues they brake it off and retired. After the truce was thus broken, the captaine of the Turkes fencers, a bloudie cruell fellow, hauing taken three Chriſtians priſoners, cut off their hands, eares, and noſes, and ſent them ſo diſmembred into the citie with letters to the Great Maſter, charging him with the vniuſt breach of the truce, barbarouſly threatning within three or foure dales to make like example of him to all poſteritie. Amongſt others none was more troubled with this ſudden and vnexpected breach of the truce, than Robertus Peruſinus, Raymundus Marchet, and Raymundus Lupus, three knights of the Order, men of ſingular wiſedome and grauitie, embaſſadours at that time in the Turkes campe: whom the barbarous people in their furie had vndoubtedly ſlaine or put to torture, if they had not feared the like meaſure to haue bin ſhewed to their hoſtages in the citie. But after that Nicholaus Vergotus, and Georgius Sandritteus, two of the Burgeſſes of the citie, were come into the campe with articles containing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians were contented to deliuer vp the citie, all their furie and rage was quickly appeaſed. Solyman for his greater maieſtie and the more terror of theſe meſſengers, beſet round about with his great armie, & guarded about with his Ianizaries in their richeſt attire & gliſtering armor, gaue them audience: who admitted to his preſence, with great humilitie offered vnto him in writing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians would yeeld vp vnto him the citie. The chiefe points whereof were, That the Churches ſhould remaine vnto the Chriſtians inuiolated: That no children ſhould be taken from their parents: That no Chriſtian ſhould be inforced to forſake his religion and turne Turke: That ſuch Chriſtians as would tarrie ſtill in the citie, might ſo do at libertie, without paying any tribute for the ſpace of fiue yeares: That all they which would depart might go with bag & bagage, furniſhed with conuenient ſhipping and prouiſion as farre as Crete, & to carrie with them ſo much great ordnance as they pleaſed; and that the Chriſtians ſhould appoint a reaſonable day for the time of their departure. Al which articles Solyman condeſcended vnto and ſolemnly ſwore faithfully to performe the ſame. But how they were indeed performed the writers of that age do much vary: it ſhould ſeem they were neither altogether kept, nor broken, but ſo performed as pleaſed the conqueror: certaine it is, that many great outrages wete through militarie inſolencie committed by the proud Turkes vpon the poore Chriſtians, contrary to the mind of Solyman. Iacobus Fontanus a Ciuilian, and at that time one of the judges of the city (out of whoſe writings this hiſtorie is for moſt part collected) reporteth, That the Turks not expecting the departure of the Chriſtians, brake into the citie vpon Chriſtenmas day, by the gate called Coſquinium, polluted the Temples, ſhamefully abuſed the Chriſtians, & made hauock of all things: and that he himſelfe, falling into their hands, after he had with ſuch mony as he had, redeemed himſelfe, hauing not ſufficient to content all their greedy deſires, was by them hardly intreated & grieuouſly beaten. The Great Maſter by the counſell of Achimetes, putting on ſuch ſimple attire as beſt beſeemed a vanquiſhed man that was to humble himſelfe before the conquetor, went out of the citie into the camp, attended vpon with a few knights of the Order: where after he had waited in the raine moſt part of the day, before Solymans tent, at laſt he had a rich gowne caſt vpon him, & ſo brought into the proud tyrants preſence. Where after thew had a while at the firſt, with piercing eies one earneſtly beholden the other; the Great Maſter humbling himſelfe before him, was in token of grace admitted to kiſſe his hand, and welcomed by Solyman in this ſort.

A barbarous fact

Solyman his ſpeech vnto the Great Maſter.

Although (ſaid he) I might worthily and iuſtly infringe the articles I haue preſcribed concerning the yeelding of the Citie, with thy moſt wicked croſſed compiers, the people of the Rhodes, and thee eſpecially ſuch a capitall enemie, from whoſe deſerued puniſhment, neither faith nor oath ought to ſtay a moſt iuſt conquerour: yet I haue determined to bee not onely gratious and mercifull vnto thee ſo great an offender, deſeruing exemplarie puniſhment, but alſo liberall and bountifull: who if thou wilt by weldoing amend the grieuous tranſgreſſions of thy former life, I promiſe vnto thee moſt honourable entertainement, great preferment, and the higheſt places in my Empire, in my armie in time of warre, and in counſell in time of peace. Not to refuſe this mine offer, both thy preſent eſtate perſuadeth thee, and the Chriſtians (whoſe quarrell thou tookeſt vpon thee to defend againſt me, with better beginning than ſucceſſe) deſerue at thy hands no better: for what ſhould let thee forſaken of all thy friends, a man as it were betraied and vanquiſhed, to caſt thy ſelfe into the perpetuall faith and

and protection of a moſt mightie and mercifull conquerour, of himſelfe offering thee this vndeſerued grace and fauour.

Whereunto the Great Maſter preſently anſwered:

The reſolute anſwere of the Great Maſter to Solyman.

Moſt Mightie and gracious Emperour, your offered fauours before your other worthie captaines, I deſerue not; neither is my preſent eſtate and deſert towards you ſuch, as that I dare or ought to refell the ſame: yet I will ſpeake freely in the middeſt of your victorious armie, a man vanquiſhed in preſence of the conquerour, whoſe great mercie I neuer deſpaired of, and whoſe faith I neuer doubted: I had rather now I haue loſt my ſoueraigntie, forthwith to loſe my priuat and vnfortunate life; or elſe for euer hereafter to liue in obſcurity, than of my people to be accounted a fugitiue rather than a vanquiſhed man: For, to be vanquiſhed is but chance of warre, and of ſo great a conquerour no ſhame to him that is conquered: but afterwards to forſake his owne people and to turne to the enemie, I account it ſhamefull cowardiſe and treacherie.

Solyman commeth into the citie vnto the Great Maſter.

Solyman maruelling at the courage and maieſtie of the hoarie old prince, in his ſo great extremitie, diſmiſſed him, and ſent him again into the citie, guarded with his owne guard, vntill he was come into his pallace: and vnto euery one of the knights attending vpon the Great Maſter, was giuen a rich garment, in token of Solymans fauor. Within a few daies after Solyman comming into the citie, went to viſit the Great Maſter alſo: whom he found buſie in packing vp his things againſt his departure. Here when the Great Maſter falling downe vpon his knees would haue worſhipped him, he would in no caſe ſuffer him ſo to do: but with his hand putting aſide his vaile of maieſtie (which manner of reuerence the Turkiſh Emperors giue only to God, and their Great Prophet Mahomet) tooke him vp and ſaluted him by the name of Father. To whom the Great Maſter for his wiſedome and diſcretion now to him no leſſe admirable, than he was before in time of war for his valour and courage, ſpake in this ſort:

The ſpeech of the Great Maſter to Solyman.

If my fortune and ſucceſſe had beene anſwerable to my heart and courage, I ſhould heere be in this citie, rather as a victorious conquerour than a man conquered. But ſithence the fatall Deſtinies would needs ouerthrow the Rhodian eſtate, I am glad that you are the man before all other by fortune aſſigned, of whom I ſhall receiue both force and grace. And vnto you, amongſt many other your rare and worthie praiſes, this ſhall not be the leaſt, That you vanquiſhed the Rhodes and ſhewed mercie. By this meanes you haue ioyned vnto your dreadfull power, the fame of clemencie and courteſie: an honour not of the higheſt to be deſpiſed, by which alone wee come neereſt vnto God. Wherefore I doubt not but you will keepe the conuentions of the late peace inuiolate, which your owne clemencie perſuaded you to grant, and neceſſitie inforced vs to take. I ſhall now bee an eternall example of the Turkiſh Emperours clemencie and vertue, more than if I had by and by at the firſt yeelded my ſelfe: Obſtinate wilfulneſſe hath made thy glorie and mercie now famous thorow the whole World, and vnto the Worlds end.

Whereunto Solyman by his interpreter, anſwered:

The notable anſwere of Solyman to the great Maſter.

It is to me a great pleaſure, that God at length hath put into thy mind to make choice of peace before warre, which I would thou couldeſt haue liked of from the beginning: then truely thou ſhouldeſt at this time haue receiued of my great and mightie Maieſtie, more good than thou haſt indured harme. Which that I haue done vnto thee, not for any hatred, but onely for deſire of Soueraigntie, thou mayſt gather by this, That I ſuffer thee and thine to depart hence at libertie, with all your wealth and ſubſtance: for I make not warre, thereby to heape vp wealth and riches; but for honour, fame, immortalitie, and enlarging of mine Empire. For it is the propertie of a king royally deſcended, by ſtrong hand to take from others, and to inuade others; not vpon a greedie and couetous mind, but for the honourable deſire of rule and ſoueraigntie: which whileſt my neighbour withſtandeth, I count it enough by force of armes to remoue him.

But the tyrant (as many ſuppoſed) ſpake all this by way of diſſimulation, hauing as it was commonly bruted, giuen order for the rigging vp of a great ſhip, & certain gallies, for the ſudden den transporting of the Great Master and the knights of the Order to Constantinople, which report seemeth to haue bin but feigned either of malice, or else by such as least knew Solymans mind: for if he had so purposed, who should haue let him, hauing them al in his power. Iouius in his little treatise Rerum Turcicarum dedicated to Charles the fifth, reporteth that hee himselfe heard Lilladamus the Great Master say, That when Solyman entered into the Rhodes attended vpon with thirtie thousand men, there was not any man heard to speake a word, but that the souldiers went as if they had bin obseruant Friers: and that when hee came to aske leaue of Solyman that hee might depart, he was so courteously vsed of him, that turning himselfe to Abram the Bassa, whom hee aboue all men loued, said, Truely I cannot but grieue to see this vnfortunat old man, driuen out of his owne dwelling, to depart hence so heauily.

The Great Master embarking himselfe with his knights and such other as were willing to depart, in vessels and gallies prepared for that purpose, departed out of the Island on Newyeares day at night: and after long and dangerous trauell by sea in that Winter weather, landed at last at Messana in Sicilia, from whence he afterwards sailed into Italie, and so trauelled to Rome where he was honorably receiued by Adrian the sixt of that name then Bishop there, a Hollander borne, sometime schoolemaster to Charles the fift, and his Vicegerent in Spain; who if he had bin as forward in the short time of his Papacie to haue relieued the Rhodes, as hee was to maintaine Charles his quarrell against the French king, it is not vnlike but that famous citie had been relieued, and the Island in possession of the Christians at this day. Thus Solyman, whilest the Christian princes were at discord amongst themselues, to his great glory and no lesse griefe of all good Christians, entered the Rhodes the 25 day of December, a day dedicated vnto the natiuitie of our Sauiour Christ, in the yeare 1522, after it had bin by the Knights of the Order valiantly kept and defended against the Infidels by the space of 214 yeares, since the time they by force tooke it from the Infidels in the yeare 1308: and now being so long holden as was possible, against all the power of the Turks, was yeelded vp when it had bin six moneths besieged. At this siege Solymon lost a great part of his army, for besides them that were slaine at the assaults, which were many, thirtie thousand died of the flix.

Solyman entreth into the Rhodes on christenmas day, in the yere 1522.

Solyman sendes Ferhates Bassa against Alis-beg the mountaine prince.

Whilest Solyman thus lay at the siege of the Rhodes, Ferhates Bassa Gouernor of the Marches of the Turkish empire, alongst the riuer of Euphrates, by the commandement of Solyman went with a great army against Alis-Beg, whom the Turks called Schach, Suar-Ogli, that is to say, king Suar his son: which P. Iouius corrupting, calleth him by the name of Saxonar-Oglis. This Alis after he had betraied his vncle Aladeules the mountaine king, vnto Sinan Bassa, was by Selymus left chiefe Gouernor of that large and wild country alongst the borders of Armenia and Capadocia, wanting nothing of the honour of a king but the name onely, as is before declared in the life of Selymus. Solyman jealous of his honour, and fearing lest hee should take vpon him the absolute gouernment of that countrey (which indeed of right belonged vnto him, the children of Aladeules the late king, being now all dead) and so to make himselfe king; especially if he should ioine in friendship with the Persian king: after the manner of ambitious men, purposed by any meanes to haue him taken out of the way: and had therefore sent Ferhates to ease him of that care. The Bassa without making any shew of hostilitie, marching with his army along the confines of his countrey, as if it had beene but to looke to his charge, when he was come as neere as he could to Alis, without mistruft, thought good to assay if he could by policie bring that to passe which he was otherwise with great danger to attempt by force. Wherfore fayning himselfe to be extream sicke, he sent embassadors to Alis, requesting him as a friend to vouchsafe to come vnto him being at the point of death, vnto whom he had many things of importance from the great Emperour to impart, and would if he should die, leaue with him all his charge vntill Solyman should otherwise dispose thereof.

Alis and his foure sonnes treacherously slaine.

Alis, who from his youth had alwaies honoured the Turkish Emperors and faithfully serued them, mistrusting no harme came to the Bassa, accompanied with his foure sonnes, whom the faithlesse Bassa without regard of infamie; caused presently to be put to death with their father: and so reducing all that country into the manner of a prouince, vnder Solymans obeisance, came to him with twentie thousand men, about the time that the citie of the Rhodes was yeelded vp. This is the faithlesse dealing of the Turks, not with the Christians onely, but with them of their owne superstition also: vsing it as no small policie, vtterly to extinguish the nobilitie of all countries subiect to their seruile tyrannie.

Solyman after he had thus subdued the Rhodes, and disposed of the Island as he liked best, returning to Constantinople, brake vp his armie, and for the space of three yeares after followed his pleasure, not doing any thing worthy of remembrance. During which time and many yeres after, the rich and flourishing country of Italie, sometime mistresse of the world, was miserably afflicted and rent in pieces by Charles the fift (then Emperor) and Francis the French king, the one enuying vnto the other the glorie of the Empire: and he not content therwith, seeking with immoderat ambition to make himselfe lord of all Italie: most of the other Christian princes and states being at the same time either by the one or by the other, drawne into the fellowship of that war, to the great trouble and sore weakning of the Christian commonweale. Whereupon Solyman waiting all occasions that might serue for the inlarging of his empire, and annoying of the Christians, thought it now a fit time for him to set his foot into Hungarie, whereinto he had alreadie laied open a way by the taking of Belgrade. He knew right well that Lewes then king of Hungarie was but yong, altogether vnacquainted with the wars, commanding ouer his headstrong subiects (especially his rich prelates and nobility) no otherwise than pleased themselues, being himselfe rather by them altogether ouerruled: besides that, he was in good hope, that the other Christian princes neere vnto him, either carried away with regard of their owne estate, would not, or els before vnto himselfe by league fast bound, could not affoord vnto him any great aid or succour: the Germanes hee knew would make small haste vnto such wars as should yeeld them much danger, and but small pay. As for the princes of the house of Austria, Charles the Emperor, and Ferdinand his brother, although they were ioyned vnto the young king with the neerest bonds of alliance (Lewis hauing married Mary their yongest sister, and Ferdinand, Anne, king Lewis his sister) yet was there as he thought small helpe to be expected from them; Charles hauing his hands full in Italie, and Ferdinand altogether careful of himselfe: and that Sigismund king of Polonia would for the yong kings sake breake the antient league he had with the Turkish Emperors, he could hardly be perswaded: as for other Christian princes farther off, he stood not in any great doubt. Thus hauing with himselfe singled out this young prince the Hungarian king, whom he had in his greedie mind already deuoured, he set forward from Constantinople, and was come on his way as far as Sophia in Seruia with a mightie armie of two hundred thousand men before that the Hungarians had any knowledge of his comming (so blind and senceless was that state, which now sleeping in securitie, had long before lost those eies which euer watcht, and neuer spared cost or paines to keep the same in safety) in stead of whom were others come in place, sharpe of sight, and too too prouident for that concerned their owne aduancement; but blind as beetles in foreseeing this great and common danger (wherwith they were shortly after all quite ouerwhelmed) vntill it was now brought home vnto their own dores. The yong king of himselfe but weake, by reason of his youthfull yeres, and nothing strengthned by them for whom he had most done, and should haue bin his greatest stay; was wonderfully dismaied with the fame of the approch of so mightie an enemie: yet the better to withstand him, he sent embassadours with all speed vnto the Christian Princes his neighbors, requesting their aid against the common enemy, but all in vaine. In the mean time, after the antient manner of his country he gaue out generall summons for the assembly of his counsell for the warres: whether his great stipendarie prelats (of duty bound to appeare) came with their troupes of euill appointed horsemen, and not halfe full; who also deliuered in lesse summes of money by far, than of right they should haue done, towards the maintenance of the charge of that common warre. And the temporall nobilitie, forgetting the warlike discipline of their famous ancestours, as fresh water soldiers which had seen the Turkish emperor in his strength, & but litle acquainted with some light skirmishes or small inuasions, in their vain brauerie made light account of the Turks; proudly vaunting, That although they were in number but few, yet they would easily ouerthrow the great numbers of them, if euer they came to handie strokes. But aboue al the rest, one Paulus Tomoreus, Archbishop of Colossa, sometimes a Minorit, who had before bin in diuers light skirmishes against the Turks, with great insolencie did so confidently brag and boast of the victorie he vainly dreamed of, that in his sermons vnto the souldiers, and in open talke with the nobilitie (if he could haue done so much as he vaunted of) it should seem that he himselfe had been enough to haue ouerthrowne the Turks whole armie.

Solyman returneth to Constantinople.

Solyman vpon the discord of the Christian princes and disordered state of Hungarie, taketh occasion to inuad that kingdome.

1526

The vanitie of Tomoreus.

But when all the kings army was assembled, and a generall muster taken, there was hardly found found fiue and twentie thousand men in all, horse and foot. So that the foolish hardinesse of Tomoreus, and others so forwards to giue the Turks battel, was of most wise men disliked. The old souldiers and men of great experience said plainly, That it was meere folly and madnesse with such a handfull of men to giue battell vnto the enemie, who would bring eight times so many moe into the field as they were. Wherefore some wished, that the yong king should be withdrawn from the eminent danger: among whom Stephanus Verbetius, a noble captain, of all the rest best acquainted with the Turkish wars, gaue counsel, that the person of the yong king should for the safety of the common state, whatsoeuer should happen, be kept out of danger in the strong castle of Buda. But the vnruly soldiers with open mouth impugned his wholsome counsell, and said plainly, That except the king himselfe did lead them, they would not at all fight. Of which opinion was also the rash prelat Tomoreus, persuading them with all speed to giue the enemie battell, and that the noble yong king vnder the protection of Almighty God should in person himselfe go & giue the signall of battell against his enemies. The king ouer-ruled by this vnlucky counsell, vpon a brauerie without reason set forward with his army, and came to a place called Mohatchz or Mugace, which is a little country village not far from Danubius, almost in the middle between Buda and Belgrade. And now Balybeus with 20000 horsemen (the forerunners of the Turkish army) was at hand, at which time the commanders and captaines of the kings armie, entred into counsell, Whether it were better to incamp their armie within their waggons alongst the riuer of Danubius, and so to expect the comming of Ioannes Sepusius, countie of Cilia, and Vayuod of Transyluania (who was then said to be comming towards the king with his Transyluanian horsemen, of all other fittest to haue incountered the Turkes, or els to march on forward, and presently to giue them battell? But Tomoreus, who now commanded all, knowing that vpon the comming of the Vayuod, hee was to giue place, and himselfe to be commanded (which vnto so proud a man was no small griefe) for the maintenance of his credit and reputation, and to carrie away the glorie of the victorie he so vainely hoped for, could not abide to heare of any delay; but hasting headlong to his owne destruction, did with such vehemencie impugne the wholsome counsell of others, who would haue expected the comming of the Vayuod, that he by his franticke persuasions, drew on the vnaduised yong king into most apparent and manifest danger. For Balybeus diuided his horsemen into foure battels, which by turnes skirmished with the kings armie without intermission, and gaue the Hungarians no leisure to rest either day or night, but continually wheeling about, kept them in so strait, that no man could without great danger go to water his horse at the side of Danubius, which was fast by, or once to stir out of the campe, but were inforced to dig pits for water in places where they lay: with which necessitie Tomoreus was enforced to put the armie in order of battell, and there was now no remedie, but he must of necessitie fight for the honor of his prince and country. His battell was ranged all in length, and his horsmen not altogether (as it was thought) vnfitly placed here and there by troups among his footmen; lest the Turks (being in number eight to one) should with their multitude compasse them round, and so inforce them to fight as it were in a ring: for now was Solyman come also with all his huge armie. The Hungarian tents defended with a small garrison, were left a little from the armie on the right hand, inclosed round about with wagons, one chained to another: neere vnto the which, Tomoreus Generall of this vnluckie battell, had not altogether vndiscreetly placed a troupe of chosen horsemen for defence of the kings person against all vncertain euents of the battel. But this day (vnluckie to the Hungarian name, but vnto the king himselfe most fatal and vnfortunat) ouerthrew that his purpose, deuised too late for the safetie of the kings person: for at the first incounter the Hungarians, although they had receiued no harme by the Turkish artillerie (being mounted too hie, of purpose as it was thought, the gunners being for most part Christians) were easily beaten down and ouerthrowne, oppressed by the multitude of their enemies, especially Tomoreus with the rest of the prelats & nobility being almost all slaine together, & the Hungarian horsmen also either slaine or put to flight. All things going thus to wracke, a companie of Turks assailed the camp, which was hardly defended by the weake garrison. Which thing the troupe of the chosen horsmen appointed for defence of the kings person, beholding, could not be staid, but that they would needs help them which defended the camp. The yong king seeing all his armie discomfited, & himself forsaken of the horsmen which he was in hope should haue guarded him, betook himself to flight.

Wholsome counsel not followed

The battell of Mohatchz

Tomoreus slain.

But

But as he was making shift for himselfe, thinking to haue passed ouer a fennie ditch, his horse in plunging out, fell backwards vpon him into the ditch; where being heauie loaden with armour not able to helpe himselfe, hee was in the middest of the filthie ditch in the mud most miserably drowned. Some few horsemen escaped out of the battell, the rest were either slain or taken prisoners. This woful battell neuer sufficiently to be lamented, as the ground of the miseries of that worthy kingdome, was fought the 29 day of October in the yeare 1526.

King Lewis drowned in a ditch.

Solyman hauing obtained this victorie, marched on directly to Buda, the regall seat of the Hungarian kings, which was deliuered to him with the castle; vpon condition, that he should not violate any man either in person or goods, and at his departure to leaue the same againe vnto the Hungarians: all which things he (according vnto their request) faithfully performed. Being entred into the castle, he wonderfully commended the same, but lodged not therein, because it is by their antient law forbidden the Turkish Emperor to lodge within any walled place which is not his owne. Wherefore he returned and lodged in his campe alongst the riuer of Danubius.

Whilest Solyman lay thus at Buda, seuen bloudie heads of the Bishops and greatest of the nobilitie (slaine in the late battell at Mohatchz) were presented to him, all set in order vpon a wodden step: wherat he smiled, to see his courtiers laying their right hands vpon their brests, and bending their bodies as if they had done them great obeisance, to salute them by name, and in derision to welcome them by the names of valiant Popes. But afterwards, when he had more particularly enquired what euery one of them was, it is reported that he most of all detested Ladislaus Salcanius the great Bishop of Strigonium, for his miserable couetousnesse, that being a man of infinit wealth, refused to spare part therof vnto his soueraigne, requesting the same at his great need. Tomoreus he blamed of inconsiderat rashnesse, for that he being a clergie man, would busie himselfe so far in matters not belonging to his vocation: on the contrary part, he commended Franciscus Perenus Bishop of Veradium, a man honorably descended, for his wise counsell (though it was not followed) for that he had heard it reported, that he as a true prophet foretelling the common slaughter ensuing, had sharply said in the counsell when such time as Tomoreus would needs fight with the Turks, & was not by any means to bee remoued from that his fatall opinion, That he did foresee what that their Frier-like Generall would the next day doe; and that he would with so great an enterprise effect no more, but to make one holiday the more in the Christian kalenders, in remembrance of 30000 Hungarian martyrs, most miserably slaine of the Turkes in an vnequall battell, for defence of the Christian faith and religion (for at that time, they which willingly exposed themselues to death in defence of the Christian faith, were all accounted for martyrs:) Georgius Sepusius and the others, he called rash fooles, that would aduenture with so small strength to incounter so strong an enemy. At such time as the counterfeits of king Lewis and Mary his wife were shewed vnto him, he honorably said, That he was sorrie for the yong king, that it was his euill hap to haue so vnaduised counsellors in a matter of so great importance, as to perswade him against all reason to fight at so great disaduantage: & that he came not into Hungarie to take his kingdome from him, but only to reuenge the wrongs done vnto him by the Hungarians: and that if he had escaped the danger of the battell, he would assuredly haue againe restored vnto him the kingdome of Hungarie, contenting himselfe with some small tribute: and that it should haue bin vnto him honor enough to haue saued the nephew of Sigismund king of Polonia his confederat, so strongly allied with the honorable house of Austria. Al which he commanded to be told to Marie the Queene, who was for feare fled from Buda to Possonium. Which might perhaps all seeme to haue bin either dissemblingly spoken, or falsly reported of the equitie and courtesie of the barbarous king, if he had not shortly afterwards to the ample declaration of his bountie and liberalitie, without any desert, giuen the same kingdom of Hungar to Ioannes Sepusius, not borne of any royall bloud, and then retaining the mind of a very enemie. After that, he took away three goodly images of brasse of antient workemanship, which were placed in the entrance into the kings pallace, by that renowned king Mathias Coruinus the great fauourer of rare qualities and vertues: these images represented the formes of Hercules with his club, of Appollo with his harpe, and Diana with her bow and quiuer: all which hee placed in the tilt-yard at Constantinople, as a trophie of the Hungarian victorie. Howbeit these images were since taken downe by the persuasion of the Mufti, and molten (as contrary to to their superstition) and great ordnance made of them. He carried also away with him three pieces of artillerie of most excellent and curious workmanship; and certain brasen pillars of chamfred worke, which supported the Chapiters of the gates. He taried at Buda about twentie daies: in which time to satisfie the cruell nature and greedie desires of his souldiers, hee sent out diuers troupes of horsemen into the countrie thereabout, by whom all the countrey betwixt Rab and the riuer of Tibyscus was by that sudden and vnexpected incursion so destroied, that it is reported that aboue an hundred and fiftie thousand people of all sorts were either slaine or led away into most miserable captiuitie. All which done, he returned againe by the same way he came, to Constantinople.

Ioannes Sepusius, Vayuod of Transiuania, aspireth to the kingdome of Hungarie.

About the same time Ioannes Sepusius Vayuod of Transyluania, with a great power came now too late into Hungarie to haue aided the king: but glad, as was thought, of his death, as tending to his owne aduancement; forasmuch as he was now (the king beeing dead without issue) a man of greatest account among the nobilitie of Hungarie. Wherefore as one of deep and reaching wit, and in great hope to obtaine the kingdome, hee began cunningly to labour diuers of the noblemen one by one, and instantly to request them, that at the next parliament they would not betray the honour of their countrey, in suffering the royall dignitie of that antient kingdome to be transferred vnto a stranger, of such a nation as happily loued them not: for why, the Hungarians ought well to remember what great calamities they had receiued in former times, in chusing forreine kings and strangers to rule ouer them, and in following their vnfortunat ensignes against the Turks; which thing the wofull miseries of times past might notably prooue: which either Sigismundus of Bohemia, or Ladislaus the first, of Polonia, by their vnfortunat battels, once at Nicopolis, againe at Culumbarium, and last of all at Varna, had brought vnto the Hungarians. But to speake, nay once to remember the harmes receiued by the long cowardise of Ladislaus, or this late rashnesse of his sonne King Lewis, would make any noble minde to blush and be ashamed: vnder whose gouernment all militarie discipline, and the glory of Hungary, might well be thought to be vtterly lost. And he said there remained of the nobilitie of Hungarie, men honourably descended of most antient houses, worthie of the kingdome, which bare noble mindes, and were of sufficient courage, discretion, and power, in this time of common heauinesse to restore the honor of the estate, and worthily to defend the kingdome: amongst whom (said he) I would not be accounted so base minded, or heauie headed (although there bee many which for the honour of their houses and wealth may seeme to goe before me) that I will therefore confesse, that any of them is for valour, prowesse, or fortune, better than my selfe, either for conducting of an army, or gouernment of a kingdome: for I shall be a king of courage and valour sufficient, if by your fauourable good will I shall be thought worthie of your consent and sufferages. The Vayuod taking this course, by his earnest sute and labor had won the good wils of many; and so much the easier, for that Stephanus Bator (a man of greatest nobilitie among the Hungarians) was a little before gone into Bohemia vnto king Ferdinand, who was then greatly busied (by reason of a parliament there summoned) in procuring the fauour of the nobilitie and commons of that Realme, against the time of the parliament, wherein he was in good hope to bee chosen king; as he was in short time after.

At the same time the Hungarians were with great solemnitie celebrating the funerall of their late king; whose dead bodie after the departure of Solyman from Buda, was found whole by the demonstration of one Cotriscus one of the squires of his bodie, who was present when he was drowned; and so was brought out of the fens of Mohatchz to Alba Regalis, where it was with great pompe buried amongst the sepulchres of the other kings of Hungary his predecessours. Which solemne funerall once ended, the generall militarie parliament (by the authoritie and voice whereof the kings of Hungarie were by their antient lawes and customes to be chosen) was called: in the shutting vp whereof, Iohn the Vayuod hauing in that common heauinesse no competitor, nor any of the greatest nobilitie which durst stand against him, was with the great applause and consent of all there present chosen king. To whom forthwith Petrus Perennus came and presented the antient crowne of the kingdome of Hungarie, which was in his keeping, made after an homely fashon of pure gold, with which the lawfull kings of Hungary vsed alwaies to bee solemnly crowned. It is reported, that it was the crowne of Stephanus first King of Hungarie, and was by an antient custome alwayes kept in the Castle of King Lewis buried.

A of Vicegrade. And so Iohn the Vayuod was orderly crowned, and consecrated by the hands of Paulus Bishop of Strigonium, lately chosen in stead of Ladislaus Salcanius, slaine in the battel at Mugace, & by the hands of Stephanus Brodaricus Bishop of Vacia, whom he chose for his Secretarie. And vnto Americus Cibachus he gaue the honour of the Vayuod of Transyluania, being but a little before chosen Bishop of Veradium. In his preferment, he was greatly holpen vnto the kingdome by the nobilitie which followed him out of Transyluania, men of great

B account both in peace and warre: amongst whom descended of the Hungarian bloud, were chiefe, Stephanus Verbetius, Paulus Antandrus, Gregorius Peschenius, Nicholaus Glessa, and Ianus Docia. But whilest this new king is in this sort busied in rewarding his friends, and strengthening himselfe in his kingdome, he was aduertised that Ferdinand his competitor of the Hungarian kingdome was chosen king of Bohemia: who out of the old controuersie betwixt Mathias Coruinus and Fredericus the Emperors great grandfather, alleadged great claime vnto that kingdome, deriued from the time of Ladislaus, who was reported to haue beene poisoned at the time of the solemnization of his marriage, through the ambition and malice of Georgius Pogibracius; who affecting the kingdome of Bohemia, shortly after obtained the same. And now it seemed that the time was come, wherein Ferdinand made greater with the kingdome Ferdinand king of Bohemia layeth claime to the kingdome of Hungarie.

C of Bohemia, and strengthened with the power of his brother Charles the Emperour, not forgetting his right, might vpon good ground lay claime vnto the kingdome of Hungarie, vnto him (as hee pretended) of right belonging euer since the time of Albertus the Emperour. Neither did Ferdinand beside the strength of Austria and Bohemia, want the furtherance of diuers of the princes of Hungarie: hauing in his court many of vnquiet spirit, halfe fugitiues, desirous of change, which enuied at the Vayuods royall preferment (as if it had beene taken from themselues, more worthie thereof than he) by the rash and tumultuous fauor of the vulgar people. For besides Bator, who in most mens iudgement might most worthily haue required and obtained the kingdome, there were others also almost of like nobilitie and valour, as Valentinus Turaccus, Stephanus Maylatus, Ianus Scala, Gasper Seredius, Baltasor Pamphilus, and Fe-

D rentius Gnarius; to whom also was ioyned Paulus Bachitius borne in Seruia, a valiant Gentleman, who being entered into the Mahometan religion, to auoid the Turkish slauerie, got away vnto the Christians, and hardly escaped from the battell of Mohatchz. By the perswasion of these noblemen, Ferdinand of his owne disposition readie enough to claime his right, especially a kingdome, and trusting vnto his strength in Austria, Bohemia, Rhetia, Stiria, and Carynthia, marched directly towards Buda. With whose comming, Iohn the new king being wonderfully troubled, as a man beset with want of all things, hauing neither sufficient strength whereupon to rest in his new got kingdome, neither any great assurance of the fidelitie of his subiects, like enough either for feare, or of their naturall inconstancie, to fall from him, determined not to abide the comming of his enemie to Buda: but exhorting his captaines to follow him, although he were glad to depart and giue place to his euill fortune for a time, with such power as he had brought with him out of Transyluania, & such other as he could otherwise leuie, he passed ouer the riuer to Pestum: and not daring any where thereabouts to rest,

E by long marches passed ouer the riuer Tibiscus, and there incamped at Tocai, which was a strong castle vpon the further side of the riuer. His departure being knowne, Ferdinand marching on, obtained Buda without resistance: where he staied a while, and consulted with his captaines, Whether he should pursue his flying enemie, or not. But it was quickly resolued, That the discouraged enemie was to be speedily pursued, before hee should gather greater strength, or enter into greater policies. Wherefore Ferdinand committed al his armie vnto the nobilitie of Hungarie, his friends, whom we haue before named; who marching with all speed possible, came to the riuer Tibiscus: where passing ouer vpon a bridge made of boats which they brought with them in waggons for that purpose, they came with ensignes displayed vnto the castle of Tocai, where the king lay with his armie in order of battell. But terrified

King Ferdinand taketh Buda.

F with the sudden comming of his enemies, and debating with his captaines of the greatnesse of the danger, tooke a course vnto himselfe rather safe than honourable: for his captaines desiring nothing more than to ioine battell, and in manner contemning their enemies, perswaded him to withdraw himselfe a little out of the battell, and to keepe him out of danger; and if things fel out otherwise than wel, to reserue himself vnto his better fortunes: as for themlues they would most resolutely fight against those traiterous fugitiues, forasmuch as it were great dishonour dishonour for them, being Hungarians, a warlike people by nature, to refuse battell being offered by the enemie. Amongst the chieftaines of the kings armie, Ferentius Budo an old captain of great experience and courage was chiefe, to whom the King deliuered his Ensigne with his own hands, and he with great skill ordered his battell, for the number of his soldiers: he himselfe stood in the maine battell with the Hungarians, placing the Transyluanians in the wings. In Ferdinands armie, Valentinus Turaccus led the maine battell with the Hungarians, vnder Ferdinands Ensigne; strengthned on the one side with troupes of horsemen out of Styria, and on the other, with the horsemen of Austria. But Paulus Bachitius (according to the manner of the Turkish wars, wherewith he was well acquainted) with a companie of light horsemen lay close in ambush in a conuenient place for that purpose, a good distance off, against the left wing of the enemies armie, readie as occasion should serue, to take his most aduantage. It was not greatly needfull for the captaines to vse any persuasions to encourage their souldiers, readie enough of themselues to fight. The great ordnance once discharged, the armies came fast on and ioyned battell, where the wings of both battels fought with diuers fortune. The Styrian horsemen were not able to endure the force of the Transyluanians, but were put to the worse. And on the other side, the left wing of Bodo his armie, consisting for most part of raw and vnexpert soldiers, was by the horsemen of Austria ouerthrown. At the same time both the main battels (being almost all Hungarians) fought with equall courage, and that so eagerly, as seldome had bin seene a more fierce or cruell battell. But by a fresh charge giuen by Ferdinands horsemen, who had now put to flight the right wing of Bodo his battell, all Bodo his army fighting most valiantly, was disordred and put to flight: Bodo the General laboring to restore the battell, and to saue the ensigne to him before by the King deliuered, was by the comming in of Paulus Bachitius with his light horsemen taken. The other captaines seeing all lost, and past hope of recouerie, betooke themselues to flight: all the Kings Artillerie and Ensignes were taken by the enemie. The king seeing the ouerthrow of his armie, for safegard of his life fled into Polonia. Ferdinands captaines following the course of the victorie, entred into Transyluania; where the people yeelding themselues at the first, all the whole prouince submitted it selfe vnto the authoritie of Ferdinand. Bodo and the rest of the noblemen that were taken prisoners, with the ensignes taken from the enemies, were sent to Ferdinand. But when Bodo hauing his liberty promised, could not be perswaded to renounce his oath giuen to king Iohn, and to beare armes against him, he was by Ferdinand his commandement cast into a darke dungeon, where shortly after consumed with sorrow and griefe, he miserably ended his life.

King Iohn flies into Polonia.

Ferdinand crowned king of Hungarie at Alba Regalis.

Shortly after, Ferdinand (the Hungarians generally submitting themselues vnto him) was by their common consent saluted King, and crowned with the same old Crowne wherewith King Iohn had bin crowned, which the same Perenus (a man of little constancie) brought vnto him; and with him was also crowned Anne his wife, the only sister of the late king Lewis. All which solemne ceremonies were celebrated at Alba Regalis, the vsuall place for the coronation of the Hungarian kings. Ferdinand by rare felicitie thus possessed of two kingdomes, whereunto he was not borne, returned into Bohemia, and left his deputies for the gouernement of the kingdome of Hungarie: these were Stephanus Bator, whom he appointed viceroy, with whom he ioyned Paulus Bishop of Strigonium, who had also reuolted from king Iohn; and made Berethsaxtus Secretarie, and Alexius Tursonus a Morauian, Treasurer.

King Iohn thus miserably distressed, and thrust out of his kingdome by Ferdinand, fled to Hieronimus Lascus, a man for his honorable discent and learned vertue, of great fame and reputation amongst the Polonians: who glad of so honorable a gueſt, was more careful of nothing, than with all possible kindenesse and curtesie how to comfort him, wrapt vp in so many calamities with the losse of his kingdome: he frankely promised vnto him all his owne wealth (which was not small) for the recouerie of his former estate; and that which more was, for the reuiuing of his former felicitie, the vttermost of his wit and deuice, which in the compassing of all great matters was accounted wonderfull. That bountifull entertainment of this poore king by Lascus, was not altogether vnpleasant to Sigismund K. of Polonia, although (because he would not offend Ferdinand, with whom he was ioyned in friendship and alyance) he seemed to most men plainly to forget himselfe, in shewing so small kindnesse vnto K. Iohn, whose sister Barbara he had somtime married: which was the cause that Lascus forgot no point of curtesie in entertaining his gueſt, and yet the credit of Sigismund with king Ferdinand not toucht. But when

when they had spent almost a month in consultation & debating of matters too and fro, Lascus accustomed with his deep wit sharply to reason, and aduisedly to determine of most weighty causes, at last rested vpon this one point, That ready helpe in so hard and desperat a case was only to be hoped for of the Turkish Emperor Solyman: being of opinion, that he being a most mightie prince and of an honorable disposition, answerable to his greatnesse, would not reiect the humble praiers of an oppressed and exiled king: especially, if that being by his mercie and power restored, he could be content for so great a benefit to hold his kingdome, as of the bountie of the Othoman kings. For Lascus saw that Solyman (so great and proud an Emperour) was not so desirous of kingdomes (whereof he had so many as could not easily be reckoned, then commanding ouer a great part of the world) as of glory and renowne, wherewith he vnderstood him to be wonderfully delighted aboue all other kings of the East, naturally carried away with that windie vanitie. This counsell (as in effect it proued) was vnto king Iohn wholesome and reasonable, if a man do but respect the poore estate of a king, so greatly wronging in exile, but respecting the Christian common weale, it was vndoubtedly most dangerous and lamentable, for one mans particular profit to bring the whole state into most dreadfull and horrible danger: but the sicke minds of worldly men, liuing in small hope of doing wel, & at the point of desparation, refuse no worldy remedies, be they neuer so doubtfull or dangerous. And not long after, vpon this resolution with the king, Lascus desirous by noble actions to encrease the honor of his name, tooke the matter vpon him, and went as embassadour from the exiled king to Solyman to Constantinople. The report was, that Sigismund did not only not stay him, but secretly gaue him his safe cõduct with letters of credence, wherin he commended him vnto the Bassaes & other great men in Solymans court, descended of the Polonian bloud, as his faithfull and louing subiect sent thither vpon an extraordinary and speciall embassage. Lascus as soon as he was come to Constantinople, with wonderful dexteritie had in short time won the fauor, not of the Bassaes only, but of the other courtiers also; presenting them with such gifts as might for the fineneſse and rareneſse thereof, rather than for the value (as he thought) be most acceptable and pleasing to their wiues: for amongst that barbarous and corrupted people nothing is better welcome than gifts, whether they proceed of simple good will, or other respect, is no great difference. Amongst the great Bassaes at that time of greatest power and authoritie, was Lusicheius, or rather Lutzis, who had married Solymans sister; and Abraham borne at Parga, a base village in Acarnania, brought vp in the court from his childhood with Solyman: he was then visier or chiefe of the Bassaes, and keeper of the Emperors seale, and was by his office to subscribe all such grants or letters as passed from the Emperor: by which his great place, and the speciall fauor he had with Solyman, he in magnificence, power, & authoritie, far exceeded all the rest of the Bassaes, doing whatsoeuer pleased himselfe; & that with such soueraignrie and the good liking of Solyman, that it was commonly said, he was the commander of his thoughts. Lascus thus insinuated into the court, and oftentimes talking with the Bassaes without an interpretor, for that he could wel speake the Sclauonian tongue (the familiar speech of the Turkish courtiers) earnestly solicited the kings cause, wonderfully commending him: for at his first comming, after he had saluted Solyman, & was about to haue declared the cause of his comming, he was after the manner of the Turkish court referred to the Bassaes: for Solyman vsed not to admit any Christian to talk with him in his court. Lascus requested of Solyman, by the Bassaes, That king Iohn wrongfully thrust out of his kingdom by Ferdinand duke of Austria, & the treason of certain of the Hungarians, might by the Turkish power be again restored vnto the kingdom of Hungary, which he would hold by homage of the Turkish Emperor, as of right belonging vnto him, since the time that Solyman with victorious hand reuenging his wrongs & subduing his enemies, had by law of arms (fortune so iudging) gained the same. Promising that king Iohn, who for his worthines was by the generall good liking of the Hungarians lawfully chosen to be their king, and so after the antient maner of that kingdom crowned, if he were now receiued into Solymans protection, & by him restored, should neuer forget so great a benefit, but alwaies most faithfully and thankfully to honor the maiestie of Solyman, paying him such yerely tribute as it should please him to impose, and to make it knowne to all men, that he was his vassall. Which thing if it would please him to grant, it should be no lesse honor & glory to Solyman himself, than profitable and comfortable vnto the distressed king. For beside, that heroical kings are compared vnto gods, rather rather for giuing than receiuing: it was easie to be seen, how greatly it did concerne the profit of the Othoman kings to bee neighboured with a weake and tributarie king, rather than with Ferdinand, a prince of great power, lately chosen king of Bohemia, supported by the strength of his brother Charles the Emperor, commanding ouer the warlike nation of the Germanes, which was as much difference as was betwixt the maintenance of a continuall heauie warre vpon his borders, and the safe enioying of a most assured peace. Beside that, it concerned the Turks to beware, that such things as they had got by the sword, they should also by the sword defend; & not to suffer any one to grow greater than the rest in riches and power. For it might so fall out, that Charles, growne to be a prince of mightie power, might draw the rest of the Christian princes to ioine with him in the common cause of the Christian religion, & in that quarrell, as the Christian kings of Europe had in former time done, with vnited forces to seeke to recouer againe what they had before lost; whose force it would bee hard to withstand. These things being sharply deliuered, & by the Bassaes againe reported to Solyman, who standing at a secret window, had before heard them as they were by Lascus to the Bassaes declared; it was no great labor to perswade the Turkish Emperour, of himselfe desirous of glory and soueraignetie, againe to vndertake the Hungarian war, and to grant king Iohn his request, promising according to the successe of the victorie, to giue him that he desired, so that he would faithfully performe what he had promised, and not shew himselfe therefore vnthankfull.

In the meane time, Ferdinand vpon great reason thinking it necessarie by all means possible to confirme himselfe in possession of the kingdome of Hungarie: and fearing no force but the Turks, determined to proue Solymans disposition, and to seeke for his friendship; hoping by reasonable meanes to compasse it, by shewing vnto the barbarous prince (not altogether abhorring from the commendation of iustice) his antient title and claime, and that hee was by the antient lawes of the countrie right heire thereof: thinking that Solyman hauing obtained so many victories, and ruling ouer so many kingdomes, would now at length giue himselfe to peace, as a man contented with his glorie already gotten. His desire was, to be receiued into his friendship, and to ioine with him in league vpon the same conditions which Ladislaus and his son Lewis had for certain yeares before obtained of the Othoman kings, and Sigismund king of Polonia then also with like quietnesse inioied. Wherfore hauing found out a fit man, whom he might send vpon this embassage to Constantinople (one Iohannes Oberdanscus, a Hungarian) he furnished him accordingly, and gaue him gifts, such as hee thought good to bestow vpon the great Bassaes. But when Oberdanscus was come vnto Constantinople, he found Solyman harder to bee intreated than hee had before hoped, and the Bassaes altogether vnwilling to heare of any league: for although he was courteously receiued of Solyman, and most patiently heard, whilest he both eloquently and discreetly before the great Bassaes, deliuered his embassage; yet in the shutting vp of all, he receiued no more but a proud and insolent answer: for Solyman said, it was far from the manner of his ancestors, to receiue them into grace and fauor which had done iniurie vnto the Othoman name: wherefore that Ferdinand had done impudently to inuade another mans kingdome, and to thinke to hold it to himselfe: forasmuch as his old title and claime which he stood so much vpon, was altogether extinguished and lost by law of armes, by his late victorie against king Lewis; for which causes he adiudged him vnworthie of his friendship and fauor, purposing sharply to reuenge the wrong he had receiued; and proclaiming war, to come againe into Hungarie with such a power as should be sufficient to inuade Ferdinand either in Austria or Germanie. Wherfore in stead of friendship and league he denounced vnto him all the calamities of war: and so commanded the embassadour with speed to depart from Constantinople. But Oberdanscus when hee was come backe againe as farre as Vienna, and had there told the kings lieutenants, of the threatning words of Solyman, and that he would shortly come thither with his armie, he was not of any of them beleeued, but reputed for a vaine man. Wherefore to shun the hatred of them which mistooke truth for falshood, hee made hast to come vnto Ferdinand, who was then at Spires, labouring for voices to further his suit, for that at the next assemblie of the states of the empire, which was then at hand for the coronation of his brother Charles, he himselfe as he well hoped, was to be chosen King of the Romanes. The newes brought by Oberdanscus, did not a little trouble King Ferdinand, foreseeing as it were what would happen: for that the Turkish tyrant vsed not lightly to breake such promises, but to performe them to the vttermost: and that more increased his care, he knew he should come in euill time to craue help of the Germans, for the defence of his kingdome in Hungarie against so mightie an enemie, especially his brother Charles the Emperour being busied in his wars in Italie, and he himselfe wanting money the only means to raise an armie to withstand the Turke. The Spring now come, and all things fresh and greene, Solyman altering nothing of his former determination, hauing leuied an army of an hundred and fifteene thousand men, set forward from Hadrianople, his Europeian horsmen going before him conducted by Abraham the great Bassa, and Achomates Michael-Ogli, Generall of the Acanzij or voluntarie horsemen: and his Asian souldiers led by Becrambeius Bassa following after him: he himselfe with his Ianizaries and souldiers of the court keeping in the middle. And marching on in this sort, came in fifteene daies to Belgrade, where King Iohn accompanied with Lascus and such of the Hungarian nobilitie as tooke his part, came vnto him, of purpose to make himselfe knowne vnto him which was to protect him; and doing him all the honour he possibly could, to request him to proceed to reuenge his quarrell. Solyman with graue and yet friendly countenance, raising himselfe a little from the cushion whereon he sat, gaue him his right hand, protesting, That nothing could happen vnto him better, or that he more desired of God, than to be able to relieue distressed Princes, especially such as were wrongfully oppressed by his enemies: wherfore he willed him to be of good comfort, promising of his bountie frankly to bestow vpon him whatsoeuer he should in that war win with the sword from the enemie. King Iohn obtained this rare fauor of Solyman by the earnest mediation of Abraham the commanding Bassa; whom he had before at Constantinople by his embassador Lascus so woon with gifts and requests, that he thorowly tooke vpon him the defence of the kings cause: wherein Lascus was especially holpen by Aloysius Grittus the Duke of Venice his son, who then followed the Turks campe, and was for his fathers sake and the great sufficiencie hee held himselfe, had in great reputation amongst the Turks; and in such fauor with Abraham, who did all in all with Solyman, that he could perswade him to any thing he would. For this Aloysius Grittus, borne and brought vp in Constantinople, and wonderfull eloquent in the Turkish tongue, had by the honourable carriage of himselfe, and the great port he kept in his house, so thorowly possessed Abraham (that all commanded) that he would many times bring Solyman himselfe ouer the hauen to Pera, to solace himselfe in Grittus his pleasant gardens and banquetting houses, which he had there most sumptuously made after the Italian manner: whereby to his great profit he obtained to be the chiefe man in receiuing of the Turks' customes.

Solyman commeth into Hungarie with a great armie.

King Iohn commeth to Solyman at Belgrade.

The fame of Solymans comming directly from Belgrade to Buda, so terrified the citizens of Buda, that they almost all forsooke the citie and fled vnto other places further off, some to Strigonium, some to Alba Regalis, some to Possonium: so that at his first comming he entered the citie (almost desolate) without any resistance: the castle holden by a garrison of Germans, he commanded to bee besieged. The captaine of the castle was one Thomas Nadastus, a man of great account among the Hungarians, both for the honor of his house, & his qualities answerable to the same, graced with singular learning: he perceiuing his soldiers dismaied with the sight of so great an armie, and willing to surrender vp the castle; as beseemed a valiant captaine, forbad his souldiers to haue any talke with the enemie, commanded the great artillerie to be bent and discharged vpon the Turks: and seeing his souldiers slacke and timorous, reproued them of cowardise and treason, threatning them with shamefull death if they did not hold out the siege to the vttermost, & shew themselues valiant men, both for the honor of their country, & of king Ferdinand whose pay they receiued, & of whose bounty they were to expect rewards and preferments answerable to their deserts. But they misdoubting by the running too & fro of the Turks, that the castle was vndermined; & smelling, or at leastwise imagining themselues to smell the sent of the gunpouder, which they supposed to be in the mine, & doubting to be presently blown vp; were struck with such a sudden feare, that neither the fear of future punishment, neither the shame of so foule a fact, nor the reuerence of so worthy a captain could stay them, but that they would needs without further delay deliuer vp the castle: which when they could by no means perswade the resolute captain to consent to, but that he stil with stern countenance exclaimed against their cowardise and treason, they laied hands on him, & bound him hand & foot, & so presently concluded with the enemy to yeeld to him the castle, so that they might in safety depart thence with bag & baggage: which their request Solyman granted. But when the garrison soldiers (in number about 700) were about to depart with their baggage towards Possonium, as was before agreed: and the Ianizaries coming into the castle, hauing loosed the captaine, were about to let him goe: also Solyman aduertised of the trecherie of the garrison souldiers, and of the fidelity of the captaine, changing his mind, iudged such villanous minded men vnworthy of his mercy, & in detestation of their perfidious dealing with their captaine, gaue them all to his Ianizaries to bee slaine: but to the captaine himselfe he offered honorable entertainment, which when he refused, Solyman courteously sent him away; holpen therein by the commendation of king Iohn, although his sister was married to Stephanus Maylat his deadly enemie. Which bloudie execution done by the commandement of the bloudie tyrant, the Turks said was not only lawfully done, but also to the immortall glorie of his name in the execution of iustice: which might peradventure seem reasonable, if the perpetuall hatred of that most barbarous nation against the Christians gaue not iust occasion of suspect, that it proceeded rather of their antient malice, than of any regard of iustice. For why should the Germans, who had offended to his great good, and therefore obtained his safe conduct, be thought worthy of so cruell death: when as Solyman himselfe in punishing the periurie of another, ran into wilfull periurie himselfe, peruerting the commendation of iustice which he so much desired, by his most bloudie and vniust sentence.

Solyman contrarie to his promise causeth the garrison souldiers after they had deliuered the castle, to bee slaine.

Buda the chiefe citie of Hungarie thus taken by Solyman, he resolued forthwith to besiege Vienna the chiefe citie of Austria: in good hope, that by the carriage away of that, the other cities of lesse strength both of Hungarie and Austria would without any resistance be yeelded vnto him. Wherefore he sent before him Achomates with the voluntarie horsemen, who according to the manner of the Turkish wars, running thorow the heart of Hungarie, & entring with fire and sword into Austria, passed by Vienna, miserably burning and destroying the country before him as far as Lyntz. The poore people not knowing where to hide themselues from the fury of their enemies, nor of whom to craue helpe, fled as men and women dismaid, carrying with them their beloued children, the vnfortunat pledges of their loue, and what els they could, as things saued out of the midst of the fire. For whatsoeuer fell into the enemies hand, was lost without recure: the old men were slain, the yong men led away into captiuitie, women rauished before their husbands faces, and afterwards slain with their children, young infants were ript out of their mothers wombs, and others taken from their brests were cut in pieces, or else thrust vpon sharpe stakes, yeelding vp againe that breath which they had but a little before receiued, with many other incredible cruelties, which were then by the mercilesse enemie committed. Solyman himselfe shortly after followed these forerunners, and setting forward with all his armie from Buda towards Vienna, by the way tooke the castle of Altenbourg, whether by force or composition, is diuersly reported: of the garrison souldiers there placed by king Ferdinand, he reserued 300 Bohemians, whom he commanded to follow his campe. He also assaulted the little city of Neapolis seuen times in one day, and was as often repulsed: but being loath to spend any longer time about a towne of so small importance he forsook that, & held on his way to Vienna, whither he came about the six & twentie day of September, and incamped in fiue places round about the citie, with such a world of people, that vnto them which viewed his campe from the highest tower in Vienna, it seemed that the ground was for the space of eight miles all couered with the multitude of his tents and people. King Ferdinand, who from the time that he had by his embassadour Oberdanscus receiued the hard answere from Solyman, alwaies stood in doubt of his comming; and beside his owne forces (which were not great to oppose against so mightie an enemie) craued aide of the Christian Princes his neighbours, especially of the Princes of the Empire: Who granting him aide against the common enemie, appointed Fredericke Countie Palatine of Rhene and Duke of Bauaria, Generall of their forces. But whilest the Germaines after their manner, slowly set forward, and made lesse hast than the greatnesse of the present danger required; Solyman comming in the meane time, had so belaied the Citie, that it was not possible for the Duke Fredericke by any means to get into it, but was glad to stay with his armie at Chremse about twelue miles from Vienna. A few daies before by good hap, vpon the report of the losse of Buda, twentie thousand soldiers horsemen and footmen out of diuers countries, were in good time come to Vienna: Amongst these, the chiefe Commaunders was Philip the Paulsgraue, Duke Frederickes nephew (a young Gentleman of great courage and hope, sent

Solyman commeth to Vienna

A sent thither but a little before with a few companies of horsemen and footmen by Fredericke his vncle, who was comming after with a greater power himselfe, but was now shut out of the city by Solyman) Nicholaus countie of Salma, the L. William Rogendorff, steward of the Kings houshold, Ioannes Cazzianer, a noble man of Croatia, and afterwards Gouernor of Vienna: and next vnto them, Nicholaus Turrianus, Ioannes Hardecus, Leonardus Velsius, Hector Ramsack, men both for their birth and valour of great account amongst the Germans. The citie of Vienna as it was of some good strength toward the North, by reason of Danubius, so in other places it was at that time neither by art nor nature strong. The ditches, such as they were, were altogether drie, and easie to be passed ouer: the wals of bricke, built round without any flankers, and neither high nor thicke, but after the antient simple manner of fortification of cities: for Vienna badly fortified.

B before that time neither had king Ferdinand, fearing no enemie, neither they of Vienna, who had not of many yeares seene an enemie, had any care to fortifie the citie: but as men altogether buried in securitie, and nothing fearing the comming of so mightie an enemie (although they were therof before admonished by Oberdanscus) had not so much as cast vp any rampire or bulwarke, more than at the gate of Carinthia, wheron they might conueniently place their great ordnance: so that of 100 great pieces, and 300 others of lesse charge, which might haue wonderfully annoyed the enemie, a great part serued to no vse, for want of conuenient place to mount them vpon. Yet as the sudden comming of the enemie, and the shortnesse of the time gaue leaue, such bulwarkes as they could vpon the sudden, they cast vp, and planted their ordnance thereon. The citie was diuided into diuers quarters, and to euery part a strong

C garrison appointed for the defence thereof, all the gates of the citie were mured vp, except such as were of purpose reserued to sallie out at. Now had Abraham the great Bassa encamped himselfe vpon a high hil, where stood a ruinous castle, from whence he might ouerlooke all the citie; yet so, as that he lay out of the danger of gun shot. Becrambeius, Solymans great commander in Asia, lay at the gate called Purgatoria, neere the church of S. Vlderich. In the third campe towards the rising of the hils, lay Michael-Ogli, towards the church of S. Vitus. At the Scottish gate toward Danubius, lay the Aspi, with diuers companies of the Ianizaries; which with shot out of their trenches, suffred no man to appeare vpon the wals in that quarter without most manifest danger, and poured such showers of arrowes ouer the wals into the citie, as if they had fallen out of the clouds; that hardly could any man stir in the citie vnarmed, but

D hee was forthwith wounded. Solyman himselfe lay neere vnto S. Markes church, compassed about with the Ianizaries and other souldiers of the court, defended also with the brick wals of the gardens thereabouts. Whilest the Turks were thus incamping themselues, the Christian defendants oftentimes fortunatly sallied out vpon them, and slew many of them. In one of which sallies Wolfgangus Hagen a valiant captaine, with certain old soldiers of the Spaniards was slain, fighting most valiantly at the gates of the castle: and in another skirmish Christophorus Zetlitz a man of great courage, sallying out of the city with 500 horsemen, euen vnto the enemies trenches, was intercepted and taken with six others of his company; who were all compelled by the Turks to carrie so many heads of their slain fellowes vpon poles, and so presented vnto Solyman: of whom he inquired many things as wel concerning Ferdinand himselfe, and where he was, as concerning the princes which had the charge of the city, whether

E they were in hope to defend the same against his mightie power or not. Whereunto Christophorus aptly and wisely answered, although not altogether so truly, That king Ferdinand lay not far off at the citie of Lintz, expecting the assembly of a great armie: and that the princes of Germanie, Bohemia, Morauia, and of diuers other places were comming vnto him, with great aid; so that if he would but stay a little vntill his forces were come together, he should then see whether of them were of greater strength and power: forasmuch as it would not be long before the king would come and giue him battell: as for the princes in the citie, he said he knew no more of their minds, but that both they and all the souldiers from the highest to the lowest, had solemnly sworne to defend the citie, and not to giue it ouer, vnto the last man,

F reposing their hope not in the wals and fortresses thereof, but in their weapons and valor, being men of great resolution, and not easily to be vanquished or discouraged. With which answer although Solyman was a little moued, yet dissembling his present heat, said, he had hetherto made war against diuers nations, and alwaies had the victorie, whereof he doubted not now also: but as for him, and the others taken with him, they knew they were in his power to fame or kill at his pleasure: yet to make them know that he could shew mercie vnto his vanquished enemies, he frankely granted them their liues and liberty: charging them, that after C they were again returned into the citie, they should in his name wish the defendants of themselues to yeeld vp the city, which it was impossible for them long to defend against his mightie power, which neither the strong city of Belgrade, nor the famous citie of the Rhodes were able to withstand; and to accept of such reasonable conditions as he should grant vnto them; promising, that amongst other things proceeding of his infinit bountie, he would take order, that they should in safetie depart thence with bag and baggage: in which doing, they should well prouide for the safety of themselues and of their goods by flying vnto his mercy in time, before the fury of the war was growne to further extremitie: all which it would be too late to expect after the victorie, when nothing was to be hoped for but cruell death, murther, and H miserable destruction. Wherefore it were good for them well to consider of the matter, and not foolishly to refuse that was now frankely offered them of mercie, which they should not afterwards obtaine with any prayers or teares: for why, he was resolutely set down (as he said) not to depart thence before he had taken the citie. When he had thus schooled them, he gaue vnto euery one of them three hungarian duckats, & so sent them away. They being receiued into the city with great ioy, made relation vnto the princes and great captains, of all the threatning and proud speeches of the Turkish tyrant: which they tooke in such disdaine, that they would not vouchsafe to returne him any answer. Solyman not a little displeased, that his great words were so lightly regarded, by way of derision sent word to the citie, That if they wanted help, he would send them the 300 Bohemians, whom he tooke in the castle of Altenburg: I to whom answere was returned by them of the citie, That they needed no helpe from him, wherefore he might dispose of his prisoners as he thought good. By this, Solyman perceiued, that Vienna was not to be won with words, nor the defendants to be discouraged with great lookes, wherefore he begun to vse his force, & with such ordnance as he had brought with him, to batter the wals: which because it was not great, but fitter for seruice in field than for batterie, did not much more harme than to beat down the battlements & such like standings, made of timber and boords in manner of galleries, hanging here & there ouer the wall, for the small shot to play out of, a simple deuise in stead of flankers. His great artillerie prouided for batterie was comming vp the riuer of Danubius, which he daily looked for; but by good hap, Wolfgangus Hoder, a forward captaine, hearing of the Turkes comming vp the riuer, went K out of Possonium with certain small vessels wel appointed, & meeting with the Turks, set vpon them with such courage & resolution that he slew many of them, and sunke diuers of their boats and pinnaces, amongst whom were they which were bringing vp Solymans great pieces for batterie to Vienna: which was thereall sunke in the riuer, with the boats that brought it. By this good seruice, Solyman was disappointed of his great artillerie, and the citie deliuered of a great danger. So Wolfgangus hauing made great spoile amongst the Turkes, and lost some few men, returned with victorie to Possonium. Yet another part of the Turks fleet comming vp to Vienna, at the first comming brake downe all the bridges: for a little aboue the citie, the riuer of Danubius diuiding his channell, maketh diuers Islands, which by sundrie bridges are ioined together, ouer which lieth the way from Austria vnto the citie. This fleet so kept L the passage, that no man could without danger either by water or by land go in or out of the citie. Solyman hauing lost all his pieces for batterie, & seeing how little he preuailed with his field pieces, fel to vndermining of the city, hoping by that means to ouerthrow the wals, and to make a way for his men to enter. This work, as the Turks chiefe hope, was with wonderful labor & diligence attempted in 15 sundry places: which was not so secretly done, but that is was by drums laid opon the ground, by basons filled with water, & sounds made into the earth perceiued by the defendants; and so with countermines met withall, that most part of those works were vtterly frustrated, & in them 8000 of his Turks either slaine or buried quicke.

Eight thousand Turkes lost in the Mines.

Solyman to busie the defendants that they should not so perfectly discouer his mines, diuided his army into foure parts, appointing them orderly to succeed one after another in giuing M alarums to the town, that filling their eares with continuall noise, he might keep them alwaies occuppied. In the midst of which hurly burly his mine-workes went forward with all speed possible, neither was he in that his expectation deceiued: for one of the mines brought to perfection vnperceiued by the defendants, and suddenly blown vp, shook and ouerthrew a great part

The wals of Vienna blown vp.

A part of the wall neere vnto the gate which leadeth towards Carinthia, whereat the Turkes gaue a great shout, as if the citie had now bin taken, and withal couragiously stepping forward, pressed in on all sides, by the ruines of the wall to haue entred the breach, charging the defendants with their small shot and Turkie arrowes as thicke as haile. Who on the contrarie part like resolute men stood in the face of the breach, with more assurance than the wall it selfe, receiuing them with deadly shot and push of pike, in such furious manner, that the Turks for all The Turkes repulsed from the breach.
B their multitude, vnable longer to maintaine the assault, began to retyre. Which thing Solyman perceiuing, sent in new supplies, and so renewed the assault before giuen ouer, but with no better successe than before: for hauing receiued a great ouerthrow, as men forgetting both dutie and martiall discipline, they retyred, not expecting any signe of retreat. At this assault so many of the Turks were slaine, that the ground neere vnto the town lay couered, and the ditches filled with their dead bodies. Not long after, the wall was blowne vp in two places more, ouer against S. Clares church; by which breach, being not verie great, the Turks seeking to haue entred, made a bloudie fight with the Germans which defended that place; which they fought so desperatly to haue entred, that without regard they thrust one another vpon the points of their enemies weapons; who glistering in good armour, readily receiued them
C being for most part naked men, and slew them without number, and so inforced them againe A most terrible assault. disorderly to retyre, hauing before filled both the breaches with their dead carkases. Three dayes after ensued a most cruell fight, when as another part of the wall (neere vnto the gate of Carinthia, and not far from the first breach) was so suddenly ouerthrowne, that the Turks thorow the new made breach seeing the Christians as they stood readie to come to the defence thereof; and likewise the Christians them, now approching; for eagernesse and hast on both sides threw away their pieces and bowes, and came to handie blowes in the middle of the breach; the Turks with their scimiters, and the Germans with their long swords. At which time, as the Christian captaines encouraged their soldiers with cheerefull persuasions; so the Turkish commanders enforced forward their Turks both with words and wounds. The as-D fault began so terrible, that it was thought a more fierce and deadly fight was neuer seen from the beginning of the world: which was with great resolution maintained by the Turks; for that many of their most valiant horsemen forsaking their horses, thrust in with their targets and scimiters, or else with their launces amongst the Ianizaries and other footmen, and there fought most desperatly. At last, after this furious fight had endured by the space of 3 houres, The Turkes the third time repulsed. and many of the Turks best captaines and soldiers lay dead vpon the ground by heapes; the Turks seeing no hope to preuaile, gaue ouer the assault, and retyred to their campe.

Long and tedious it were to recount euery assault giuen during the time of that dreadfull siege, with euery particular accident not vnworthie the remembrance, which for breuity wittingly I passe ouer. Yet among the rest, the most valiant leader (though afterward vnfortunat) The Lo. William Rogendorffe. the Lo. William Rogendorffe is not to be forgotten, who oftentimes perceiuing many of the Turks stragling disorderly abroad in the countrey, one day vpon the sudden sallied out vpon
E them with certain troups of horsemen, with such violence, that at the first onset he ouerthrew them, and hauing them in chase, did such speedie execution, that of 5300 scarce 140 escaped his hands: after which time his name became terrible vnto the Turkes. Solyman was exceedingly grieued with the often & bloudie assaults by him in vain giuen to the city; but purposing now to proue the last and vtmost of all his forces, he called to him the chiefe Commanders of his army, whom at the first he sharply reproued as men of no courage, which being many times as good as possessed of the victorie, had most cowardly, contrarie to the maner of that victorious nation, turned their backes vpon their enemies, in the breaches alreadie halfe woon: wherefore he willed them to pluck vp their hearts, & to make all things readie for a new assault, wherin he expected that they should with couragious forwardnes and resolution, recompence their late cowardise: for why, he accounted it a great dishonor to forsake the siege F begun; wherfore they should resolue the next day as victorious conquerors to take the city, Vienna against assaulted. or else there as faint hearted cowards to end their days. The next day after this heauie charge giuen, which was the fifteenth of October, the great commanders of the Turks army with all their forces assailed the citie, thrusting their men into the breaches by heaps, as if they would, if no way else, yet with verie multitude (if it had bin possible) haue discouraged or ouerborne the Christians: they were come to handie blows, and the fight was in euery place most terrible, the Christian defendants still repulsing them with greater courage than they were able to assaile them. Besides that, to the great aduantage of the defendants, many pieces of their great ordnance skilfully mounted in places most conuenient, and continually discharged among the thickest of their enemies as they pressed on, made of them such slaughter, and so cut them off, that being thorowly discouraged, they shrunk backe, and could no by any threats or commaund of their captaines be thrust forward; chusing rather to be slaine of their own captaines (as some of them were) than to be rent in sunder with the murthering shot of the Christians. So that the captaines seeing now no other remedie, gaue ouer the assault and retyred, leauing behind them many thoulands of their dead Turks in the towne ditches.

ble,

The Turks repulsed.

The next day after this assault, Solyman despairing to win the city, and fearing the comming of King Ferdinand and the Countie Palatine with a strong armie, as it had been to him reported, considering also that Winter was now comming fast on, determined to raise his siege: and to colour the dishonour thereof, he sent certaine of the chiefe prisoners which he had taken, richly apparelled, with their purses full of money, into the citie, to tell the captaines, that he came not with purpose either to besiege or take the city, but to reuenge the wrongs done vnto him by his enemie king Ferdinand, and to haue fought a battell with him for the kingdom of Hungarie: whom forasmuch as he could not draw vnto Vienna, he would remoove thence to seeke for him, as his capitall enemie: wherefore they should do well to yeeld themselues; which if they would, he promised not to enter their citie, but to receiue both the citizens and soldiers into his protection, reseruing vnto them their liues and goods, with perpetuall freedome. Which his offer the defendants scornfully refused, as proceeding of meere desparation.

Solyman raiseth his siege.

The next night following, Solyman with more than barbarous cruelty caused all the prisoners in his armie to be slaine; which pittifull outcries was of the souldiers heard into the city, not knowing what the matter should be, vntill that the next day after the departure of the enemy, they found the dead bodies of men, women, and children in all places of the campe wallowed in their owne bloud, a most lamentable spectacle to behold. Solyman purposing to forsake the siege, caused Abraham the great Bassa to shew himselfe in order of battell, as if he would haue giuen a fresh assault: in the meane time he himselfe rose vpon the sudden with the rest of his armie, and returned towards Buda in such hast, that he neither put any garrison into such places as he had taken, neither demanded of them any tribute. After whom the Bassa followed, keeping himselfe a dayes journey behind him: and so in fiue dayes he arriued with all his armie at Buda, 32 Germane miles from Vienna.

80000 Turkes lost at the siege of Vienna.

This siege was giuen ouer by Solyman about the sixteenth of October, wherein he is reported to haue lost eightie thousand men, amongst whom was his great Lieutenant of Asia, with many other of his forward Captaines and best souldiers. Of the defendants few or none of name were lost; but of the countrey people it is supposed that there was aboue sixtie thousand slain and carried away into captiuitie: all the country about Vienna was miserably spoiled, all their trees and vines being by the Turks cut downe to the ground. Solyman according to his promise restored Buda vnto king Iohn; who by solemne writing acknowledged himselfe his vassall, and to hold the kingdome of Hungarie of him as his lord and soueraigne. Vnto him Solyman ioyned Aloysius Grittus as his Legat, to helpe him to prouide such things as should be needfull for the defence of that kingdome.

Solyman restoreth the kingdome of Hungary to K. Iohn.

It hapned one day whilest Solyman lay at Buda, and had giuen king Iohn with diuers of the nobilitie of Hungarie accesse into his pauilion, that he fell earnestly in hand with king Iohn, to pardon Paulus bishop of Strigonium, and Petrus Perenus (who had taken part with king Ferdinand) and to receiue them into his fauor again: which men king Iohn in no case liked of, because that they as traitors vnto their Prince and countrey, forgetting their faith and oath, had performed the like dutie to Ferdinand, as they had but a little before done vnto him at the time of his coronation: wherin he shewing himselfe vnwilling to be entreated, said, That their mutable minds fraught with infidelitie, would neuer containe themselues within the bounds of loyaltie, but find occasion to commit some fouler treason than they had before. Whereunto Solyman straining his voice a little, as one somewhat moued, most honorably replied, Can any thing (said he) happen vnto thee in this life better or more honorable, than if by thy kindenesse thine enemies shall be preuented, that is to say, men noted with eternall infamie; when as in thy selfe the commendation of a good and courteous Prince shall for euer remaine? And so not long after, fearing the cold of Winter then approching, dangerous for his beasts for carriage, especially his camels, bred and brought vp in the hot countries of Asia, he set forward to Belgrade, and so trauelling through Thracia, returned to Constantinople.

All this while that Solyman thus raged in Hungarie and Austria, Charles the Emperor lately reconciled to Clement the seuenth of that name, then Bishop of Rome, with a strong army besieged Florence, by his lieutenant Daualus, (who might haue done much against the Turkes, if he had been so well imployed) labouring by all meanes to represse the libertie of the citizens, whereunto they had but a little before aspired, and to bring them againe vnder the subiection of the familie of Medices, whereof Clement was the chiefe. Which thing with much adoo he brought to passe, inuesting Alexander the Bishops nephew in the dukedome of Florence, and afterward giuing him his base daughter in marriage; forgetting his brother Ferdinand in the meane time, thrust out of the kingdome of Hungarie by Solyman, and the dukedom of Austria wasted by the Turks, with the citie of Vienna in danger to haue been lost. Which common calamities might well haue mooued both the Emperor and the Bishop, to haue had more regard of, than by oppressing the libertie of one free citie, to seeke how to serue their owne priuat respects.

1530 Solyman circumciseth his three sonnes.

The yeare following, which was 1530, Solyman with great solemnitie and triumph, after the Turkish manner, circumcised three of his sonnes, Mustapha, Muhamet, and Selymus, at Constantinople.

Solyman hardly digesting the dishonour he had before receiued at Vienna, and oftentimes solicited by King Iohn, for aid against Ferdinand, who with greater stomacke than power ceased not continually to molest him: but most of all prickt forward with the insatiable desire of inlarging his Empire, after the manner of the Othoman kings, accounting his neighbor princes alwayes his enemies, and their dominions the obiects of his victories, and spoile for his souldiers; raised such an armie, as for the greatnesse thereof might worthily haue been a terror vnto the world: not so much purposing the protection of king Iohn, which he in shew most pretended; neither the siege of Vienna, as was commonly bruted, as the conquering of Austria, Carinthia, Croatia, Styria, and the rest of King Ferdinands dominions, and so afterwards of all Germanie. For the accomplishment whereof, he had in his immoderat desire prefined vnto himselfe the space of three yeares, which the great Monarchs of Rome could not performe in more than so many hundreds. It was commonly reported, that the proud tyrant would many times say, That whatsoeuer belonged vnto the Empire of Rome, was of right his, forasmuch as he was rightfully possessed both of the Imperiall seat and sceptre of Constantine the Great, commander of the world, which his great grandfather Mahomet had by law of Armes woon from Constantine the late Christian Emperour, whom he slew at Constantinople. And therefore both in his common talke and writings, as oft as he had occasion to make any mention of Charles the Emperour, he would proudly, and as it were in disdaine terme him by the name of the King of Spaine, but neuer by the name of Emperour.

King Ferdinand sends Embassadors to Solyman

The discord of the Christian Princes, and the great troubles euen then arising in Germany about matters of Religion, did not a little encourage the barbarous tyrant to take in hand this great expedition. King Ferdinand certainly aduertised, that Solyman was in person himselfe setting forward with his huge armie, sent vnto him three Embassadors; whereof Leonardus Negarola, a noble gentleman well learned, and skilfull in diuers languages, was chiefe, with rich Presents, and reasonable offers to entreat with him for peace. Who meeting him vpon the borders of Seruia, were by him curteously receiued, and patiently heard: yet obtained of him no other answer, but that they should follow his campe, and attend his further pleasure. The report whereof brought a generall feare vpon all Germanie, but especially them of Austria, in whose fresh remembrance as yet remained the bleeding wounds of their countrey, their brethren and friends slain, their wiues and children led away into captiuitie, their goods & cattel lost, their houses and fields burnt, and thousands of other grieuous calamities which they had endured in the late inuasion of the Turks. Charles the Emperor had in verie good time a little before, for a while well appeased the dissention then arising in Germanie about matters of religion; putting them in hope of a free and generall Councell to be holden for the deciding of all such matters: & in a great assemblie of the States of the empire to be holden at Ratisbon, shewing the greatnesse of the imminent danger, so puissant an enemie threatning vnto them all the calamities of war, with the manifold mischiefe like to ensue, if they should in so vnfit time fall at varience amongst themselues: offering with great resolution, to goe in person himselfe with all his old expert soldiers, in defence of the common Christian cause; so much preuailed with the Princes of the Empire, and the Embassadors of the free States, that they highly commended his forwardnesse, and all other matters for that time set apart, agreed all with one consent, at a prefixed day to send vnto Vienna such warlike forces as they had in any time before set forth for the defence of the Christian religion, & the maiestie of the Empire. Wherupon he wrot vnto Alphonsius Vastius (his lieutenant generall in Italie, and one of the greatest captaines of that age) that he should without delay call together the old captaines, and to leuie so many companies of harquebusiers as they possibly could; and with them and the Spanish soldiers to repaire forthwith vnto him into Austria. He also enioyned Andreas Auria his Admirall, that he should with like diligence rig vp a strong fleet of gallies & merchants ships, and to go against the Turks Nauie into Grecia. At the same time he sent for his choice horsemen out of Burgondie and the Low-countries, and many noble gentlemen and old soul iers out of Spaine: for the guard of his owne person he entertained twelue thousand Germ s, such as had longest serued in his wars in Italie, ouer whom commanded Maximilian Herberstene and Tamisius, both famous captaines. At the same time Clement the seuenth then Bishop of Rome, although his coffers were greatly emptied by the late Florentine wars, which had cost him ten hundred thousand duckats; yet to make some shew of his deuotion in so dangerous a time, with the great good will he bare vnto the Emperor; after he had with grieuous exaction extorted from the Clergie a great masse of money (whereunto his rich Cardinalls contributed nothing, as if it had bin a thing vtterly vnlawfull for them, in so good a cause to haue abated any jot of their pontificall shew in the court of Rome) sent the young Cardinall Hippolitus Medices his nephew, being then about twentie yeares of age, a man indeed fitter for the wars than for the Church, as his Legate vnto the Emperour, accompanied with mo good captaines than clergie men, and his coffers well stuffed with treasure: whose comming to Ratisbone was vnto the Emperor and the Germanes verie welcome; for besides that hee was a young gentlemen of verie comely personage, and exceeding bountifull, he entertained for those wars (besides the companie he brought with him) eight thousand Hungarian horsemen, of all others best acquainted with the Turkish wars.

The preparation of Charles the emperor against Solyman.

Strigonium beseged by King Iohn.

King Iohn vnderstanding, that the formost of Solymans great armie were come as far as Samandria in Seruia, thought it now a fit time to wring from king Ferdinand such townes as hee yet held in Hungarie; wherefore he sent Aloysius Grittus (whom Solyman had left as a helper for his estate) to besiege Strigonium, which is a citie of Hungarie scituat vpon the side of Danubius, about thirtie miles from Buda, the castle thereof was at that time holden with a strong garrison of king Ferdinands: whereunto for all that Grittus layed such hard siege both by the riuer and by land, that the defendants doubting how they should be able to hold out, especially if Solyman should take that in his way, as it was most like he would; sent for reliefe to Cazzianer, a warlike captaine then gouernor of Vienna, and General of all King Ferdinands forces: by whose appointment certaine small frigots were sent downe the riuer of Danubius, from Possonium, well manned; who suddenly setting vpon the Turks fleet (which so kept the riuer, that nothing could that way possibly be conueyed either in or out of the castle) should by their vnexpected comming open that way. But Grittus hauing intelligence thereof by certain Hungarians, which though they serued King Ferdinand, made no great account to flie somtime to the one part, somtime to the other, as best fitted their purpose; presently resolued to send his fleet vp the riuer, and by his sudden comming to oppresse his enemies, in like sort as they had thought to haue done him. And the more to encourage his soldiers, he promised great rewards to all such as should performe any extraordinarie piece of seruice in that action: and so hauing thorowly furnished all his fleet with good soldiers, but especially with Turkish archers, sent them vp the riuer to seeke their enemies: who fearing no such matter, as men surprised with the same mischiefe they had prepared for others, were at the first exceedingly dismayed; yet considering that they were reasonably wel prouided for their comming (although they yet wanted such helpe as Cazzianer had appointed to send them) they thought it a great shame to flie, and therefore putting themselues in order of battel, came down the riuer, & with great courage encountred their enemie. There began a fi ce & cruell fight, many being slain and

A aud wounded on both sides: but at last they of Possonium not able longer to endure the deadly shot of their enemies, and especially of the Turkish archers, (who with their arrowes sore gauled both the soldiers and the mariners) they turned their backs and fled: in which fight of sixtie frigots which came from Possonium, only thirteene escaped, with Corpranus the Generall, all the rest being either sunke in the fight, or else taken by the enemy, being run ashore and forsaken by the Possonians, trusting more vnto their legs by land, than their oares by water. Besides this losse of the Frigots, there was slain of the Possonians almost fiue hundred. After this victorie, Grittus hoping that they in the castle of Strigonium, dispairing now of reliefe, and fearing the comming of Solyman, would not long hold out, left off to batter or vndermine the castle, (wherewith he perceiued he little preuailed) purposing by lying still, and keeping them in the castle from all reliefe, to inforce them in time to forsake the place. Thus whilest
B the diuided Hungarians with their owne hands inconsiderately sought one anothers destruction, with the ruine of their countrie; Solyman the great enemie of all Christians was readie at their backs to deuoure both the one and the other, as in few yeares after he did.

Much about this time the old Spanish soldiers in Italie, drawne together by Vastius, as the Emperor had before commanded, were come to the Alpes. In this campe, of one sort of men and other, was aboue 20000, whereof almost the third part was not seruiceable: for the old soldiers enriched with the long wars in Italie, and the spoyle of the rich country of Lumbardie, wherein they had of late bin billited, brought with them all their old gotten spoyles and substance, not forgetting so much as their women, and whatsoeuer else serued their pleasure: for carriage whereof they drew after them a great multitude of carriages and vnnecessa-
C rie people, all which serued for no other vse but for the soldiers pleasure, and to consume victuals. Which their licentious wantonnesse Vastius desiring to reforme, gaue strait commandment thorow all the campe, That they should leau behind them all such vnnecessary bagage, and appointed what carriages should suffice for euery companie. Whereat the souldiers began at the first to murmure, and presently after to arise vp in mutinie: for many of the captains being rich, and disliking of that long and dangerous expedition, couertly incited the common soldiers to crie out vpon Vastius the Generall, for their pay alreadie due. Which thing once put into their heads, and the matter set on foot, quickly grew to that heat, that they all with one voice said flatly, That they would go no foot further before they had receiued their pay. Vastius although he well perceiued that tumult to be raised by some of his enemies, which D sought thereby to lighten his credit, was glad for all that for the present to dissemble the matter, & yeelding to the necessitie of the time, to content the mutinous soldiers with one months pay, promising them their full contentment, at such time as they should come vnto the emperor: and so when he had with much ado appeased that tumult, he set forward into Germany.

Mutinie among the Spanish soldiers.

Immediatly after the Spaniards followed the Italians, who with such cheerfulnesse offered themselues to that seruice, that euery captain brought with him twice so many in his companie as was expected: so that Vastius (who before doubtfull of their forwardnesse in so dangerous a war, especially in the aid of the Germans, of whom they had in the late wars receiued great harmes, had by great and earnest persuasions induced diuers of the nobilitie, and others of the better sort, to enter into that honourable action, in hope that they would draw after E them great numbers of their friends and tenants, as indeed they did) was now glad to send backe again many of the common soldiers, by reason of the multitude; and also to his great discredit, and the offence of many; full sore against his will to displace most part of those forward gentlemen, whom he had but a little before made captaines; who to their no small charge had gallantly furnished themselues according to their degrees and places: for the Emperor had then appointed what number of Italians he should bring; and also giuen commandement, That reiecting the rest, he should commit the leading of them onely to those old expert captaines, of whose valour and discretion he had before had good experience. There were Martius Columna, Petrus Maria Rubeus, Philippus Torniellus, Ioannes Baptista Castalius, Fabritius Maramaldus, Pyrrhus Stipcianus, and Camillus Columna, being all men of great worth, and F approoued faith towards the Emperor.

In these Italian companies were fourteen thousand select footmen, beside many other braue men who voluntarily resorted from diuers places to Vienna. After these footmen followed Ferdinand Gonzaga with two thousand horsemen, and certaine troups of Grecians and Spaniards, and with them came many noble gentlemen out of all parts of Italie, who had before G bin great commanders, but now serued as priuate gentlemen voluntarily without charge or pay; accounting it a great shame to tarrie at home as cowards, and not to be present in that religious war.

The Emperour also about the same time hauing taken view of his horsemen come out of the Low-countries most excellently appointed, and shipping his great ordnance, whereof hee had bought great store at Nurembergh, departed downe the riuer from Ratisbone to Lyntz.
The riuer of Danubius neuer carried so many vessels and soldiers since the time of the great Roman Emperors, as it did at that present: and yet besides them which went down the riuer by shipping, the pleasant bankes on both sides were filled with great companies of horsemen and footmen passing all alongst the riuer vnder their colours, with their drums and trumpets H sounding, which altogether made the most glorious shew that a man could well behold vpon earth.

1532. In the meane while, Solyman in six and fiftie days march come to Belgrade, thrust ouer the great riuer Sauus by bridges made in diuers places, an infinit number of his horsmen into Huntowards the rich countrie of Stiria, called in antient time Valeria, and now Stiermarke. By the way as he went he came to the little towne of Gunza, which one Nicholas Iurischitz (a man of an inuincible courage) kept with a small garrison of his owne. This towne standeth in a Plain not far from the citie of Sabaria, built square, and but of a small compasse, not verie strongly walled, a poore obscure thing, neuer famous till now by the great dishonour that the Turkish I Emperor Solyman there receiued. Abraham the chiefe Bassa (who so absolutely commanded among the Turks, as if Solyman had receiued him into the fellowship of the Empire with himselfe) was very desirous to saue this captain Nicholas, for that he knew him to be a man of great courage, and was familiarly acquainted with him at such time as he lay Embassadour at Constantinople: wherfore he attempted first by gentle persuasions and large offers, and afterwards Gunza besieged by the Turks. by most terrible threats, to induce him to yeeld the town to Solyman. But finding him so resolutely set downe, that he was neither by faire nor foule means, but only by force to be remoued out of his town; he inclosed the same round about with the huge armie of the Turkes, and by mines ouerthrew the walls in three places. Which sudden breach whilest the garison souldiers most valiantly defended against the furious assault of the Ianiziaries on the South K side of the towne, the Bassa planting his field pieces vpon the hils on the North side, did from thence grieuously annoy the defendants: who fiercely assailed by their enemies before, and beaten with the great ordnance behind, were grieuously distressed. Wherwith the worthy gouernor somwhat troubled, though not much discouraged, suddenly of timber and boords raised vp a curtaine twelue foot high, at the backs of his soldiers, wherewith they were so coue-red from the sight of their enemies, that they could not make any certain shot at them, but only at that curtaine at all aduentures, not doing any thing so great harme as before: and with desperat and restlesse labor, in despight of all the Turks great power, repaired the breaches, in as strong manner as at the first. In the meane time 200 of the Turks horsemen straggling from the campe, and seeking after bootie into the countrey as far as Neostat, were by the Hunga- L rian horsemen intercepted, and all slaine or taken; whose heads the Hungarians brought to Vienna, and the more to encourage the soldiers which daily repaired thither, in token of good lucke set them vp vpon stakes vpon the walls of the citie. Then was it certainly known of the

The huge armie of Solyman. prisoners, that Solyman had in his campe fiue hundred thousand men, and three hundred field pieces, which were not of greater bignesse but that a camell might well carrie one of them, being taken from the carriage: for why, Solyman purposing by destroying the countrey before him, to draw the Emperor vnto battell; had (as they said) brought no greater pieces of bat-terie with him. Which report of the prisoners was also confirmed by the Embassadours of king Ferdinand, whom Solyman gaue leaue to depart at Gunza, giuing to euery one of them a brother; wherein proudly vsurping the titles of many kingdomes, he most insolently wrot himselfe lord & soueraign of almost all countries and nations. But the effect therof was, That he was come into Hungarie, to reuenge the wrongs which they had done vnto King Iohn his friend and vassall; and would with fire and sword enter their countries, and by the power of God

A God and his great Prophet Mahomet, the fauourers of iust quarrels, giue them battell, if they durst meet him: wherfore if they would as valiant & couragious princes meet him in the field, he would in one battell end that quarrell with them, and in reward of the victorie either win or lose the empire of the World. When Solyman had thus a great while layen at the siege of Gunza, and thereto giuen diuers sharp assaults, being still with great losse and dishonor repulsed, he in the space of foure daies cast vp neere vnto the towne ditch two great mounts of faggots and earth, as if they had bin two great mountaines, of such height, that they ouertopped not the wals only, but euen the highest towers in the towne: (by which wonderfull worke the greatnesse of the Turks army might easily be coniectured:) one of these great mounts he cast vp directly against the face of the town, and the other at a corner of the same, to flankier along the wall; from whence he did with his shot not onely beat them which appeared vpon the wals for the defence therof, but them also which vpon occasion went too & fro in the streets.
These mounts being with incredible celeritie brought to perfection, the town ditch filled vp, and many of the defendants either slaine or wounded vpon the wals, the Turkes gaue a most furious assault at the place which was before shaken with the mine: against whom the valiant captain as need was in that extreame danger, opposed all the strength he had left. But the Turkes still pressing on with their infinit multitude, were got vp to the top of the walls with eight ensignes, from whence they had repulsed the defendants: which being all either wounded or wearied, shrouded themselues vnder the defence of their penthouses, being neither able nor of courage to make further resistance, so that the wals were now abandoned, & the town C there left without defendants: when suddenly such a great clamor was made by the loud out-cries and lamentation of the women and children and other fearefull people, that the Turkes which had recouered the top of the wals, stucken with a sudden feare, thinking the towne to haue bin full of souldiers, stood as men astonied & dismaid, whereupon the defendants began again to take courage, and to shew themselues: at whose sight the Turks possessed with a needlesse feare, forsooke the wal, & could not by any persuasions or threats of their captaines bee brought on againe to the assault. The town was that day in all mens iudgements defended by the mightie power of God, and not by the strength of man. It grieued the proud tyrant aboue measure, that so base a towne should so long hold out against all his power, so that oftentimes in his rage he would threaten to rase it down to the ground, & not to leaue any signe thereof D remaining: which he would vndoubtedly haue in time performed, had not Abraham the great Bassa (by whose counsell he was altogether directed) otherwise persuaded him: who waiting a fit time, when his choller was past, told him, that it was not worth his name & greatnes, to spend his time & forces vpon so smal a town of no importance, by rasing wherof he should neither get honor nor profit: for why, no man would maruell, if he with so puissant an armie should take so small a thing, especially by long siege, wherby the strongest places are inforced to yeeld; & when he had so taken it, it would be accounted a greater honor for so little a town to haue holden out so long, than for him to haue with so great forces in long time constrained it: but if it should otherwise fall out, as the chances of war are vncertaine, that hee should by any occasion be constrained to leaue it, he should thereby get no small dishonor: wherefore it E were more wisedome to spare his soldiers labor in so small a matter, wh erof he was not to expect either honour or profit, & for to reserue them for his greater designes, & not vainely to spend his forces & time in besieging of so base a village, from whence he might now depart with lesse dishonor than he could afterwards, when he had proued the vttermost of his forces, and yet in the end glad peraduenture to forsake it: wherfore it were more for his honour to raise his siege, & calling the Gouernor of the town vnto him, to giue him the town as it were of bounty, than to spend so many good men as he must needs cast away in the winning of it by force: with these & like reasons the Bassa preuailed so much with Solyman, that Nicholas the worthy gouernor of the town was by a herauld at arms sent for to come to the great Bassa, So-lyman disdaining (as it should seem) to speake with him himself. The gouernor being sent for, F though he was grieuously wounded, & in smal hope of life, yet stoutly refused to com to any parly, except he were first wel assured both by safe conduct & good hostages for the safety of his person, & that nothing should be exacted of him, not befitting his religion & honor: which stout answer caused Solyman & the Bassa to think, that his strength was not yet so weakned, but that he was still able to hold out the siege: and thereupon, that he required for his safetie was forthwith granted, and two men of great account sent for hostages for him into the citie with Solymans safe conduct. Which being receiued, the Gouernor went forth, and was by Abraham the great Bassa honoraby receiued into the campe, and commanded to sit downe by him in his tent: where he was by him first by the way of courtesie demanded, whether he had recouered his old infirmitie wherewith he was troubled at such time as he was sent embassador vnto Solyman at Constantinople? After that, whether the wounds he had receiued in the last assault, were dangerous or not? But last of all, & that which most concerned the matter, vpon what hope he alone had so long and so obstinatly withstood the mightie Sultan Solyman, when as all his neighbours round about him had so willingly submitted themselues? saying further, that he maruelled much why hee reposed any confidence in the lingring king Ferdinand. Whereunto the Gouernor modestly answered, That he was (thanks be to God) well deliuered of his old disease, and that his wounds were without danger: but as concerning his holding out, he said, that he for his great wisedome knew, that it was the duty of a good soldier valiantly to withstand his enemies, & not to be troubled with any euill hap, or discouraged with any chance of war: as for himselfe, he said, when mans helpe failed, he had reposed his full trust in God, by whose power he had bin hitherto preserued, which as he well hoped should neuer faile him at his need: and that king Ferdinand was not so far off, but that he would before it were long be there present with a great army: wherfore he did not greatly maruel, that he was not relieued before that time, forasmuch as many lets and occasions might chance which might hinder the kings purpose, considering that fortune always by nature vnconstant, was in nothing more like vnto her selfe in her vnconstancie, than in martiall affaires. The Bassa wondering at the inuincible courage of the Gouernor, said, That although the great Emperor Solyman might now at his pleasure vtterly destroy the towne, with all that therein was, yet being by nature of a most honorable and mild disposition, and a great louer of valiant and couragious men, had commanded him in his name to giue him that town, & the liues of all them that were in it, as a reward of his valour shewed in the defence thereof: yet so, that hee should sweare obedience vnto him, and receiue some few Turks into the towne, in token that he had yeelded the same. The politicke Gouernour knowing that of 800 valiant souldiers, hee had scarcely a third part left, and them also sore weakned with wounds and want of rest, thought it necessarie to make his peace in best sort hee could: for what could haue hapned vnto him more wishedly, than with his great honor to keep the town stil, & with the losse of a few pleasing words to deliuer himselfe, with so many of his friends, from extream feare and perill? and so in all his talke shewing no signe of feare, and with great words setting forth the strength of his garrison (which was indeed brought to an extreame weaknes) said he was ready at the first to haue yeelded vp the towne, for the old acquaintance he had with him at Constantinople, but was alwaies letted by the Germans and Spaniards which were there in garrison, fierce and cruell soldiers, whose hard hearts were (as he said) hardly intreated to suffer him at that time to come out of the citie into the campe: wherfore he could promise to be a friend to all such Turks as should passe that way, and to relieue them with such things as his wasted country could affoord; and further in token of his submission, to set vp one of Solymans enfignes in the chiefe tower of the city: but as for receiuing any Turks into garison, in token that he had yeelded vp the towne, he was willing so to do, but that he was greatly afraid they should bee euill intreated by the Germans & Spaniards, who deadly hated the Turks: whereof it was to be thought, that new wars would eftsoone arise. In conclusion, he so cunningly vsed the matter, that the great Bassa was contented with this small token of submission, that he should receiue in at one of the gates of the citie, one of Solymans captains with ten Ianizaries: which being don accordingly, & they courteously for a while entertained & again dismissed, the great Bassa held himselfe with that simple submission well contented: when as the Gouernor had neither German nor Spaniard as then in garrison. So when Solyman had with his great armie lien at the siege of Gunza by the space of 28 daies, and in that time to his great losse assaulted the same thirteene times, he rose with his army, glad of a little fained submission for the safegard of his honor: and leauing Vienna on the right hand, whither most part of the Christian armie was assembled, took the way on the left into Carinthia, and so came to the riuer Mura, and from thence to the citie Gratia. This turning of Solymans out of the way from Vienna, where he knew his enemies lay, put al fear out of the minds of the Christians, which they had before before not without cause conceiued, insomuch, that he but a little before feared as a prince of great pride and power, shamefully repulsed at the little town of Gunza, and now shunning his enemies at Vienna, began to grow into contempt as if he had beene running away for feare. Which disgrace the Turks sought by diuers excuses to couer, as that the strong citie of Neostat lay betwixt him & Viena, which could neither without much difficultie be taken, nor danger left enemy behind him: besides that, Winter began to approch, which caused him (as the Turkes gaue it out) to content himselfe with the spoile of the rich countries betwixt the riuers of Savus and Dranus, and so in good time to returne againe to Belgrade. But they which seemed to see farther into the matter, were of opinion, That Solyman vnderstanding by his espials, and secret aduertisement from his friends, that the Princes of Germanie had with one consent ioined their forces with the emperors, brought out of Italy, Spaine, and the low countries, which at his setting forth he least feared; and that the Christian army in number great, consisted not of raw souldiers, but for the most part of such as had been trained vp in warres, men both for courage and skill nothing inferiour to his Ianizaries and best men of war; chose rather to take the spoile of the countrey, as he might with safety, than to aduenture his person and state to the hazard of a most doubtfull and dangerous battell.

Cason sent with 15000 horsmen to spoile Austria

Whilest these things were in doing, Michael-Ogli by the commandement of Solyman, sent Cason with 15000 of his voluntarie horsemen (who in Solymans expedition against Vienna, had run thorow the countrey of Austria as far as Lyntz) charging him without stay to spoile all the country far and neere which lyeth between Danubius and the Alpes, thereby to learne what he could of the state and strength of the Emperours camp; and by doing all the harmes he could possibly, to leaue a most lamentable remembrance of the Turks being in Austria. Cason was of himselfe forward enough, and desirous of the spoile: but so much the more, for that he was by the former road into that countrey become both famous and rich: wherefore diuiding his horsemen into three companies not far distant one from another, hee suddenly oppressed an infinit multitude of all sorts of people in the fields and countrey villages as hee went; all which he either slew without mercie, or carried away as miserable prisoners. Thousands of men and women tied together in chains and ropes, were by the cruell Turks enforced to run as fast as their horses; the countrey villages were all burnt downe to the ground, and in them the poore children of the Christians, whose parents were either slaine or carried away captiues: so that al the country euery way almost for the space of 150 miles, was couered with smoke and fire, within three miles of Lyntz, where king Ferdinand then lying, was glad to get himselfe farther off to Strabinga, where his brother Charles the Emperor lay. This cruell Turke according to his charge, hauing with fire and sword without compassion wrought all the woe he could possible vpon the poore Christians, and now loded with the spoile of the country and multitude of prisoners, began to returne the same way he came, thinking to find Solyman either at the siege of Gunza, where he left him, or neerer hand at Neostat comming towards Vienna. But he as is aforesaid, rising with small honour from Gunza, and fearing the power of the Christians, was quite gone another way as far as Gratia, the Metropoliticall city of Stiria, standing vpon the riuer of Mura; which turned to the vtter destruction of Cason and all his followers: for as soone as it was perceiued by the burning of the countrey all about, that the Turks were come neere to Lyntz, the Christian captaines with their companies went out of the campe, some one way some another, as was thought most conuenient for the meeting with of these mischieuous Turkes, which neuer rested in one place: wherein they vsed such diligence in taking the passages, that it was not possible they should escape vnfought withall. Foure companies of Spanish and Italian horsemen vnder the leading of Lewis Coue a valiant captain, first lighting vpon them in a valley neere vnto Neostat, and desperately charging them, were by the Turks for most part slaine: But Cason perceiuing how he was on euery side laied by the Christians in the vallies betwixt Neostat, Sabaria, and Vesprinium, the night following with more than barbarous crueltie slew foure thousand of the Christians he had before taken prisoners, because hee should not be hindered by them in his flight; and diuiding his armie into two parts, about midnight began to set forward, vsing the benefit of the night to haue escaped from his enemies out of these vallies wherein he was enclosed. One part of this army led by Ferises taking the way Southward, did with incredible labor cut a way thorow the thicke and ouergrown woods (a thing thought altogether impossible) and so with little or no losse came to Solyman into Styria. Cason with the other part of the armie breaking out of the valley of Storamberg, chanced vpon the Palatine (Generall of the forces sent from the German Princes) who with ten thousand footmen and two thousand horsemen, and certaine field pieces brake the battell of the Turkes, and slew of them a great number: in which conflict Cason his chiefe ensigne was taken. He fighting most valiantly, in the rereward to giue others time to escape, was himselfe there slaine: whose gallant head-piece presented afterwards to the Emperour, confirmed the report of his death. They which escaped from the Palatine, in their flight fell into the hands of Lewis, and the Marquesse of Brandenburg, by whom they were slaine like beasts. The Hungarian horsemen led by Valentinus Turacus, lighting vpon them which fled from Lewis and the Marquesse, had the killing of them for the space of seuen miles; and of all others did vpon them the cruellest execution, following them hard at the heels with their swift horses, and fiercely insulting vpon them in their owne language. Those few dispersed Turks which escaped the fury of the Hungarians, fell into the hands of the countrey people about Vesprinium and the lake of Balaton, which came out on euery side in hope of spoile, who shewed them small fauour: so that of 8000 which were with Cason, it was thought not one returned to Solyman.

4000 Christian captiues murdred by Cason.

Cason discomfited by the Palatine, and slaine.

The slaughter of the Turkes.

The Emperour vnderstanding that Solyman was gone as farre as Gracia in Stiria, called his chiefe captains together into the castle of Lyntz, to know their opinions, whether it were best to follow the enemie into Stiria or not. The cities of Lyntz, Gracia, and Vienna, are scituat almost in forme of a triangle: but from Lyntz to Gracia is three good dayes journey of bad rough way by horse. Some said it was best to fight with the Turks in that vneuen mountaine countrey, where the Turks chiefe strength consisting in the multitude of his horsemen, should stand him in small stead, but should be inforced to trie the battell with his footmen, wherein he was inferiour to the Christians. This counsel although it had in it many difficulties, yet for that it proceeded from the most approoued captaines, so mooued the Emperour, that he presently sent Apontius a Spaniard (the most famous captaine Antonius Leua his lieutenant) to take view of that passage: who shortly after returned againe to Lyntz, bringing word that all the countrey as he went was desolat and for feare forsaken of the inhabitants, but concerning the place of the enemies abode, he could learne no certaintie. Whereupon it was by generall consent concluded, that they should all goe to Vienna, whither all the strength of the Germans was already assembled, there to take a general view of the armie, and to giue the enemie battell if he should againe returne. Some there were of great courage which openly disliked of that going to Vienna, saying, that the Emperour should rather in that distresse of the prouinces of Stiria and Carinthia pursue his enemie, than turne out of the way to Vienna. But others of greater judgement, whose opinion preuailed, said, It was one thing to inuade, and another thing to defend: so that the Emperour might with honor enough encampe himselfe in the fields of Vienna, and from thence to expect and deride the base expedition and vaine brags of his proud enemie, who a far off challenged him into the field, and then like a coward durst not come neere him.

Charles the emperour in his power at Vienna.

The Emperor comming to Vienna, and taking a generall view of the armie, found therein two hundred and sixtie thousand men, whereof 90000 footmen, and 30000 horsemen were accounted old expert souldiers, & of them many whole companies and bands, of such as had before bin Generals, Captains Lieutenants, Antients, or other officers and men of marke in other armies, and now were content to serue as priuat men. It was thought that so many worthy captains and valiant souldiers, were neuer before in the memorie of man assembled together into one camp: for the princes and free cities had not sent thither common souldiers, but their chosen and approued men, striuing as it were amongst themselues, who should send the best. All the flowre and strength of Germanie from the riuer of Vistula to the Rhene, & from the Ocean to the Alpes, was by the princes of the empire and free cities either sent thither, or of themselues voluntarily came thither. A thing neuer before heard of, that all Germanie should as it were with one consent, be glad to take vp arms for their cõmon safety, in defence of their honor and libertie; especially against people brought out of the furthest parts of Asia, Syria, and Ægypt. Beside the great number of Spaniards, Italians, and Burgundians; the Bohemian campe lay not farre off, strengthened with them of Silicia and Motauia. There were also some troupes of Polonian horsemen, not sent thither by publicke authoritie, but seruing as

as voluntary men: king Sigismund winking thereat, who as he was carefull not rashly to break the league he had made with Solyman; so lest he should seeme careless of the Christian common cause, by notable dissimulation left place for such of his subiects as would (as if it had bin without his knowledge) to shew their valour in the most honourable warre.

The Christian army ready to receiue the enemie, lay in a great field neere vnto Vienna, in this order: three great squadrons of pikemen, standing one squadron a great way distant from another, were so placed against the enemie with like and equall front, that all the horsemen diuided into two parts, might well bee receiued into the great spaces betwixt the three squadrons: for it was not thought conuenient to oppose so small a number of horsmen in open field without the footmen, against almost 300000 of the Turks horsemen. The right wing of the horsemen was led by the Emperor himselfe, and the left by king Ferdinand. Before and behind, and on euery side of the three squadrons of pikes, sauing in those places which were left open for the horsemen, about thirtie paces off, were placed twentie thousand nimble harquebusiers ranged in length, and but fiue in a ranke; so that whilest the first discharged, the second, and after them the third, and so the rest readily and orderly comming on, might without let deliuer their bullets vpon their enemies: neither was it thought any disaduantage to place them so thin, for that if they found themselues by the enemies oppressed, they might easily retire amongst the pikes, standing fast at hand. Before the harquebusiers was planted the great ordnance, whereof the Emperor had such store, and so well placed, that he could therewith (as with a most sure trench) haue compassed in his whole army. Only the Hungarians, men well acquainted with the manner of the Turks fight, chose to lie in the open field in two great wings, vnder the leading of their two valiant captaines Valentinus and Paulus. Many noble gentlemen beholding this goodly army, wept for ioy, conceiuing a most assured hope of victorie, if the proud enemy durst with all his forces ioine in battell. But Solyman, who by all means sought with his great number of horsemen to keep the wide and open fields, certainly aduertised both of the Emperors strength and the manner of his lying, got him ouer the riuer of Mura, and at Marpurge by bridges which he made on the sudden, passed ouer the great riuer Dranus. And so he which that Summer held almost all the world in suspence, with the doubtfull expectation of the successe of that war; hauing with all that his huge power wherewith he threatned the world, done nothing at all worth the remembrance, but was in euery place either ouercome, or els shamefully repulsed; left Stiria, and returned the same way hee came, directly betwixt the riuers of Sauus and Dranus, to Belgrade, and so to Constantinople; leauing here and there some remembrance of his barbarous crueltie, and stil looking behinde him if the Emperour were not at his heeles: at such time as a few Dalmatian and Croatian horsemen did still pursue the taile of his army. It is reported, that he carried away with him 30000 Christians into captiuitie, besides many thousands of poore countrey people slain by the mercilesse Turks; but especially by Cason and his followers: and so to his eternall infamy was twice in the space of a few years driuen out of Germanie. The Emperor vnderstanding of Solymans departure, determined with all speed to returne into Italie; although king Ferdinand his brother most earnestly intreated him before his departure, in so fit a time to imploy the great forces against king Iohn, who now as it were forsaken of Solyman, might eas... puissant an army haue bin thrust not only out of Buda, but also quite out of the king... Hungarie, wherein he was by Solyman as his vassall placed. But the Emperour, for that ... ter began now to approch, and the plague was got into the camp, yea euen into his ... tinued in his former purpose of departing into Italie: yet yeelding so far vnto ... request, as to leaue behind him all the Italians, who ioyned with king Ferdinand were thought sufficient for the accomplishment of the Hungarian warre.

or Leua were appointed for their Generall: and the common ſouldiers ſaid flatly, that they would aske leaue to depart, except they had three moneths pay, which they knew well they ſhould neuer get of that poore king, already brought vnto great wants. Vaſtius to appeaſe this mutinie, trauelled greatly with his ſoldiers, perſuading them to remember the faith of ſoldiers, and by their conſtant perſeuerance to maintaine the honour they had got by their cheerfull comming: telling them, That valiant ſouldiers neuer wanted pay, furniſhing themſelues by their victories with all things neceſſary from the enemy. And as for Maramaldus their Generall, they had no iuſt cauſe to miſlike him being an old captain of great experience, for courage and policie not inferior to any of the greateſt Commanders, and placed by the Emperors owne appointment as a man moſt ſufficient, whoſe judgement they ought not in any caſe to diſlike. When Vaſtius had with theſe and ſuch like reaſons well appeaſed the tumultuous ſouldiers, and was gone out of the camp into Vienna, to take further order for the remedying of all difficulties, night the nurſe of ſedition came on, whoſe darkneſſe excluding all modeſty and feare, gaue further ſcope and place vnto the mutinous ſouldiers inſolencie. By chance there was at that time brought out of the citie into the campe very courſe, hoarie, moulded bread, which ſome of the ſouldiers hauing brought, and thruſting it vpon the points of their ſpeares, ſhewed it vnto their fellowes in great choller, railing againſt king Ferdinand, which in his owne kingdome in the beginning of the war had made no better prouiſion, but with ſuch corrupt and peſtilent bread to feed them being ſtrangers, which were onely for his defence and quarrell to aduenture their liues. And but a little before, a certaine Spaniard, beeing but a common ſouldier, comming into the Generals tent, and caſting the like bread down at the feet of Vaſtius, bitterly curſing the Emperour and king Ferdinand, had raiſed a wonderfull tumult: wherefore the Italian ſouldiers flocking together out of their tents, gaue many hard ſpeeches concerning their pay, their victuals, and the difficulties of the Hungarian war. There one Titus Marconius of Volaterra, a man of a troubleſome ſpirit, but reaſonably well ſpoken, was by the other ſouldiers ſet vp vpon a great heap of ſaddles, that he might be the better heard, and by diuers ſeditious captains requeſted frankly to ſpeake his mind, ſo far as he thought concerned the ſafety and welfare of them all. Where it is reported that he ſpake vnto them in this ſeditious manner as followeth:

The ſeditious oration of Titus Marconius, to the mutinous Italians.

And ſhall the Spaniards (ſaid hee) beloued companions and fellowes in armes, as you haue heard, goe into Italie? and to our great hurt againe returne into their old Wintering places? and that which I am aſhamed to ſay, as notable gueſts lie with our wiues? and wee Italians as baniſhed men fight this Winter with yce and ſnow in Hungarie? and that forſooth for a moſt beggarly King, and him alſo to the Hungarians a forrener and meere ſtranger, againſt a naturall borne Prince, of his ſubiects well beloued and ſtrongly backt with the power and wealth of the Turkiſh Emperour? And that which might iuſtly grieue any couragious mind, vnder the conduct of Maramaldus, who oftentimes blinded with anger and haſtie crueltie, hath ſo furiouſly thruſt vs thorow with his ſword, that hee ſeemeth not more to deſire the name of a captaine for any thing, than for the killing and murthering of vs now his ſouldiers. Neither can I beleeue that you, who haue oftentimes beene captaines and antients your ſelues, will be ſo mad, as to ſerue vnder a common captaine, without hope of any pay, of any prouiſion, of victorie, or returne. Truely it delighteth me not ſo much to haue come hither for the honour of the Italian name (no more reckoned of than a ruſh) although I haue eleuen times ſerued; as it doth this day aſhame mee to ſee this ſhamefull end of the warre, ended before it was well begun. But in Regall dignities no ſhame, nor equitie in rewarding the ſouldier: for Kings now adayes make account of ſouldiers onely according to their neceſſitie; this is it alone that giueth vs pay, this is that getteth vs loue, this is it maintaineth our reputation: all which, peace once by victorie obtained, leeſe their grace. So fareth it with vs at this preſent (fellow ſouldiers) the Emperour and his brother king Ferdinand, deliuered from the feare of a moſt dangerous warre, to eaſe themſelues of this multitude of vs, ſeeke to thruſt vs into Hungarie as beaſts to the ſlaughter, by the ſpending of our blood hoping to purchaſe vnto themſelues victorie; and by the loſſe of vs to take no harme themſelues, though the Turks and Hungarians ſhould with ſword and famine vtterly deſtroy vs, ſhut vp with the yce of Danubius, and the ſnow of the Alpes. But peraduenture you vnderſtand not theſe deuiſes, no more than you vnderſtand what this terrible and bloudie comet, ſhooting his beames towards Italie, pretendeth. Verily it is not fatall either to* Solyman or Cæſar, but rather threateneth vnto vs death and deſtru- deſtruction; for they with like counſell full of ſafetie and diſcretion, would not open any way vnto their owne deſtinies, but warily withdrew themſelues one from the other, and ſhunned all the dangers of the field. Wherefore if it were lawfull for them, without any blemiſh of their Maieſties, ſo notably to prouide to keepe themſelues out of danger, when as on each ſide halfe the world lay as a reward of the victorie; ſhall not we looke to our ſelues, that we be not thruſt thither from whence appeareth no hope of returne, but with vtter deſtruction, when as we may do it without offence, and by good right, eſpecially ſeeing no pay is offered vs. Thus you ſee what a goodly end is made of this notable war, wherein only we the Italians, in ſtead of commendation and reward, reape iniurie and diſgrace: and are peraduenture of purpoſe exiled into Hungarie, that this floure of chualrie being drawne out of Italie, and ſent far out of the way, ſolonies of Spaniards and Germanes may be placed in our ſteads. Truly it ſeemeth hard dealing, to be ſent out of the way into a barbarous countrey, where we ſhall find all hoſtilitie, and no place of refuge to receiue vs, being diſtreſſed. Beſides this, we ſhall alſo whether we wil or no, feele how heauie and intollerable it will be both to our bodies and minds, to endure the miſeries of this Winter and dangerous war: and in the meane time, with no ſmall hearts griefe imagine what things our children, our brethren, our kinſmen, yea our wiues, ſuffer at home of the Spaniards and Germanes. Wherefore worthie companions, it concerneth vs more at this time to haue a good foreſight than valiantly to fight. The occaſion preſented vnto vs for our ſafety and welfare, ſtandeth vpon a tickle point, it muſt be done without delay, and we muſt hie vs hence before that the Spaniards truſſe vp their baggage; and ſo preuenting the emperors formoſt companies, come firſt our ſelues into Italie: for if we ſhall ſtay but a little to conſult vpon the matter, Vaſtius and our other proud commanders will preſently be here, the verie betrayers of the Italian bloud, who for their owne gaine and our miſchiefe, haue brought vs into theſe ſtraits; who I know will moſt earneſtly entreat vs, and with many ſubtilties ſeeke to ſeduce vs, by offering vs great pay, and whatſoeuer elſe we ſhall require; which will all proone but words. But you, if you be men, refuſe to talke with them, as with your common enemies, or rather in reuenge of their old iniuries kill them. Here wanteth not in this aſſemblie valiant men, for courage and integritie of life their betters far, which can leade you forth, order your battell, and fortunatly vſe this your courage and forwardneſſe. Wherefore if you be wiſe, ſet forward reſolutely, and good fortune no doubt will attend you in your haſt; for the full accompliſhment of your deſire conſiſteth in your haſt onely.

Marconius had no ſooner made an end of this mutinous ſpeech, but the tumultuous ſouldiers in euery band began highly to commend and approoue the ſame, and by and by ſuch a confuſed noyſe was heard through all the aſſemblie, as vſeth to riſe amongſt the diſcontented vulgar people, readie to riſe in armes: but the drums preſently ſtriking vp a march, they made no longer ſtay, but without delay plucket vp their enſignes, and forward they goe directly towards Neoſtat. In this tumult, inſtead of their old captaines, which either were not then preſent, or refuſed to go with them, they choſe others to be their Leaders: who once named by the ſeditious multitude, might in no caſe without danger refuſe to take the charge vpon them, were they neuer ſo vnwilling. Theſe were Montebellius, Nerius, Melcarius, Sanctius, and the two twins of Millan, called Gluſſani: who drew after them eight thouſand ſouldiers; the reſt partly for ſhame, and partly for feare, ſtayed ſtill with Maramaldus their new appointed General. When they were thus gone, Vaſtius and diuers other great companies hearing thereof in the citie, poſted after them ſix miles, and at length ouertaking them, requeſted them to ſtay, and not to diſhonour themſelues with ſo foule a fact; telling them that their pay was readie for them; and omitting nothing wherewith they might haue bin moued to ſtay, mingled their prayers with grieuous threats: but they reſolutely ſet downe, would neither heare nor ſtay; but as men inraged with furie and their owne guiltie conſcience, with ſterne looks diſcharged ſome ſmall ſhot vpon them. Whileſt Vaſtius would there haue ſtayed the companie, and did what he poſſibly could by threatning and otherwiſe, to haue terrified their leaders, and to haue brought them backe, he was oftentimes in danger to haue bin ſlaine. In the end hee was glad to forſake them, and to returne as he came. King Ferdinand by this ſudden departure of the Italians, for that time diſappointed of all his hope of recouering the kingdome of Hungarie from king Iohn; in great choller wrot vnto his ſubiects of Styria and Caryathia, whereby the Italians were to paſſe, That they ſhould ſhew them no manner of curteſie in their paſſage: whereupon inſued great hurt on both ſides. Yet for all that, theſe Italians in deſpight of what could be done, at length recouered Tiliauentum in the borders of Italie, where they diſbanded themselues, and returned euerie man to his owne dwelling, leauing King Ferdinand vnto his owne forces. The Emperour also breaking vp his armie at Vienna, and purposing now as before, to returne into Italie, appointed Ferdinand Gonzaga to go formost with the light horsemen, with whom also he went himselfe: after him followed Vastius with the Spaniards; two dayes after came the Cardinall, whose traine was of all the greatest: last of all followed the mercinarie Germanes: in which order he returned in safetie into Italie.

Charles the emperor returneth into Italy.

This was the end of those wonderfull preparations made by the two great monarchs Solyman and Charles the fift, in the yeare 1532, which held the world in great suspence with the fearefull expectation of some maruelous alteration; and so much the more, for that at the same time appeared a great blazing star by the space of fifteene dayes. All which for all that, God so appointing, sorted to far lesse harme than was of most men feared.

Auria goeth against the Turks.

Now whilest Charles the Emperour was thus in armes against Solyman in Austria, Andreas Auria by his appointment, with a fleet of thirty fiue tall ships and fortie eight gallies, wherein he had embarked twentie fiue thousand good souldiers well appointed, did in the meane time wonderfully annoy the Turks in Peloponesus. With this fleet Auria departing from Messana in Sicilia, and passing alongst the coast of Italie, into the Ionian, neere vnto the Isle of Zacynthus met with Vincentius Capellius the Venetian Admirall, with a fleet of sixtie gallies set forth by the Venetians for defence of their Territorie: who offered vnto Auria all possible kindenesse, but excused himselfe, that he could not joyne with him in that war against the common enemie, by reason of an old league betwixt the Turks and the Venetians, which Solyman had but a little before renewed. So that at that time the Venetians stood as men indifferent betwixt Charles the Emperour and Solyman, offering like kindenesse to both, but taking part with neither, yet in readinesse to fall out with either, if they should by sea or land offer any iniurie to their State: wherein they bare themselues so indifferent, that it was thought, that they at one and the selfe same instant aduertised Auria, That Hymerales the Turkes Admirall lay with his fleet of sixtie Gallies euill appointed, in the Bay of Ambracia, where hee might easily be surprised; and gaue likewise warning to him of the comming of Auria with a strong fleet, wishing him in time to prouide for his better safetie, by retyring his fleet into some other place of more assurance: which he presently did; for knowing himself too weak, hee departed from Ambracia, to the strong hauen of Calcide. Which thing with other like, well considered, might giue iust cause to any Christian heart, to bewaile the state of that time, wherein the Christian Princes being either in mortall wars amongst themselues, or intangled by Solyman with leagues of no assurance, omitted the fairest opportunitie that could haue been wished for the abating of the Turks greatnesse: for if the Venetians joyning their forces with Auria, had in time pursued the Turkish Admirall, it was like, that not onely all Solymans power at sea had bin vtterly discomfited; but also most part of Grecia, mindfull of their antient empire and libertie, and then readie to haue rebelled, and joyned hands with the Christians, might haue been recouered out of the Turkish thraldome; yea and the Imperiall city of Constantinople greatly indangered, few or none being left for the defence thereof, beside yong Ianizaries and effœminate Eunuchs, the heartlesse keepers of the Turkes Concubines; Solyman himselfe being then far off in Hungarie, and hauing drawne with him the greatest strength of his Empire.

Auria taking his leaue of the Venetian Admirall, with much honour done at sea on both sides; was shortly after aduertised, That the Turks Admirall was fled to Calcide. Wherefore now out of hope to do any good against him, he directed his course to Corone (which is a strong citie vpon the coast of Peloponesus, about twelue miles distant from Modon) with purpose to besiege it: which when he had well viewed, and considered of the strength thereof, he laid siege thereto both by sea and land, battering it most terribly at one time with fourteen great pieces of artillerie by land, and a hundred and fiftie by sea, so that a more terrible batterie had not beene lightly heard of: for all that, the Turks valiantly stood vpon their defence, and manfully repulsed the Italians, which vnder the leading of the Countie of Sarne assaulted the citie by land. The Turkish garrisons lying about in the countrey of Peloponesus, did what they might to haue relieued the citie; who by the valour of the said Countie were discomfited, and Zadares their chiefe leader slaine: whose head, with others of the slain Turks, were set vpon stakes, to the terror of the defendants.

Auria besiegeth Corone in Peloponesus.

A At length the Turks wearied with assaults, and terrified with the thundring shot which neuer ceased, and driuen also from their greatest strength towards sea, by the desperate assault of certaine resolute Christians, whom they had now full sore against their wills receiued as it were into their bosomes; fearing also to want victuall and pouder, if they should longer hold out without any hope of relief, yeelded the citie and castle to Auria, vpon condition that they might in safetie depart thence with bag and baggage. Corone thus taken, and a strong garrison of Spaniards there placed, and the Christian Greeks which dwelt in the citie sworn vnto them, Auria put to sea with his fleet, and sailing againe by Zazinthus, came to Patras another antient citie of Peloponesus, which he easily tooke and ransacked: for the Turks distrusting the strength of the Citie, had strongly intrenched themselues neere vnto the Castle; which B place also, together with the castle, they in short time yeelded to Auria; couenanting, that they, & especially their wiues, might with their garments only depart in safetie into Ætolia: which was by Auria so precisely performed, that when three thousand of them passed along through the armie of the Christians, ranged on both sides, and some of the souldiers began rudely to handle some of the women, and to take from them some of their jewels, he caused them presently, to the terror of others, to be hanged. Auria leauing his armie at Patras, with commandment to follow him by land, sailed alongst the coast of Peloponesus, vntill he came to the strait of Naupactum, now called Lepanto, which is the entrance into the gulfe of Corinthia, parting Peloponesus from Ætolia, with a strait somewhat narrower than the strait of C Hellespont. Vpon this strait stood two castles, the one called Rhium, vpon the coast of Peloponesus, and the other Molycreum in Ætolia, which Baiazet had wonderfully fortified, and stored with ordnance for the keeping of that strait. Auria threatning all extremitie vnto the captaine of the castle on Peloponesus side, if he did enforce him to plant his batterie, so terrified him, that he without delay yeelded vnto him the castle; couenanting onely, That he and his soldiers might in safetie depart thence: which granted, and the Turks departed, Auria gaue the spoile of the castle vnto his soldiers which came with him by sea: whereby he so offended the mindes of the other souldiers which came by land from Patras, that they were about to haue forsaken him. The other castle vpon Ætolia side was not so easily taken, being valiantly defended by a garrison of old Ianizaries, appointed for the keeping thereof. Yet in D the end by furie of the ordnance a breach was made, wherby the Christians forcibly entring, slew three hundred of the old garrison souldiers, not taking any one to mercie: the rest fled into a strong tower in the midst of the castle, where seeing no remedie but that they must needs fall into the hands of their enemies, they desperatly blew vp themselues, and the tower, with a great part of the castle, with gunpouder, in such sort, that it seemed all the sea coast to haue bin shaken with an earthquake; and the gallies which lay a bow shoot off, were almost ouerwhelmed with stones blown out so far off. The great ordinance taken in this castle was valued at 70000 duckats; whereof certaine pieces of a wonderfull greatnesse, with Arabian letters written vpon them, were afterwards by Auria brought to Genoa; and in remembrance of the victorie, mounted vpon the bulwarke at the mouth of the hauen. All these things thus E happily atchieued, Auria strongly fortified the citie of Corone, storing it both with munition and plentie of victuall, committing the defence thereof to Mendoza a valiant Spaniard, with a strong garrison of Spaniards; promising of his owne charge to relieue him whensoeuer he should need, if the Emperor should defer to do it. The strait of Naupactum laid open, Sanutus with the gallies of Malta scoured all alongst the gulfe of Corinth, doing great harme vnto the Turks which dwelt on both sides of the gulfe, spoyling and terrifying them euen as far as Corinth. Not long after, Winter now approching, Auria receiuing letters from the Emperor, of Solymans departure out of Hungarie, returned with his fleet loaded with the spoile of the Turks, to Naples, and so from thence home to Genoa.

Corone yeelded to Auria by the Turks.

In the beginning of the Spring following (which was the yere 1533) it was stilly reported F that the Turks were comming with a great fleet toward Peloponesus: and not one [illegible] doza gouernor of Corone, by letters aduertised Peter of Toledo, Vizroy of Naples, was both by sea and land hardly besieged by the Turks; and that he would not of his power valiantly defend the citie, so long as he had any prouision [illegible] he most earnestly requested, That if the Emperour would haue the [illegible] in time send him reliefe, whereupon the oppressed Grecians taking [illegible] to rebell, and to helpe to expulse the Turks quite out of Peloponesus. But aboue all things he forgot not to craue speedie aid of Auria, and to put him in minde of the faithfull promise he had made to relieue him at his need. Vpon this newes, Charles the Emperor commanded Auria his Admirall, to rig vp a conuenient fleet for that seruice, promising forthwith to send vnto him twelue gallies, which he had new built in Spaine. Hee also requested the Knights of Malta to aid him with their gallies against that common enemie. Wherefore Auria hauing with wonderfull celeritie rigged vp thirtie tall ships, and as many gallies, came to Naples to take in his soldiers: there the old garrisons of the Spaniards which for want of pay were risen in mutinie against the great commander and Generall Vastius and the Viceroy, and had risled the citie of Auersa, and done no little harme all about in the countrey of Campania, were again pacified by a pay giuen vnto them, and presently embarked for Corone, vnder the command of Rodericus Mancaius their General; at which time also Fredericke of Toledo the Viceroy's son, with a companie of braue gentlemen went aboord, vowing vnto the sacred war that their first seruice. The knights of Malta came thither also with their gallies. But whilst these things were a doing, Auria to incourage them of Corone, for feare lest they dispairing of help, should fall to some hard composition with the Turkes; sent Christopher Palauicine a resolute yong gentleman of an inuincible courage, with a most swift gallie to Corone: who by day-light passing through the midst of the Turks fleet, safely recouered the hauen, to the great joy of the besieged Christians: and shortly after when he had well viewed all things he was sent for, with the strength and manner of the enemies lying, and filled the minds of the defendants with assured hope of speedie rescue; about noon time of the day he suddenly brake out again through the midst of his enemies, and as it were miraculously escaped in safetie, for all that they could do, although they ceased not to giue him chace so long as they were in any hope to haue ouertaken him. Auria departing from Naples, came to Messana, where he certainly informed of the enemies force both by sea and land, with the number of their gallies, and seeing that the chiefe hope of relieuing of the citie consisted in celeritie, staied not for the gallies he expected out of Spaine, but held on his course towards Grecia: for it was told him, that the enemies fleet dayly increased, by the comming in of the Turkish pirats; and that Assem-Beg (otherwise called the Moore of Alexandria, an arch pirat) was still looked for, in whose good directions the Turkish captaines reposed the greatest hope of their victorie. When he was come as far as Zazynthus, he was informed by the Venetians, That Lustibeius Bassa (or rather Lutzis Bassa the Turks great Admirall, and Solymans brother in law) with Solyman of Acarnania, and the Moore (men for their skil at sea, of great fame and reputation) lay before Corone, with 80 gallies manned with diuers companies of the old Ianizaries; so that it was thought a matter of exceeding perill for him to aduenture to relieue the town, except he tooke the aduantage of some prosperous gale of winde. Wherefore Auria to haue yet more certain knowledge of the enemies fleet, sent before him Christopher Palauicine with one gallie, again to view the manner of the enemies lying: who passing the promontorie of Acrites, saw all the Turkes great fleet lying in verie good order before the citie: and so returned to Auria, confirming that the Venetians had before reported, and that the Turks fleet was greatly increased, & lay readie as it should seem to giue him battell as soon as he should approch the citie. For all that, Auria nothing dismaid with the greatnesse of the Turks fleet, made no stay, but stil kept on his course, and with a faire gale of winde passing the promontorie of Acrytes, came directly towards Corone. Two great gallions, of all the fleet the most warrelike shippes, came formost; whereof the one was Auria's own, which he had built with a wonderfull charge; and the other was of Sicilia. These two great ships were appointed by Auria to turne a little vpon the left hand; and at such time as the enemie should set forward from the shore, to cast anchor betwixt both the fleets; that as occasion should serue, they might as out of two strong Castles, beat the Turks gallies with their great ordnance, wherewith they were for that purpose wonderfully stored. Next vnto these great gallions followed the other warlike ships with ful sails: after whom came the gallies in three squadrons, whereof Saluiatus had the leading of the right wing, which consisted of the Bishop of Rome's gallies & them of Malta: in the left wing and neere vnto the enemie, commanded Antonius Auria: and in the middle was Auria himselfe. At the first sight of the Christian fleet, the Turks moued not from the shore, but discharged their ordnance at them afar off, and then begun to set forward and to draw neerer; especially the

the Moore, who with greater courage than the rest, assailed the side and rereward of the fleet: for the Christians keeping on their course right forth to Corone, and turning nothing to the left hand, as was before appointed, seemed as if they had fled; and so much the more, for that the gallies in the right wing, for feare of the Turkes great ordnance, did fet a great compasse farther off into the sea, and many of the middle squadron and of the left wing also, had disorderly thrust themselues in amongst the ships, although they had receiued little or no harme of the enemies great shot.

The christian fleet disordred.

In this confusion of the Christian Nauie, the Moore requested Lutzis the Admirall, not to let slip so faire an occasion, wherein the Christian fleet might easily haue bin ouerthrowne: but whilest Lutzis doth slowly and considerately set forward, Auria in the meane time had put his fleet again in order, and with a faire wind was come to Corone. Two of the ships by the way falling foule one on another, staid behind, being not able to keep way with the rest: about which all the Turks gallies presently flockt, and tooke the lesser of them, killing all the Spaniards they found therein. Out of this they boorded the greater, and with a bloudie fight had won the forecastle & wast of the ship: when Auria, accounting it no smal dishonor to haue his ships so surprised at his heeles, caused all his gallies to turne againe vpon the enemie, to rescue those ships. The Turks seeing that, and with the Westernly wind by little and little fallen down so far with the ships, that they were come within the danger of the shot of the town, began with great stir to forsake the ships, and to betake themselues to their oares, and so in manner of flight withdrew themselues. Whom Auria pursued a good way to Modon, thundring in their poupes with his great shot, which he liberally bestowed amongst them: whilest in the mean time Antonius Auria came to rescue the two distressed ships. There the Spaniards which but a little before had hardly maintained their close fights, began now as men reuiued, to shew themselues, and couragiously to make resistance: and they which came with Antonius Auria to their rescue, entring with wonderful celeritie on euery side, slew and tooke 300 Ianizaries, which with great courage had entred those ships, and were there left by the sudden departure of their fellows. Amongst whom was taken one Iosuphus an old captain of 1000 Ianizaries; to whom Auria after he was come to Corone, gaue a faire suit of apparell & a chain of gold, and so set him at libertie without any ransome; thereby to prouoke the Turks to the like kind of curteous dealing with the Christians. Assam-beg the pyrat, and the other captaines of the Turks fleet, wonderfully blamed Lutzis the Admirall, for that he would not then fight with the Christians, when as he was thereto most earnestly requested both by the Captains and soldiers in generall, and had a faire opportunitie of victorie offered at such time as the Christians fleet was disordred: but he excused himselfe, saying, That it was giuen him in speciall charge from Solyman the Emperor, That he should in any case respect the safetie of his nauie, and not to come to the hazard of a battell. The Turks which besieged the citie by land, vpon the approch of the Christian fleet, forsooke their trenches and fled: at which time Mendoza the gouernor sallying out, tooke great store of victuall and warlike prouision which the Turks had for hast left behind them. So Auria to his great honor hauing driuen the Turks from Corone both by sea and land, furnished the citie with store of corne, wine, victuall, pouder, and shot; and committed the defence thereof to Maticaus and the companies of the mutinous Spaniards which he had brought from Naples: comforting the Grecks, and exhorting them, patiently for a while to endure those calamities of war; telling them that the Emperor would the next Spring make war against the Turks both by sea and land in Peloponesus, and free them from the Turkish bondage. And so imbarking the old garrison of Spaniards, departed from Corone, and came before Modon, where he lay as it were brauing the Turks Admirall, hoping thereby to draw him out of that strong harbor to battell. But when [illegible] the enemie could by no meanes be allured out of his strength, or assailed as he lay, [illegible] departed thence to Corcyra, and so backe againe to Messana in Sicilia.

thousand other Turks: of all them that was taken, there was scarcely one saued, but the Moore himselfe, who grieuously wounded in the face, for safegard of his life was glad to discouer himselfe: for the Venetians maintaining their state by trade & traffique, do of all other shew lest fauor vnto pyrats. When the Moore had made himselfe knowne vnto Canalis, there was great care taken for the curing of his wounds, and either of them began with notable dissimulation to excuse the matter to other; saying, That they were both deceiued by the likenesse of the gallies, & mistaking of their friends for enemies: when as for all that, they knew one another right well. For the Moore said, that he tooke those Venetian gallies for to haue bin part of Auria his fleet: and Canalis excused himselfe, by saying, that he mistooke him for Barbarussa, who a few yeares before had surprised three of the Venetian gallies. Yet the Venetians doubting how Solyman would take the matter, by their embassador sought to excuse what was done, as a thing happening by errour and mischance: of which excuse Solyman accepted, and said moreouer, that Canalis had done wel and souldier like, to repulse by force the wrong that was offered him. Three of the emperors gallies staying behind the rest of the fleet, were driuen vnto the promontorie Palinurus, vpon the coast of Apulia, intercepted and carried away by Sinam, surnamed the few, a notable pyrat of that time also.

The Winter following, the Spaniards and Greeks in Corone began to want victuals, especially wine and flesh: for the Turks had so blocked vp the city, that nothing was to be had out of the countrey; wherefore the souldiers requested Macicaus their Gouernour and Generall, to lead them forth to some piece of seruice against the enemie, forsomuch as they were not to hope for any relief elswhere before April, wishing rather valiantly to die like men in fight against the Turks, than to languish within those dead wals for want of victuall. But Macicaus mind full of his charge, fought by many reasons to dissuade them from such purpose, shewing them what an offence it were rashly to depart out of the city committed to their custody, which might be vnto them dangerous, although they should speed neuer so wel; & that those wants which they rather feared than felt, would well enough be ouercome by sparing and patience: and therefore told them plainly, that he was resolutely set downe to keep the city for the Emperor, and so indure all hardnes, rather than to incurre the infamie, That he had forsaken the citie, and betraid his garrison. Yet for all this, the matter was so vrged by Didacus Touarres and Hermosilla, both great captains, and by the generall importunitie of the soldiers, that Macicaus was inforced to yeeld to their desire, and to promise them to goe: yet earnestly protesting, that he did it altogether against his will, rather inforced than persuaded vnto that, whereof he had no great hope of successe. Among other that were so forward in this action, was one Barbatius, a most valiant Greeke, who could perfectly speake the Turks language, and of all others best knew the by-waies and secret passages of the countrie: he vndertooke to bee their guide, and by vnknown waies to bring them vnto the enemies vndiscouered in the dead time of the night, when as they feared no such matter. So Macicaus commending the custodie of the citie to Liscanius and Mendosius, with charge that they should suffer no man to goe out of the city after his departure, for feare of giuing any knowledge vnto the enemy, set forward about ten a clocke in the night towards Andrussa, Barbatius being his guide, who shunning the common beaten waies, brought them by secret and vncouth paths that night halfe the way to Andrussa: but vpon the rising of the Sun he brought them into a secret woody valley, where they rested and refreshed themselues all that day, and setting forward againe at night, came to Andrussa before day. In this towne, which was of no great strength, lay one Caranus, a warlike captaine with three thousand footmen, whereof the one halfe was of the Ianizaries; and in the suburbes lay Acomates, with a thousand chosen horsemen, with which garrison the Turks kept all that side of Peloponnesus in awe. Macicaus brought by his guide vnto the place where his enemies lay, went directly to the towne to haue surprised it: Hermosilla in the meane time standing still with certain companies of Spaniards ouer against the place where the horsemen lay. But this could not be don with so great silence, but that some of the horseboies being awake, discouered them by the fire in their matches; who first awaked the negligent watchmen, and afterwards raised an alarme in the suburbs: whereupon Hermosilla couragiously set vpon the horsemen, beeing altogether vnready, and slew many of them before they could arme themselues, and set fire also vpon the stables, wherein the Turks horses stood, with the rage whereof many of the Turkes scuffled, with their horses and armour. Great and terrible was the noise

A noise raised vpon the sudden in the suburbs, but especially of the horses, which burnt as they stood fast tied in the stables, or by chance breaking loose, ran vp and downe with their tayles and maines on a light fire; by occasion whereof, an alarum was raised in the towne, and the Turks to got the wals before the Spaniards could enter. Macicaus himself laboring to break in at a posterne, was shot in the head with a small shot, and slaine: diuers others neere vnto him were there slaine also. The Turks perceiuing the small number of their enemies, sallied out vpon them, and enforced them to retire to Hermosilla, who had alreadie made great spoile amongst the horsemen, by whose skilful direction, the Spaniards retired in so good order, making many stands, with their harquebusiers all drawn into the rereward, that such of the Turks as were most forward to pursue them, did by their death cause the rest to make lesse hast. Macicaus slain

B Acomates with such of his horsemen as had escaped the fire, hasted thither also, bringing with him two hundred harquebusiers, which he had caused his horsemen for hast to take vp behinde them vpon their horses: but whilest he sought eagerly to be reuenged vpon his enemies, and with too much heat pressed on with the formost, he was shot into the bodie with a bullet and slain. The horsmen which had before receiued a great losse as they lay in their lodgings, accounting it in their good haps that they were not there all slaine, and hauing now lost their captain, ceased any further to pursue their enemies, but returned. The Spaniards and Greekes, although they were wearied both with their long march and euill successe, retired still as resolute men, ready to fight, and so returned to Corone. Presently after, the Turkish garrison remoued from Andrussa to Megalopolis, now called Londarium: after whose departure the

C Christian souldiers of Corone came thither and buried the dead bodies of their slaine fellows (which till then lay vnburied) and brought backe with them the head of Macicaus their late General, which the Turks had there set vp vpon a long pole, which they honorably buried at Corone. Not long after, the plague began to grow hot in Coron, so much the more grieuous, for that it came accompanied with many other hard difficulties. For which causes, the Spaniards as men at once inforced with many extremities, imbarked themselues with all the great ordnance, and such Greekes as would go with them, in certaine ships which came with corne out of Sicilia, and so departed, leauing the towne emptie for the Turks to come vnto. Corone forsaken by the Spaniards.

It was commonly reported, that the Spaniards left Corone not without the secret consent of the Emperor, which was the rather thought to be so, because that they which forsook the

D place, receiued thereby no disgrace, and the Emperor himselfe had offered to giue the towne to Clement Bishop of Rome, the Venetians and the knights of Malta, who all refused to receiue it, as loath to be at so great a charge in keeping a place seruing for no greater purpose; the very cause why the emperor was so willing to part with it. Now Clement the great Bishop had by meanes of Aloysius Grittus made a motion of a peace, to haue bin concluded for ten yeres betwixt Solyman and the Christian princes, and thereupon the towne to haue been againe deliuered vnto the Turkes: which peace Solyman was not altogether vnwilling to grant, beeing then wholly bent to inuade the Persian king. Ferdinand was also in good hope that his brother Charles the Emperour, would for the yeelding vp of that towne haue couenanted with the Turke some great matter for his benefit in Hungarie, which as was thought would also haue

E been easily obtained. But whilest the Emperor drawne diuersly with the consideration of his honour in keeping it, and of his profit in giuing it vp, stood too long in resoluing, the towne in the meane time was by the Spaniards (their necessitie daily increasing) abandoned, and so left to the Turks for nothing.

Solyman now purposing to turne his forces against the Persians, of whom he had in the frontiers of his dominions receiued great hurt, especiellly in Comagene, renewed the league hee had with the Venetians, and some other Christian princes: but of all other his affaires with the Christians, he was most carefull of the interest he had already gotten in Hungarie. For it was reported, that king Iohn his vassall induced by the continuall solicitations of his subiects, was desirous of peace with king Ferdinand, vpon condition that hee might quietly enioy the

F kingdome during his life: and after his decease it to remaine to king Ferdinand and his heires. Wherfore Solyman, that nothing should be there done in his absence without his knowledge, sent Aloysius Grittus the Duke of Venice his son (of whom we haue before spoken (a man both for the honour of his house, the good carriage of himselfe, and the speciall commendation of Abraham the chiefe Bassa, in great credit with him: with commission as his Lieutenant to bee assistant assistant vnto king Iohn, in such magnificall sort, as that without him the king might conclude nothing in matters of state, concerning either peace or warres, with any other the Christian princes. With this proud commission from the grand Seignior, Grittus entred into Transylvania, then a part of the kingdome of Hungarie (much about the same time that Solyman set forward from Constantinople against the Persian) attended vpon with seuen thousand persons of one sort and other, among whom were Vrbanus Batianus, and Ianus Docia, two famous Hungarian captains with their companies, and many of the Turks Ianizaries also. At his first comming, to make his authority the more known, he sent out his proud command vnto the great men and Gouernors of the cities of that warlike prouince, charging them forthwith to repaire vnto him as great Solymans deputie, authorised by him to heare and determine all the controuersies and matters of state concerning the kingdome of Hungarie. At that time Americus Cihachus Bishop of Veradium, a man of great nobilitie and power, withall singularly well qualitied, was Vayuod or Gouernor of Transyluania, an honor next vnto the king: he vnderstanding that Grittus was come into his prouince, and making small hast to welcome him, as one not greatly mooued with his comming, or much regarding the commandement of Solyman, wonderfully offended Grittus, who desired nothing more than at his first enterance to haue confirmed the opinion of his authoritie in the minds of the vulgar people by the prest and ready attendance of the Vayuod. But it was commonly bruted, that the stout Bishop vpon a Christian zeale detested the friendship of the Turkes, and could not well brooke that they should be too much acquainted in his prouince, for feare lest that fruitfull country abounding with men and horses; should by one means or other fall into their hands. Grittus was come to Baxouia when hee vnderstood by many messengers, that the Vayuod was comming with a great traine, and lay about ten miles off, encamped with diuers gallant troups of horsemen, in warlike manner appointed: for the Bishops of Hungarie being wonderfull rich, were by old custome bound to keepe great numbers of horsemen, which as occasion serued they vsed to bring into the field against the Turke; accounting it great honor with their religious hands to defend the cause of religion. But then especially the nobility of the country wel appointed resorted on euery side, on courtesie to honour and countenance their great Bishop and gouernor, at whose commandement they were: insomuch as the Bishops retinue made shew of a good army. Which thing moued Grittus exceedingly, that he should be enforced contrary to his expectation to parley with the Bishop in the open fields, as with an enemie in sight of all their followers. Hereof rose enuie, a deadly mischiefe alwaies repining at another mans honor; when as the one swelling with Turkish pride could not then abide any equall, & the other iealous of his honor, could by no means indure any superior, in such place as he had the soueraignty of. When these two great men had met together in the open fields, and there dined more like enemies than friends, without any shew of friendship or good will: Grittus inwardly chafing at his bare entertainment, couertly threatned to be reuenged vpon al such as should make so light account of his authoritie: and immediatly as he departed from the banket, taking his cap from his head (which was after the Turkish manner made of a high fashion, of rich Sables) and opening it with both his hands, said, This cap wil not hold two heads, and therefore it must be fitted to one, and so put it on againe. Ianus Docia one of the Hungarian captains, his followers, who deadly hated the Vayuod (for that he had long time before, for his malapert speech in a great assembly, giuen him a blow with his fist) tooke hold of that speech of Grittus, as a fit occasion for him to worke his reuenge: and said, Your honor maketh a fit comparison, neither can this prouince containe two equall gouernors or commanders, nor you euer enioy your power and authoritie, except you doe this day with speedy and manly resolution defend both Solymans credit and your owne. You know not this proud beast Americus, whose pride and insolencie if you but say the word, I will quickly put downe: for he hateth Solyman, he regardeth not the king, and of you hee maketh no account at all. for why, he aspireth vnto the maiestie of a king, and saith that the Vayuodship of Transyluania well beseemeth a king; for that in this country Decebaldus the Dacian sometime raigned; whom the warlike Emperour Traian with all the force of the Roman empire hardly subdued. No man can more proudly or arrogantly set himselfe foorth than he, neither more craftily or cunningly dissemble to serue his turne. Indeed he hath for fashion sake presented your honor with a few simple presents, and giuen you his hand also, better koown for his falshood than his faith; to the intent that when you are once past his countrey, he may scoffe and jeast at your decrees: verily he deadly enuieth at your

A your honor and felicitie, and grudgeth in his heart, that you should set down the lawes of peace and war in Hungarie: and whereas he doth manifestly aspire vnto a kingdome, hee feareth you aboue all others, lest you should trouble his designes, abate his credit, and chastise his insolency. Verily, he that thus malligneth your happinesse, and contemneth your authority, is not to be suffered, but by good reason to be taken away: therby at this your first entrance to defend the credit of your commission, & honor of your name. For nothing is more dangerous than a faithlesse companion, and a secret enemy, especally when you shall leaue him at your backe behind you: for when he shall as occasion serues shew forth his hidden malice, he shall so much the more stily and desperatly indanger your person. Grittus enraged with his speech more than before, thought it best to make hast, and to vse his authoritie to the full; he commended Docia, and promised him in short time to requite his good will towards him, especially if he
B would by some notable attempt abate the Bishops pride. It is reported, that Grittus gaue him no other charge, but to take the Bishop, that so hee might after the Turkish manner haue sent him in chains to Constantinople, & bestowed the honor of the Vayuod vpon Hieronimus Lascus the Polonian, who in hope of that honorable preferment vnto him promised by king Iohn, had done him great and faithfull seruice, as his embassador both vnto Solyman, and also vnto the French king. But when king Iohn perceiued that he could not conueniently without manifest danger place him, being a Polonian (who could scarcely speak the Hungarian language) gouernor ouer such a warlike people, he as it were inforced by necessitie, preferred this Americus the Bishop of Veradium, a man of them both reuerenced and feared: Which so grieued Lascus, a man of great stomacke and experience, and thereunto excellently learned, that he would
C neuer admit any excuse of the kings, but alwayes after complained, that he was by the king deluded. Yet for all that, he kept himselfe within the bounds of loyaltie, & inioyed certain lands and townes which the king had giuen him in the borders of Polonia, and estranged neuertheless from him in mind, was now become one of Grittus his followers, hoping of his better preferment by his means vnto Solyman; and for that cause was not so forward to doe the king such seruice as he had in times past. Now by the commandement of Grittus, a strong companie of Turkish horsemen, and certaine troups of Hungarians, were deliuered to Docia; who secretly departing that night from Baxouia, came suddenly to the Vayuods campe, hauing a little before by his Hungarian spies learned that he lay in the open fields in his tent, by reason of the great heat, without any watch or guard, attended on only with his pages and houshold
D seruants, as a man without feare; & that all the rest of his retinue lay dispersed in the countrey villages round about. All which serued so well for Docia his purpose, that the Vayuod ignorant of his death so nigh at hand (who rather contemned than feared his enemies) was suddenly oppressed by Docia his soldiers: so that whilest he was yet lying in his bed, & scarcely well awaked by his chamberlaines and the noise of the enemie; Docia breaking into his tent, cut off his head as he lay. All they which lay neere, amazed with the suddennesse of the matter, fled away for feare, and left their horses and other things for a prey to the Turks and other E of Docia his followers. Docia hauing done so great an outrage, returned to Grittus, presenting vnto him the Vayuods head, which hee brought in his hand by the eare. Lascus was then present, but altogether ignorant of the murder, who as a man moued with a naturall compassion in so sudden & horrible a fact, and forgetting al former grudge (as in like case it oftentimes chanceth) stood as one dismaid, nothing reioicing at the vnworthie death of his enemy. To whom Grittus turning himselfe, said, Lascus, Doest thou not know this shauen pate, truly it is a great mans head, but of such a one as was very ambitious, rebellious, and proud. To whom Lascus replied, Truly though I loued him not, yet I thought it not so whilest it stood vpon his shoulders; disallowing therein the crueltie of the fact. Which thing Grittus perceiuing, began to repent him of that was done, & said openly, that although he was worthily slain, yet he could haue wished rather to haue had him taken prisoner. The report of this horrible murder once bruted abroad, the Bishops kinsmen & friends, yea almost all the people of that prouince rise vp in arms against Grittus, to reuenge the death of the reuerend Bishop, whom liuing they had F both loued and feared. Neuer did any people in reuenge of a common wrong, enter into arms with greater desire, more heat, or quicker speed: so that in few daies there were assembled together 40000 horse and foot, vnder the leading of Stephanus Maylat a noble gentleman, who of all other most honored the Bishop, & in that common griefe took vpon him as chiefe, the persecuting of the authors of such inhumane crueltie. Grittus perceiuing how grieuously the matter matter was taken, with the danger he was in, began to doubt with himselfe what course were G best for him to take. To go forward, and to fall into the hands of the furious people, the same was present death; and to returne and leaue the honorable deputation he had with so great expectation of all men taken vpon him, was vnto his aspiring mind no lesse torment than death it selfe. Thus perplexed, he with all speed got himself with his followers to the strong town of Mege, in hope to shreud himselfe vntill such time as the rage of the countrey people were either of it selfe appeased (as it oftentimes falleth out in such sudden tumults) or els he should be relieued by king Iohn, or the Turks Sanzacks which had the charge of the frontiers of the Turkish empire. The townsmen of Mege seeing Grittus accompanied with so many Turkes, shut the gates against him: yet at length by the perswasion of the two Hungarian captains Docia and Batianus, they gaue him leaue to enter into the base town, hauing before retired themselues with all their substance vnto the higher towne, which in manner of a strong castle com- H manded the lower. Here whilst Grittus with all carefulnes fortifieth the place, and dispatcheth the messengers vnto his friends abroad for aid, his enemies with hideous noise and outcries approching the town, at their first comming attempted to haue scaled the wals and ramplers therof: which thing whilst they disorderly did, with greater fury than discretion, they were easily repulsed, and many of them slaine by the Turks Ianizaries & harquebusiers. After which losse, by the direction of Maylat their Generall, they withdrew themselues out of the danger of the shot, & incamped on euery side of the towne, hoping as the truth was, that their enemies vnprouided of victuall, could not long hold the place, but must of necessitie either starue with famine, or yeeld it vp. In the mean time Grittus resolutely enduring all the calamities of a man I besieged, fell sicke, and so much the more for that he could heare nothing of any aide which he expected from his friends: for king Iohn glad in his mind of the distresse of the ouerseer, or rather competitor of his kingdom; and also knowing that he could not without great discontentment of his subiects oppose himself against such a multitude risen vpon so iust a cause; yet for fashion sake sent certain troups of horsmen to his relefe: who not altogether ignorant of the kings mind, made such hast, as men that purposed not to come in time to do him good. As for the Turks Sanzacks of Belgrade and Samandria, they enuying at his honor, flatly refused to depart from their charge, to relieue him, without expresse commandment from Solyman himselfe: and Lascus (before one of Grittus his chiefe followers, but now a beholder of his distres) when he had a little before departed from him to procure him some relefe, as he promised, K did now in this extremity forsake him also. The citizens in the vpper town (who a great while had stood looking on from aboue as men indifferent) perceiuing the full resolution of their countrymen to be reuenged, and the difficulties wherewith the Turks were inclosed, assailed them also from the high towne. Grittus thus beset on euery side, offered vnto the Transyluanians a great masse of money, to suffer him to passe forward into Hungarie; but their furious minds more desirous of reuenge than money, were not to be moued with any gold. In fine, he sent rich iewels to the Gouernor of Moldauia his friend, to be ready at a certain houre when he would sallie out of the towne, to receiue him with certain troups of horsmen; so if it were possible to saue himselfe & his children. Grittus (whether it were vpon a doubtfull hope, or vrged by inexitable destinie) sallying out of the towne at the appointed time, with Solymans L commission in his hand, and missing of the Moldauian, fell vpon Francis Schenden the late Bishops nigh kinsman, and Maylat his familiar friend; who furiously running in vpon him with tumultuous speech, violently caught from his head his rich cap of Sables, and with his horsemen tooke him, being weake with sicknesse, and making no resistance. His followers, especially the Turks, inclosed on euery side, were either slain or taken. But Grittus himself being brought to the generals tent, beset round with his armed enemies, and there examined, Why hee had commanded the Vayuod to be slain; earnestly protested, That he neuer commanded any such thing, and that it was done without his knowledge. Which his answer serued not his turne, all the people crying out against him with one voice, that he should as a sacrifice be offered vnto the Vayuods ghost. Whereupon he was by Maylat deliuered again to Francis Schenden to bee M executed, who without delay caused his head to bee strucke off. The nobilitie and the Vayuods kinsmen (after the maner of that people) dipped some part of their garments in his bloud, the longer to keep in mind the remembrance of the reuenge. was set at libertie, & so fled out of Hungarie vnto Sigismund his court in Polonia: after hee had long time wearied himselfe, and aduentured his life in the Hungarian state. Docia the author of this Tragedie, was by the furious people afterwards rent in pieces, and so perished.

The riches found about Grittus.

The same time that Grittus went from Constantinople into Hungarie, Solyman the Turkish Emperor dreading no danger out of Europe, tooke in hand two great expeditions both at one time, the one by land into Asia against the Persians, & the other by sea into Affrick against the Moores; promising vnto himselfe in his inordinat desires, the Monarchie of the whole world in short time, if he might subdue these two great nations whom he had already in hope deuoured. But forasmuch as all cannot be told at once, which was at one time in diuers places so far distant done, omitting for a while the expedition made in person himselfe against the C Persians, we will first declare what he did by his Lieutenants against the Moores. Hariadenus, surnamed of the Christians Barbarussa (who succeeding his elder brother Horruccius in the kingdom of Algiers in Affricke, had by many victories so inlarged the kingdome before gotten by his brother, that his name and power was now become terrible both to the Christians and wild Moores, and his fame growne great in the Turkish court) was the chiefe author and perswader of Solyman to inuade Affricke. But it shall not (as I thinke) be far from our purpose here briefely to rehearse by what meanes those two Mytilene brethren, basely borne, crept out of a smal galliot vnto the maiestie of great kings; that herein they which come afterwards may also admire the wonderfull changes and chances of these worldly things, now vp, now downe, as if the life of man were not of much more certaintie than a stage play.

Solyman at one time purposeth to inuade Persia and Affricke.

D These two brethren, Horuccius and Hariadenus, borne at Mytilene in the Iland of Lesbos, weary of the poore and base estate they led at home with their father, a renegate Grecian; stealing a little galliot, committed themselues and all the hope of their good fortune to sea, where by chance they consorted themselues with Camales, a most famous pyrat of that time; vnder whom Horruccius the elder brother, for his forwardnesse became a captain: and growing rich by many purchases, and also strong with gallies and slaues which hee had at sundrie times taken; and at last consorting himselfe with Haidin, Sinam the Iew, Salec, and other lesse pyrats (which afterwards became men of great fame and account) ouer whom he commanded as an arch pyrat, came seeking after purchase as far as Mauritania. At which time Selymes king of Iulia-Cæsarea, which now we call Algiers, was in armes against his brother Mechemetes, competitor of the kingdom; who aided by the Numidians, now commonly called Arabians, put his brother in great doubt of his estate. Selymes glad of the comming of Horruccius & the E other pyrats his followers, with a great masse of money paid before hand, induced Horruccius and the rest to take vpon them the defence of him and his kingdom against his brother: which thing Horruccius so happily performed, (especially by the means of his harquebusiers, as then no small terror to the wild Moores and Numidians) that in short time he repulsed that sauage people, and set Selymes at peace in his kingdom. Horruccius being a man of a sharp wit, and by nature ambitious, noting in the time of his seruice the kings mild and simple disposition, void of all distrust; and that the naked Moores were no soldiers, but a light and vnconstant people, alwaies at variance among themselues; and that the wandring Numidians liuing barely diuided into many factions, were easily by reward to be woon, or by force constrained; suddenly falsified his faith, & villanously slew Selymes the king, as he was bathing himselfe, mistrusting nothing lesse than the falshood of the pyrat; & in the same hurle murthring such as he thought F would withstand his desire, and with bountie and crueltie ouercomming the rest, so wrought the matter, that he was by generall consent chosen king of Algiers. Thus of a pyrat becomes a king, he shortly after by policie surprised Circello (a famous citie about 60 mile distant from Algiers) by his souldiers sent thither in the habit of marchants. of Mege, in hope to shroud himselfe vntill such time as the rage of the countrey people were either of it selfe appeased (as it oftentimes falleth out in such sudden tumults) or els he should be relieued by king Iohn, or the Turks Sanzacks which had the charge of the frontiers of the approching the town, at their first comming attempted to haue scaled the wals and ramparts therof: which thing whilst they disorderly did, with greater fury than discretion, they were

which might by force or policy be had; so that his power daily increased, men of seruice continually resorting vnto him, as the chiefe man in al those parts. Not thus contented, he to enlarge his kingdome, draue the Spaniards out of Bugea, a citie famous both for the great trade thither, and for the Mahometan schoole solnetime there kept: at the taking whereof hee lost his right hand with a shot, and in stead thereof euer after vsed a hand of yron, wherewith hee obtained many worthie victories against his enemies: for neere to Algiers he ouerthrew an army of the Spaniards, with Diego de Vara their Generall. And shortly after, at such time as Hugo Moncada returning out of Italie with the old Spanish souldiers, landed in his country, he enforced him againe to sea; where hee with all his expert souldiers either perished by shipwracke, or driuen on shore, were slain or taken prisoners by Horruccius, and thrust into his gallies. At last hauing in sundry battels ouercome the king of Tremisla, Charles the Emperor his confederat, and thrust him out of his kingdome, he stirred vp both the Christians and Numidians against him: so that comming to take Ora and Portus (two strong holds kept by garrisons of Spaniards sent thither to aid the king of Tremissa) he was by them and the Moo[illegible] at the first repulled, and afterwards quite ouerthrowne: where most part of his army being [illegible] or taken prisoners, he with a few of his friends sought to saue themselues by flight out [illegible] de Iart sands; and seeing himselfe hardly pursued by his enemies, scattered many pieces of gold vpon the sands as he fled, thereby to haue staied their hastie pursuit: but they more desirous of him than of his gold, followed so fast, that at last they ouertooke him, and without further delay strucke off his head, which was afterwards sent into Spiane, and carried vpon a launce thorow all the townes and cities alongst the sea coast, to the wonderfull reioycing of the people, vnto whom he had in former time done great harme.

Horruccius slain, & his head carried aboue in Spaine.

Hariadenus surnamed Barbarussa, succeedeth his brother Horruccius in the kingdome of Algiers.

After the death of Horruccius, Hariadenus inferiour to his brother neither in courage nor martiall prowesse, by the generall content of the souldiers tooke vpon him the kingdome of Algiers. He, made heire not only of his brothers kingdome, but of his vertues and haughtie thoughts, and of the surname also of Barbarussa, began forthwith to aspire vnto the empire of all that part of Affricke; accounting what he had already gotten, too little and too base to answer his desires. Wherefore he entred into armes, and became a terrour both to the Moores and Numidians; holding peace with some, and wars with others, as best serued his purpose: and with his gallies robbed and spoiled the coasts of Spaine, Sardinia, and the Islands Baleares; fortune so fauouring him in al his enterprises, that he became both famous & feareful to his enemies. He slew Hamet, a great commander among the Numidians, and chased Benchades and Abenida, two of their greatest princes, out of the country: and with like fortune at sea, ouercame Hugo Moncada, a famous Spaniard, who sore wounded, had much adoe to saue himselfe by flight, when he had lost diuers of his gallies. He also in battel at sea ouerthrew Rodericus Portundus, Admirall of Spaine: in which fight the Admirall with his son were both slaine, and seuen of his gallies taken: in token of which victory, he sent part of the rich spoile there taken, with the Admirals ensigne, as a Present vnto Solyman; wherby he became famous in the Turks court; but much more, after he had repulsed Auria from Cercenna, and taken two great Genoway ships which were comming to Auria loaded with men and munition; the losse whereof filled the citie of Genoa with much sorrow. All things sorting thus according to his desire, and his name become no lesse terrible in Spaine, Italie, Sicilie, and the Islands of the Mediterranian, than it was in the greatest part of Affricke; Solyman grieued with the losse of Corone, Patras, and the castles vpon the straits of Lepanto, taken from him by Auria, Himerales his Admirall being shamefully put to flight: by the counsel of his Bassaes, but especially of Abraham the chiefe Bassa, sent Embassadours vnto him to Algiers; offering him the greatest honours of his court, and to make him Admirall of all his fleet, if hee would forthwith repaire vnto Constantinople: for why, hee was the onely man in all mens iudgements, who for his yeres and great experience at sea, as wel as for his inuincible courage, and glory of his late atchieued kingdome, was to be compared with Auria, and to be opposed against the Christian fleet. Sinas a great man in Solymans court, was with this embassage sent, and speedily transported to Algiers by Mangalis, a famous pyrat, then Gouernour of the Rhodes; who at his landing, was honourably receiued by Barbarussa, and audience giuen him. Barbarussa vnderstanding the cause of his comming, was exceeding glad thereof, presently conceiuing no small hope of obtaining the monarchie of Affricke, if hee might once come to Solymans presence, and

and at large shew vnto him the state of Affricke, and power of the Christians, with their continuall discord amongst themselues. Wherefore without further delay committing the protection of his son Asanes (then about eighteene yeares old) and the gouernment of his new gotten kingdome to Ramada and Agû, two of his nigh kinsemen and assured friends, of whose fidelitie he doubted not: he with fortie of his owne gallies in most warrelike manner appointed, set forward with Solymans Embassadour towards Constantinople: where by the way hee met with a fleet of Genoway ships bound for Sicilie for corne, which after a sharpe and cruell fight he tooke and burnt. After that, landing by night in the countrey of Elba, not far from Naples, he suddenly surprised Rhium a rich citie; where loading his gallies with the wealth thereof, and carrying away with him all the inhabitants into captiuitie, he arriued at Constantinople in the yeare 1533, where he was by the great courtiers brought to Solyman, of whom he was joyfully receiued, if it were but for the presents which he gaue him: which were faire boyes and yong maidens sumptuously apparrelled, eunuchs and wild beasts of Lybia, as Lyons, Leopards and such like. But after he had certain dayes discoursed at large with the great Bassa's, of the state of Affricke, the strength of the Christians, and how the wars were to be managed, he was afterwards by them seldomer sent for, and offering himselfe into their companie, was hardly admitted: for enuie (the inseperable companion of growing honor) had quickely ouertaken him in the court, so that many men letted not openly to say, It had not bin the fashion of the Othoman kings, to prefer pyrats (the worst kind of theeues) to the honor of their great Admirall; and that there wanted not, neither euer would want men both vertuous and valiant in the Turks court, which could with great honour maintaine and augmene the glory of the Turkish empire both by sea and land; whereas hee had against all right and conscience, by shameful treacherie intruded himselfe into another mans kingdom in Affricke, and there persecuted the Mahometan princes and people, being of no religion himselfe, as one that was borne of a renegate Greeke, and had from his youth liued as a mercilesse pyrat, and common enemie of mankind. By which speeches Barbarussa perceiued in how euill time Abraham Bassa his best friend, and by whose means he was sent for, was absent from Court, who at that time was gone into Comagena, and wintred at Aleppo, with purpose (as Solymans forerunner) with the first of the next Spring, to passe ouer Euphrates against the Persian. After long suit, and much expectation, Solyman answered Barbarussa by Aiax and Cassimes two of the great Bassa's, That all the matter concerning him should be referred to the discretion of Abraham the chiefe Bassa, for that he was by his counsell especially sent for into Affricke: wherefore if he did expect any thing, he should repaire vnto him in Syria, that according to his graue iudgement all things might be ordred. Barbarussa thus reiected into Syria, although he well perceiued that it tended to his no small disgrace; yet in hope by sufferance to obtaine another kingdome, seemed contented with the answere, and resolued forthwith to take vpon him that long and painfull journy: which the old king lustily performed, and so posting by land through Asia the lesse, & trauelling ouer the mountain Amanus, then couered with deep snow, came in the dead time of Winter to Aleppo in Syria, where he was honourably receiued by the great Bassa, and heard at large, to his so good contentation and liking, that he deemed him of all others the fittest to command the Turks power at sea; & to that purpose writ commendatorie letters in his behalfe to Solyman: wishing him for his sufficience to place him as the fourth with the other three Bassa's of his counsell. After Barbarussa was again arriued at Constantinople with these letters, and that it was once knowne how effectually the chiefe Bassa had commended him to Solyman, it was a world to see how on the sudden the face of the court was changed vpon him, euery man either for friendship or flatterie began now to speake of his praises, and to extoll his worthines: who was now in all mens mouthes but Barbarussa? so great was the power and authoritie of the chiefe Bassa, that being absent, yet was his approbation of all men accounted sufficient to prefer whom he pleased; and his letters lawes to the rest of the court. Barbarussa had brought with him from Algiers, one Rosetes the elder brother of Muleasses king of Tunes, who wrongfully driuen into exile by his yonger brother, had liued certain yeres at Algiers, but now by the persuasion of Barbarussa was come with him to Constantinople, to craue aid of Solyman against the oppression of his brother. Him Barbarussa oftentimes shewed vnto the great Bassa's, and in his discourses with them concerning the conquest of Affricke, set him out as a most fit instrument for subduing of the kingdome of Tunes, as

as a man whom the people more affected than they did Muleasses the vsurper. After long deliberation and consultation had with the Bassa's concerning the inuasion of Affricke, Barbarussa now admitted vnto the presence of Solyman, in these or like words persuaded him to that warr, for the entrance whereunto we haue thus far digressed.

What thing the Priests with loud voyce vse to pray for, at such time as the Othoman Emperors enter into the Temple to pray, the same thing doe I also wish vnto thee most mightie Solyman; which is, That thou shouldest remember, thy progenitors by Iustice and religion to haue got for thee this Empire, than which, more magnificent and richer the gods haue not giuen to any: Fortune hath neuer deceiued them that troad that way, and thou hitherto hast so traced their steps, that thou hast easily surmounted their fame and glorie, administring Iustice to thy subiects; and inflamed with the hope of eternall praise, making continuall warr against the enemies of our religion, the true office of a zealous Prince. By this meanes is Belgrade taken, Rhodes woon, the King of Hungarie slaine in battell, Germanie twice harried and burnt: so that Charles, whom the Christians would make equall to thy selfe in power and name, with the great aid almost of all the Christian Nations, terrified with the noyse of thy armie, shunned battell. But forasmuch as Empires, be they neuer so large, or victories be they neuer so glorious, can either satisfie the greatnesse of an heroicall mind, or glut the same with glorie; thou hast therefore sent before thee thy victorious ensignes against the Persians and Parthians, that those Nations who haue wickedly fallen from our Rites, purified as it were by thy sacred armes, may be again reclaimed to the antient rites of our religion. But be this vnto thy greatnesse most honorable to attempt, and glorious to performe: let it only be lawfull for me now growne an old man in the middest of armes and dangers, to declare what is expedient, and briefely to open such things as I haue by long experience learned to concerne the augmenting of thy fame and empire elsewhere. Neither would I haue you to take this as presumptuously spoken of me: for Fortune hath enough, yea and more than enough fauoured my designes, whom from a poore cottage and bare hope, she hath promoted to glorious victories, great riches, yea vnto the title and maiestie of a King. But vnto these things the gods could giue me nothing better, than to be called for of thee, and sent for, in Councell to discourse of matters of greatest importance: wherefore my aduice shall be vnto thee faithfull, and with experience confirmed: which although it be all that it seemeth old men can do, yet in my sound bodie remaineth such strength, that I dare both promise and performe vnto thee my good seruice at all assayes both by sea and land. For vnto this onely course haue I bent my selfe day and night from my youth, following the purpose and counsell of my valiant brother Horuccius (who to extend the bounds of our religion, persecuted the Christians both by sea and land) desiring nothing more, than that thy fleet and power might once be ioyned with my forces and direction, and so vnder thy good hap, to be either a commander, or else commanded: forasmuch as it grieueth me not to be commanded by my betters. Of which my desires if the gods shall make me partaker, the Spaniards shall shortly be driuen quite out of Affricke, thou shalt heare that the Moores are gone ouer into Spaine, to repossesse the kingdome of Granado; that Tunes and Numidia are at thy command; and not to speake of Sardinia and Corcyca, that Sicilia is ours: which once taken, we shall starue vp Italie, and on euery side distresse it with our fleet, being now weake and brought low by the discord of the Princes, and that part thereof both towards Sicilia and Macedonia readie to submit it selfe vpon any condition, so it might cast off the Spanish yoke. Thinke not, that either that strength or vnitie is now in Italie, which was when thy great grandfather Mahomet hauing taken Hydruntum brought a great feare, not vpon Italie onely, but vpon other the Christian Nations also: for by the good successe of that warre, which all the Christian Princes could hardly withstand, he had vndoubtedly taken the citie of Rome, and so according to right and reason, againe vnited the Empire of the East and of the West, as they were before in their antient glory. But he suddenly left the world, rapt to heauen, that he might leaue to thee (according to the appointment of the fatall Destinies, and reuolutions of the heauens) this worke of absolute perfection. And yet my purpose is not by putting thee in hope of so great and rare a triumph, to interrupt or hinder thee for turning thy power into the East, against thy old and irreligious enemies, deseruing all extremities: for thy nauie shall be sufficient for me, whereof thou shalt haue no need in thy wars so farre within land; that whilest thou art conquering Asia, Affrica the third part of the world may in the meane time be brought vnder thy subiection also. Where before all other things, Muleasses is to be driuen out of Tunes; a man of insatiable couetousnesse, vnstayed lust, horrible cruelitie, hated both of God and man; who hauing by treacherie slaine eighteene of his brethren, or that which worse is, cruelly burnt out their eyes, doth so raigne alone, that he hath left him neither kinseman nor friend. For being as vnthankefull as perfideous, hee hath

A hath murthered all his fathers friends, who with great trauell had preferred him to the kingdome, so to make short payment for so great desert. With this beast we must haue to do, whom whilest no man loueth, all men wish to perish. The Numidians trouble him with dayly inuasions, whose iniuries the infamous coward endureth with such shame and reproach, that it should seeme he had rather to suffer them than reuenge them. And yet this effœminate dastard holdeth in chaines many valiant Turks, and acknowledgeth not your imperiall name, whereunto all men on euery side sue for grace: and which is not to be suffered exceedingly fauoureth the Spaniards of Tripolis, to the intent that Agis and Moses, two valiant Turkish captaines may be driuen out of the citie. This wild beast disarmed of his claws and teeth, we shall easily destroy, if it be but for that we haue with vs Roscetes his brother, whom the Numidians wish and long for: him must we vse, if it be but for a shew, so shall the thing we desire, be without bloud effected, as

B soone as we shall but present our selues before the gates of Tunes. Then shall it be at your pleasure, to appoint whom you will haue to gouerne the Numidian kingdome: it shall be vnto me glorie enough, when the greatest part of Affricke conquered, shall be peaceably deliuered into your hands at your return with the triumphs of Persia. But by the way as I returne, I assure you vpon mine own priuat, so to vse the matter, that the Christians shall also haue good cause to bewaile their calamities: and if I hap to meet with Auria, he shall haue small cause to reioyce of the mischiefe he hath done: for him alone I challenge to persecute, as my proper and peculiar enemie, both for the remembrance of the harmes wee haue receiued at his hands, and for the despight I haue at his fame; who once taken out of the way, the seas shall be open only to you and your fleets. And beleeue me, he that shall be able to command the seas, shall easily also subdue the kingdomes by land.

C But Solyman, who after the manner of wise Princes, vsed well to consider, and afterwards with ripe iudgement to resolue of such matters as he had with attentiue care hearkned vnto; commending Barbarussa for his forwardnesse in his seruice, for that time brake vp the counsel. Not long after, a decree was made, according to Abraham the great Bassa's aduice, That Barbarussa should be ioyned as fourth with the other three chiefe Bassa's of Solymans counsel, and be made great Admiral; so that all the Islands, ports, and people all alongst the sea coast thorow out Solymans Empire should be at his command, and that it should be lawfull for him to take vp such mariners and soldiers for seruice at sea, as pleased him in what place soeuer. This being solemnly proclaimed, Solyman with his owne hand deliuered him a sceptre and a sword, Barbarussa is made Solymans great Admirall.

D willing him, by worthie deeds to performe what he had promised. After which, Aiax and Cassimes the two great Bassa's, with the Captaine of the Ianizaries, brought him with exceeding pompe, from the court to the Nauie: at which time was carried before him all the tokens of his new obtained honour. And toward the maintenance of that war at sea, he had deliuered vnto him out of Solymans treasures, eight hundred thousand duckets, and eight hundred Ianizaries.

But forasmuch as much it was that he did in the seruice of Solyman, and more is of him hereafter to be spoken; it shall not be amisse here to present vnto the view of the world the sterne but liuely countenance of this so famous a man (who liuing kept all the Miditerranian in feare) as it is by Boisardus expressed, together with the Elogium following.

Littora te Hesperia timuere vtriusque, Lybesque Oppressi dextra subcubuere tua.
Nunquam te Lypare, Corcyraue diligit, harum Cum sit immeritos depopulatus agros.

The coasts of Italie and Spaine, of thee were sore afraid,
And so the Moores did stoupe to thee, by thy right hand dismaid.
Lyparos will thee neuer loue, ne yet Corcyra strong;
For that thou causelesse did'st to them so great and open wrong.

Barbarussa sped of that hee desired, staied not long after at Constantinople, but departing out of Helespontus with eightie gillies and certaine galliots, shaped his course towards Italie, leauing Amurathes (a sea captaine) with twelue gallies to transport Solyman and his armie, readie to set forward against the Persian, ouer that narrow sea into Asia. Who after he had so done, ouertooke Barbarussa at Methone, who holding on his course to Affricke, and suddenly passing the strait betwixt Italie and Cicilie, brought a great feare vpon both the countries; but passing by the bay of Hippona alongst the coast of the lower Calabria, hee set vpon the towne of Saint Lucidius called in antient time Tempsa: which although it stood vpon a rocke and was reasonable well walled; yet such was the violence of the Turkes assault, that it could not be defended but was taken, with so much more hurt to the enhabitants, for that the Maior

He spoileth the coast of Italie.

A Major of the towne, to keepe the people from flying away, had lockt vp the gates on the other side of the citie, from the enemie. From thence he with rich spoyle and many prisoners went to Citrarium, where he had learned of his prisoners, a fleet of gallies was in building. This town forsaken of the inhabitants for feare, he tooke without resistance, ransacked it, and burnt it, where he also fired seuen gallies not yet altogether finished. But after he was come with his fleet as farre as the Island Capri, within the sight of Naples, such a terror was strucke into the minds of all that dwelt alongst that coast, That it was thought, if he had landed and gone directly to Naples, the Neopolitans would for feare haue abandoned the citie. But holding on his course, he came to Prochita, which he tooke and rifled: so passing by the port of Caieta, (which he might easily haue taken) he came to Spelunca, a towne in the hithermost part of the B Kingdome of Naples. They of the Towne dismaied with the sudden arriuall of so great a fleet, yeelded the same without resistance. The enemie entring the town, tooke twelue hundred prisoners. Pelegrinus a chiefe man amongst them of Spelunca, was fled into the Castle: him Barbarussa commanded to yeeld, which if he would presently do, he promised to let him go free; but if he should stand vpon his defence, hee threatned in short time to make him repent his foolish hardinesse, with the vtter destruction both of himselfe and the towne. The fearefull gentleman without delay came out of the castle, and fell downe at his feet; who according to his promise gaue him his libertie, and with rare curtesie restored to him his wife, his sonne, and niece, whom he had taken prisoners; who receiued them with many teares falling from their eyes for ioy.

C The same night also 2000 Turkes came from the fleet, through the rough and bushie mountaines, to the citie Fundi, ten miles distant from Spelunca, in the vttermost borders of the kingdome of Naples, conducted as was thought by certaine Italians of that countrey; who a few yeares before taken at sea, and ouerwearied with the heauie burthen of the Turkish slauerie, had reuolted to the Mahometan religion. But such was the suddennesse of their coming, and their celeritie in entring the citie, that Iulia Gonzaga the Paragon of Italie, and the chiefe prise which they sought after, had scarce time to get to horse halfe naked, and so with much difficultie to escape into the mountaines. It is reported, that Barbarussa (which thing he himselfe afterwards seemed not to deny) mooued with the fame of her incomparable beautie, and wonderfull perfection, desired exceedingly to haue taken her as a Present for Solyman.

D The citizens were for most part either slain or taken prisoners by the Turks, who loaded with the spoile of the citie, returned again to the fleet. Another part of Barbarussa's fleet came to Tarracina, which the Turks tooke forsaken of the inhabitants, who for feare were all fled into the mountains, except some which for age or sicknesse could not shift for themselues, whom the Turks slew, & spoyled the churches. Barbarussa thus scouring along the coast of Italie, and newes thereof daily brought to the citie of Rome, strucke such an exceeding terrour into the minds of the citizens, that it was verily thought if he had come a little further to Ostia, they would generally haue forsaken the city. But he hauing well performed his promise made to Solyman for vexing the Christians, and before resolued of a greater matter he had to do; when he had watted at Pontia, passed ouer into Affrick with such celeritie, that he was arriued there
E before it was thought that he was departed from the coast of Italie. For Barbarussa to deceiue Muleasses king of Tunes, and to take him vnprouided, had giuen it out, that he would burn and spoyle the coasts of the Christian countries, especially of Italie, Liguria, and Spain, in reuenge of the harme done by Auria at Corone and Patras. Which thing Muleasses the rather beleeued, vnderstanding his proceedings vpon the coast of Italie. The Venetians having also at the same time at great charges prepared a great fleet, did in some part lessen Muleasses feare, That Barbarussa would imploy his Forces for Affricke: for then what should the Venetians haue needed to haue made so great and chargeable a preparation. But that which aboue all other things brought him into securitie, was for that he had by secret espials certainly learned, that his brother Roscetes was kept at Constantinople, as a prisoner at large, vnder safe keeping:
F which made him to think, that Barbarussa's forces were not prepared against him; for he knew that he could not be impugned, or his state more indangered by any other meanes, than by producing the competitour of his kingdome, to whom his guiltie conscience doubted, that both the citizens of Tunes and the Numidians were for most part well affected.

The Romans afraid of Barbarussa.

This Muleasses of whom we now speake, and whom hereafter we shal by occasion often remember, Muleasses king of Tunes.

member, was lineally discended of the antient kings of Tunes; who without interruption of discent, or mixture of forreine bloud, had by the space of 954 yeares mightily ruled the great kingdome of Tunes, from Tripolis to Bugia, almost 800 miles alongst the Mediterranian, and into the Main as far as the mount Atlas: and for the long continuance of their state, and largenesse of their kingdome, were worthily accounted the most reuerend and mightie amongst the Mahometan kings of Affricke. His father Mahomethes, when he had with much glorie, and more pleasure, raigned 32 yeares, perceiuing the end of his life to approch, had purposed to haue appointed Maimo his eldest sonne (whom for his hastie aspiring he then held in durance) to succeed him in his kingdome: but ouercome with the importunitie of Lentigesia his wife, a woman of haughtie spirit, who had by reward made a strong faction in the Court for her sonne Muleasses, he altered his former purpose, and appointed him his successor: by whom (as it was thought) the small remainder of his owne old yeares wa shortened; Maimo the right heire of the kingdome in prison, presently murthered; seuenteene of his other brethren vnmercifully executed; and three other, Barcha, Beleth, and Saeth, with more than barbarous crueltie with a hot yron of their sight depriued; only Roscetes the second brother, and Abdemelech, escaping the hands of their vnnaturall brother, fled to Morhabitus a great Prince amongst the Numidians: whither also their brothers malice persecuted them, seeking by many practises to haue taken them away, and at last for a great summe of money to haue had them deliuered into his hands. Which mony the Numidian receiued, but suffered the distressed Princes, as if they had escaped against his will, to flie further to another Numidian prince a friend of his, called Benticses: where Muleasses by like practises as before, sought to haue destroyed them, or to haue got them into his owne power. Thus chased by their brothers endlesse malice, from Prince to Prince, and place to place, they for their more safetie fled at last to the citie of Biscaris, farre into the maine land: where Abdemelech as one wearie of the world gaue ouer all, and betooke himselfe to a solitarie life, and became a melancholie Mahometan Monke. But Roscetes curteously entertained by Abdalla Prince of that citie, found such fauour in his sight, that he gaue him his daughter in marriage, and long time honorably maintained him as his sonne in law, with such carefulnesse, that for feare of Muleasses practises, hee was seldome permitted to eat any other meat but such as the Prince or his wife had before tasted of. Muleasses thus raigning and raging, and yet not contented with the death of so many of his brethren, proceeded further, and murthered diuers of their children also. He caused also the Manifet and Mesuar, men of greatest authoritie in all the kingdome, his fathers graue counsellors, and his chiefe friends, by whose meanes especially he had aspired vnto the Kingdome, to be cruelly tortured to death, fearing their greatnes; or rather as some thought, grieuing to see them liue, to whom he was so much beholden, and therefore rewarded them with such sharp payment. And by the instigation of Lentesia his mother, caused diuers of his fathers other wiues and concubines to be shamefully murthered, enueighing oftentimes against his father, that as an effoeminat prince, had for his pleasure maintained 200 wiues and concubines in his houses of delight, by whom he had begot so many sons competitors of the kingdome, that he had left him (as he said) a laborious and endlesse piece of worke, to destroy so great a brood. Roscetes aided by his father in law and the other Numidian princes, to whome the name of Muleasses, both for his crueltie against his owne bloud, and iniurious dealing against his neighbours, was become odious; passing ouer the riuer Bragada with a great armie, neere vnto Tunes met with Muleasses his armie, conducted by Dorax a valiant captaine, brother to Lentigesia: where in a sharpe conflict he ouerthrew his brothers Armie, and enforced Dorax with them that were escaped out of the battell, for safegard of their liues to flie into Tunes. Roscetes pursuing the victorie, came and presented his armie before the gates of the citie, in hope that the citisens (whom he knew for the most part to hate the vsurping tyrant) would vpon the sight of him, in right their King, with so great an army, raise some tumult in the city, and let him in. There he lay by the space of twentie dayes, still expecting some innouation; in which time the more to alienate the mindes of the people from Muleasses, and to shew how vnable he was to protect them, he burnt & destroyed all the Oliue and fruit trees, which grew most plentifully and pleasantly all alongst the countrey, from the ruines of old Carthage, to the walls of Tunes: which was vnto the citisens, whose greatest possessions lay there, a most heanie and lamentable spectacle. But Muleasses had so attempered their minds with faire speeches

The ingratitude of Muleasses.

Roscetes riseth against his brother Muleasses.

A ches, and large promises of recompensing euery man to the full; for all such harme as they should sustaine for his brothers furie in the countrey: and beside that, had the citie in such strong possession by reason of his souldiers, that the citisens either would not or could not reuolt to Roscetes. The Numidian princes wearie of that long and vain expectation, according to the leuitie of that nation, accounting it no shame after victorie once gotten to depart, began one after another to shrinke away to their owne dwellings, persuading Roscetes also to prouide for himselfe whilst he had time, and to attend his better fortune. Wherfore he fearing to be betraied by the Numidians, or circumuented by his cruell brother, fled to Barbarussa, then raigning at Algiers in great glorie, where he was honourably entertained; and there remained vntill such time as by his persuasion he went with him as is aforesaid to Constantinople, to

B craue help of Solyman, by whom he was detained in safe custodie: although it was in policie giuen out by Barbarussa, that he was in the fleet, and that he should by Solymans power be restored to his fathers kingdome at Tunes.

Forsaken of the Numidian princes, he flieth to Barbarussa.

This was the state of the kingdom of Tunes, at such time as Barbarussa with Solymans great fleet, contrarie to all mens expectation, suddenly departing from the coast of Italie, landed in Affricke at Biserta, a famous port of the kingdome of Tunes. They of Biserta wearie of the gouernment of Muleasses, and of themselues desirous of change, as soone as they heard the name of Roscetes, forthwith draue out their Gouernor, and receiued the Turks into the towne. For Barbarussa had before sent certaine of Roscetes his familiar friends ashore, which bare the people in hand, that he was in the fleet, but not able to come yet on shore, for that he was (as

C they said) sea-sicke, and troubled him with an ague. Biserta thus possessed by Barbarussa, hee presently departed thence, and sailing by Vtica, thirtie miles distant from Biserta, and so keeping alongst the coast, and passing the promontorie of Carthage, came before Guletta, a strong castle within the bay of Tunes, so placed vpon a strait, that it commandeth all the passage by seavnto the city of Tunes. Before this castle, Barbarussa in token of friendship, discharged all his great ordnance, which they of the castle answered with like: but being required to deliuer it vp to Roscetes, they said it should be alwaies at his command that ruled in the city of Tunes. The newes of Roscetes his supposed comming, flying swiftly by land from Biserta to Tunes, and the great fleet once discouered, set all the citie on an vptore: for the citizens were in great expectation of their new king, both for the loue of Roscetes, who had alwaies shewed Biserta yeelded.

Barbarussa cometh to Guletta.

D himselfe to be of a mild and bountifull nature; and also for the hatred of Muleasses, whose tyrannous and couetous gouernment they thought they had too long indured. Neither was hee ignorant what report ran of himselfe, and how he had lost the hearts of his subiects; which was euidently to be seene in the eyes and countenances of the chiefe men of the citie. And that which more increased their hatred, was for that he had not according to his promise to them in time of his distresse, made them any recompence for their goodly houses and Oliue gardens, destroyed in the countrey by Roscetes in the former wars: wherefore at such time as hee came now out of the castle, and in the greatest assemblie of his people, began to persuade them to play the men, and to continue constant in their obedience, promising vnto them such reward as they knew he was neuer able to performe, they all departed, and left him alone, saue

E some of them vnder the color of friendship, and amongst them Abdahar, then Mesuar (who was chiefe officer next vnto the king) persuaded him to giue place to his hard fortune, & [illegible] with to flie, for by chance at the same instant it was in euery mans mouth, that the Turks were euen at hand: which thing caused Muleasses, forsaken of his subiects, of himselfe feare [illegible] worthily doubting to be betraied, to flie in such hast out of the city, that he left behind him both his treasure and iewels, which afterwards came into the hands of his enemies. The that reuolted was Abezes, a man of great authority; & Fetuches, captain of the castle [illegible] gate Spaniards. Fetuches presently after the flight of Muleasses, brought out Roscetes children, whom Muleasses had long time kept in prison, & to welcom their father

F in the kings royall seat. Abezes also forthwith aduertised Barbarussa of [illegible] & with what longing the people expected their desired king; wishing him [illegible] repaire vnto the city: and for a present sent him a goodly Barbarian horse [illegible] and diuers others for his other chiefe captaines. Hereupon Barbarussa [illegible] forward with fiue thousand Turks, which he had already landed, & [illegible] of the citisens ioifully receiued. But after long looking, when they [illegible] cetes their supposed king, and heard nothing but the name of Solyman and Barbarussa, doubled and redoubled by the Turks in their militarie acclamations, as they marched thorow the citie towards the castle; they began to distrust, as the truth was, that in stead of their new king whom they so much desired, they had receiued the Turkish gouernment, which they vtterly detested. Which suspition once confirmed by certaine of Rosetes friends (whom Barbarussa had brought with him of purpose to delude the people) who grieued to see the ruin of their natiue country, spared not for feare of the present danger to tell their friends and acquaintance as they went, That they did in vaine looke for Rosetes, whom they had left in bonds at Constantinople: it was a wonder to see, how suddenly the minds of the people were changed, how speedily they ran to their weapons, and how furiously they assailed the Turks, now fearing no such matter, and were not as yet al got into the castle. The chiefe leader of the citizens in this tumult, was Abdahar the Mesuar, who but a little before vpon the comming of the Turkes, by augmenting the danger, and the vnfaithfulnesse of his subiects, had persuaded Muleasses to flie; but now perceiuing himselfe deceiued of his expectation for the comming of Rosetes, and repenting of that he had done, sought by all means to driue out the Turks, and to recall Muleasses. And the more to animat the people, as he stood on high, from whence he might best be heard, hee cried vnto them with a loud voice:

We are most villanously betraied (worthie citizens) for Rosetes, whom we expected for our lawful king, lamenteth his miserie in chains, in prison at Constantinople: and we, except we presently play the men, and valiantly fight for our libertie, shall for euer serue as slaues to these forreine and mercilesse pyrats. The present danger of our estate telleth vs, that we must presently and without delay take the occasion offered. Wherefore let all men that meane not to serue as slaues, and to be bought and sold as beasts, take vp armes against the faithlesse Turks. I my selfe will be your leader; let vs therefore all with one consent, with heart and hand reuenge this shamefull trecherie, defend our countrey and libertie with the antient honour and libertie of the Numidians.

There was now no time to stay, euery man had betaken himselfe to his weapons; Muleasses was againe sent for, who yet staied in the suburbs, expecting what should happen; many of the Turks were slain before they were aware, or feared any thing; all the citie was filled with outcries and clattering of weapons; the number of the citizens was such, as might easily haue expulsed the Turks, had they bin but reasonably armed, or well conducted, which in a matter so sudden, and with men altogether ignorant of seruice, was not possible. Yet they, armed with furie, and encouraged with the multitude of themselues, swarmed vp as thicke as was possible one of the bulwarkes of the castle, which they knew was easiest to be gained, where the Turks had set vp one of their ensignes; and with the multitude of their darts and arrowes so ouerwhelmed the Turks, that they were glad to forsake the place, & to retire farther into the castle to a place of more strength: from whence and all alongst the curtaine of the wall, they without intermission discharged their great artillerie and small shot amongst the thickest of the naked Moores, making of them a wonderfull slaughter. Barbarussa although he was a man of an inuincible courage & great experience, all his life time well acquainted with desperate dangers (the dreadfull steps of aspiring minds) yet surprised with the suddennesse of the assault, shut vp in a place whereof he yet knew not the strength, and not prouided of victual for three daies, was with the due consideration of these difficulties, not a little troubled: which his care was by the disordered furie of his enemies, and knowne valour of his owne souldiers greatly diminished; especially when hee saw his owne men still fighting, as men full of hope and courage, and the Moores as men halfe dismaied with the wounds and slaughter of their friends, ready to retire. Howbeit, by the comming in of Muleasses & Dorax, the assault twice before giuen ouer, was againe at both times renewed, with no lesse desperate furie than at the first, and the Turks hardly charged. In this dangerous assault Halis of Maliga, a renegat Spaniard, but a most expert souldier, turning himselfe to Barbarussa, said, Muleasses returned into the citie.

If thou wilt saue thine honour, and hold this fort, we must sallie out vpon this enemie, which hauing neuer seene a set battell, but onely acquainted with light skirmishes, will not be able to endure our charge at hand, but shall in a moment know the price of their foolish hardinesse, who as brainesicke men could neither indure the gouernment of their cruell king, ne yet thankefully receiue the authors of their deliuerance and liberty.

This motion of the Spaniard, confirmed by the generall approbation of the chiefest captaines, taines, Barbarussa commanded Halis the author of that counsell, with certaine other captaines and their companions, at one instant to sallie out at two ports of the castle: which they so resolutely performed, that in short time a wonderful number of the naked Moores lay dead vpon the ground.

Abdahar the Mesuar himselfe, was there shot thorow with a bullet and slaine: whereupon the assault was quite giuen ouer, the Moores retiring by companies backe into the city, and the Turkes still pursuing them: where in the streets for certaine houres, was fought a most cruel and bloudie battel. At last the citizens ouercome, forsooke the open streets, and betook them to the refuge of their houses; not so careful of their king, as of themselues, their wiues, and children. And Halis with the rest, wearied with the slaughter of his enemies, and ouercome with labour, heat, and thirst, returned with victorie vnto the castle. It is reported that there was aboue three thousand of the citizens slaine that day, and thrice as many hurt. Muleasses thus discouraged, and vtterly despairing to recouer the citie, hardly escaped his enemies hands, by the good helpe of his vncle Dorax, with whom he fled ouer the riuer Bagrada, and came in safetie to Constantina (called of old time Cyrtha) the antient seat of the Numidian kings, but then a part of Dorax his dominion; where he was houourably maintained and protected vntill the comming of Charles the Emperour into Affricke. The night ensuing this battell, and the flight of the king, was restlesse both to the citizens and the Turks, each of them for feare of other standing vpon their strongest guard.

The citizens of Tunes discomfited by the Turks.

Muleasses flieth

The next day, the citizens discouraged with the losse of so many of their kinsemen and friends, and hauing no king now for whom they should fight, craued pardon of Barbarussa for their rash attempt, excusing it by the name of loyaltie to their antient kings, offering to submit themselues vnto him with all faithfulnesse. Which their offer hee willingly accepted, knowing that he was not able to keepe that place with his souldiers three daies, for lacke of victuall: so that all his hope and victorie gotten, might easily be ouerthrowne and brought to nought, if the citizens moued either with desperation or desire of reuenge, should ioyne with the other Numidian princes, and besiege him in the castle. Whereupon a generall peace was granted, and by solemne oath on both side confirmed, whereby the citizens expresly bound themselues to the obedience of Solyman, & to Barbarussa as his lieutenant. All things thus set in order in the citie of Tunes, & new magistrates and officers by him made, he laboured by all meanes to win vnto him the Numidian princes: which when he had easily brought to passe by gifts and rewards with those needie princes, of themselues prone enough vpon light occasions to make or breake the bonds of friendship, hee sent Asan-aga an eunuch, and Halis the Spaniard, with the Ianizaries, & certaine pieces of great ordnance, to take in the other cities of the kingdome of Tunes: which they in short time performed, being in all places peaceably receiued, onely the city of Caruenna held out a while, yet afterwards for feare of further harme receiued the Turks garrison. But to leaue Barbarussa king of Algiers and Solymans great Admirall, thus possessed of the kingdome of Tunes; and Muleasses in exile at Constantina, vntil he be againe restored vnto his kingdome by Charles the Emperor, as shall be hereafter declared: let vs againe returne to the wars at the selfe same time vndertaken by Solyman in person himselfe in Persia, perswaded thereunto (as we haue before said) by Abraham the great Bassa. Of whom a few words, that they which shall hereafter liue, may in him as in others, see in what slipperie place they stand, and what smal assurance they haue, which forsaking God, run headlong after these worldly vanities, and swelling with the fauours of great princes, are in a moment when they least feare any such fall, suddenly ouerthrowne, and become the miserable spectacles of mans fragilitie in the height of their supposed blisse.

The citizens of Tunes yeeld themselues to Barbarussa.

This great Bassa called of the Turks Ibrahim, of vs Abraham, was borne in a poore countrie village neere vnto Perga, a towne in that part of Epirus which was called Buthrotia: who in his childhood was taken from his Christian parents, by such as by authoritie did take vp the tribute children of the Christians for the Turkish Emperour. A tribute of all tributes most grieuous. He was of countenance amiable, of feature comely, actiue of body, wel spoken, pleasantly conceited, and sharpe of wit; so that hee in shorter time than was thought possible, to the admiration of many, learned both to speake and write the Arabian tongue, and other languages vsed in the Turkes court, and could skilfully play vpon sundrie kindes of instruments. And being yet a boy, serued Scanderbassa, a man of great authoritie and power, in the time time of Selymus the Emperor, in whose seruice he was instructed in the Mahometan religion: G but giuing himselfe to all manner of curiositie and neatnesse, he was wonderfully fauoured by the great ladie his mistresse, and by her commended to her husband Scanderbasse, as a fit page to temper his melancholie and wayward disposition, with his pleasant conceits and deuices: wherein the Tetricall Bassa finding him to excell, gaue him as a rare gift to Solyman the son of His bringing vp in the Court. Selymus, his grand father Baiazet yet liuing: who tooke in him such pleasure, that the old Em-perour caused him to be brought vp in the Court, in all princely qualities with Solyman (who was of like yeares vnto him) as his companion and playfellow. Where hee so framed himselfe vnto the yong Princes disposition in all points, that he was of him alwayes exceedingly beloued, and afterwards promoted to all the honors of the court, and made one of the Bassa's, His great credit with Solyman. giuing vnto him in marriage the only daughter and heire of Scanderbassa his master, then dead, H with an exceeding great dowrie. And after that made him gouernor of Caire: where he had not long remained, but he was againe sent for to the court, as the man which gaue thereunto life, without whose companie Solyman was as one halfe dead. At length he made him Vasier, which is the chiefe of all the Bassa's, and President of his Councell, the greatest honour in the Turkish empire next vnto the Emperor himselfe. And to honor him yet more, he deliuered him his priuat signet, wherewith the Turkish Emperours neuer vsed to trust any but themselues: he might at his pleasure grace and disgrace whom he would, in court or elsewhere.

What he commanded was done, and whatsoeuer he did was taken for well done. He might without the Emperours knowledge giue any office, yea the gouernment of whole Countries I and Prouinces vnto his fauorits: his credit with the Emperor was so great, that hee did what he list, and no man durst presume to aske any reason why. And to say all at once, he wanted nothing of the maiestie of an Emperor, but the name only; in stead whereof, he was commonly called the great Commander of all the Emperours forces. His house in Constantinople was of all other most stately, wherein was daily to be seene such a multitude of his gallant followers, and such a world of wealth and royall furniture, as that it might be worthily compared with the palace of a great Prince. Neither was he partaker of Solymans counsels in his weigh-tie matters of state only, but of his secret delights and pleasures also: if hee were present, all was well; if he were away, nothing pleased: to be short, he so possessed this great Emperour, that men commonly sayd, The soule of Solyman liued in Abraham. Whereat many of the K great men of the court secretly repined; but especially Solymans mother, and Roxolana his faire Concubine whom of all women he held dearest. His liuely and majesticall countenance thou maist here behold.

Abraham Bassa persuadeth Solyman to make warre vpon the Persians.

This great commander, which might at all times be bold to speake what he thought, vnto Solyman, sought many times in his priuat discourses betwixt them two, to persuade him to forbeare to vse his forces any farther against the Christians, ouer whom he had sufficiently alreadie triumphed, & to turn them vpon the Persians, by whom he was daily iniured. Alled-F ging to him, that the Germans were a strong & warlike people; who as they both in language and manners differed from the Hungarians, so were they alwayes at variance with them, and therfore much cared not though they were by him subdued: but if he should begin to inuade any part of their country, he should then soon see that iuuincible nation with their vnited forces vp in armes, readie to make strong resistance. And to prouoke Charles the Emperor (of all the Christian princes the mightiest) were not good, who of himself was able to bring into the field

field most puissant armies of valiant souldiers out of his owne dominions: besides the wonderfull concourse of most resolute men out of all parts of Christendome, which would not spare to lay downe their liues at his feet in that warre; which was of them accounted most religious. Yea what strength both of horse and foot might be raised and brought to the battell by the two brethren Charles and Ferdinand, only might (as hee said) euen then be plainely perceiued, when as they valiantly defended Vienna, besieged by vs with great power. Neither did Charles afterward, as it seemed, and as the Christians commonly vaunt, feare to haue aduentured the fortune of a maine battell with you: who although I doubt not but hee should haue beene ouercome by you so great a monarch with so puissant an armie, a thing peculiar to your owne good fortune; yet I cannot denie, but that the victorie against such expert and resolute souldiers, so strongly armed as their manner is, must haue beene bought with a great deale of our bloud. These things in my opinion may resonably perswade you to let the Christians alone, by ciuile warres to weaken one another, that so afterwards they may become a prey vnto vs without any danger of ours. So that in my iudgement the Persian warre is to bee taken in hand, rather than the warres in Germanie, and especially for that you haue sufficiently enlarged the bounds of your empire Westward, which you haue extended euen vnto Nations very farre distant. So that it is now a great matter to defend so much as you haue alreadie gotten; and therefore partly for the difficultie of the defending thereof, and partly vpon an honourable contempt, according to the infinite bountie of your heroicall inclination, haue thought good to bestow whole kingdoms vpon strangers, yea halfe your enemies. Wherefore how much more glorious shall it be now vpon iust occasion to seeke for that which ioineth vnto your owne confines; and may therefore easily be united vnto your owne empire: if you according to the example of your grandfather and father shall force your selfe to drive that accursed and abhominable race of Ismael out of Asia. For it shall be a great glorie vnto the name of the Othoman Kings for euer, if you shall after your woonted manner zealously respect the cause of religion: a worke of incomparable fame, if the authours of a most detestable superstition shall by you be chased quite out of Asia. For what more iust or honourable cause can there bee to make warre, than to professe your selfe the defender of the diuine precepts of our great prophet Mahomet, against the wicked and irreligious impugners thereof? And by the way to reuenge and vtterly to destroy the capital enemies of your auncestours; which was the last prayer of your father Selymus. Can you endure them which rule so insolently, that they account euerie one that is neere them their enemies and prey, and dare also with their pilfering inuasions prouoke your selfe, liuing contented within the bounds of your owne Empire, in peace both in Europe and Asia? and they (forsooth) such as haue by most horrible wrong crept into the royall seat of the most lawfull and noble Kings descended of the blond of Vsun-Cassanes: who after their woonted manner still liue by rapine and robberie? Beleeue mee, Noble Emperour, if you shall vpon a zeale to your religion with your victorious hand take away this staine and plague of Asia, there shall vndoubtedly be erected vnto you so glorious and magnificent a trophie in the middest of Persia, as may bee compared, yea preferred before the Triumphs of your victorious father Selymus. For it is not so much to haue destroyed the Mamalukes (by condition slaues) and the proude Sultans of Ægypt and Syria, as to haue subdued the Persians, famous in antient time for their martiall prowesse, who so often times vanquished by Alexander of Macedon, gaue vnto him the name of Great.

Solyman prickt forward with many such discourses, daily sounded in his eares by the Bassa, began to yeeld to his perswasion. Whereof Abraham himselfe greatly reioyced: for it was thought of many, that he did neuer in heart renounce the Christian Religion, but was onely in outward shew a Turke, and in heart a Christian. Which was the rather coniectured, for that he meruellously fauoured and protected the Christian marchants, furthered by all means the leagues of the Christian Princes with Solyman, and laboured alwaies to turne his forces from them vpon the Persians. And the more to whet him forward, the Bassa had cunningly insinuated into his acquaintance one Mulearbe of Damasco, a man in that time famous in Constantinople, for the opinion the people had generally conceiued of his holinesse and profound knowledge in the secret causes of things, and the art of Magicke; vsing him as a prophet to fill the ambitious mind of Solyman, with assured hope of prosperous successe: which thing the hypocritical wisard, after the manner of such deceiuers, slily performed, prophesying vnto him all happinesse in so religious a warre, and so much (as hee saide) pleasing God. This the Bassaes purpose was much furthered also by Vlemus a noble and valiant Persian, who hauing married the great Persian King Tamas his sister, was reuolted from him to Solyman, fearing to bee called to account for the extortion wherewith hee had grieuously

oppressed the countries whereof he had the gouernment: and being wonderfully countenanced in Solymans court by the great Bassa, did after the manner of disloyall fugitiues perswade Solyman by all means he could to take that war in hand, discouering vnto him the power, state, and strength of the Persian kingdome (which hee could well doe) and plotting vnto him the easiest way for the conquering thereof, offering also vnto him the vttermost of his deuoire. So Solyman filled with the vain hope of the conquest of Persia, yeelded fully vnto the perswasions of the great Bassa, and gaue out his commissions into all parts of his empire, for the raising of a mightie armie for the performance of so great an enterprise; commanding all his captaines and men of war to be readie at the citie of Nice in Bythinia at a certain day appointed. Which his purpose, although it was mightily impugned by his mother, and faire Roxolana his best beloued, as that which altogether proceeded from the Bassa: the one alledging, with what euill successe his grandfather and father had before him attempted that same war; the other assailing him with her passionat affections: but both of them indeed repining at the credit of the Bassa, and in their hearts disdaining, that so great a Monarch should at the pleasure of his seruant be led vp and down the world so far from their companie: for which cause they did what in them lay to haue ouerthrowne the purpose of Abraham, and to haue altreed Solymans former determination. But so strong was the Bassa's credit with his great lord and master, that all these great ladies deuices and prayers were as womens affectionat passions reiected, and the Bassa's counsell (to their no small griefe) in all things regarded.

Solyman resolueth to goe against the Persians.

Abrahams credit maligned by Solymans mother and Roxolana.

The time appointed being come, and all things in readines, Solyman sent Abraham the Bassa, and Vlemas the Persian, before him into Syria with a strong armie, to be readie with the first of the Spring to inuade the Persian King. Which thing the Bassa gladly tooke vpon him, and comming into Syria, wintered with his armie at Aleppo: whither Barbarussa came vnto him for his letters of credence to Solyman, as is before declared. The Spring now approching, Abraham sent Vlemas the fugitiue Persian Prince before him with the light horsmen, the forerunners of his armie, into Mesopotamia as his guide, because the countrey was vnto him best knowne; following not far after himselfe with all his armie. And marching still forward in that manner, came at length without resistance vnto the famous citie of Tauris in Armenia the greater, called in antient time Ecbathana, as is probably by some coniectured: a great and rich citie, but vnwalled and of no strength; where the Persian kings, for the pleasantnesse of the place, and freshnesse of the aire, vsed commonly to be resiant in the heat of the yere. From whence Tamas the Persian King was as then absent, busied in wars with Kezien-bassa, a Prince of the Corasine Hircanians: so that the citizens of Tauris destitute of all helpe, yeelded themselues and the citie vnto the Bassa at his first comming. Tamas the Persian King vnderstanding what had hapned at Tauris, drew neere with his power, warily expecting to haue taken the Turks at some aduantage, and so by policie to haue defeated his enemies, whom he was too weake to meet with in plaine battell. Which thing the warie Bassa well perceiuing, for more assurance by speedie courrours aduertised Solyman of the taking of Tauris, and of the enemies purpose, requesting him with all speed to repaire with his armie to Tauris. Solyman was then come far on his way with a great armie, not by the way of Ancyra, Sebastia, Amasia, the borders of Trapezond, and so ouer Euphrates at Arsenga, into Armenia, as his father Selymus had done before him, because that way was thought longer and more troublesome: but quite another way, on the right hand from Nice in Bythinia, to Iconium, and by Cæsaria to Malathia, where is the notable passage ouer the riuer Euphrates, bursting out by the vallies of the mountaine Antitaurus, from whence the plaines of Mesopotamia (then part of the Persian kingdome) begin to open themselues: through which countrey Solyman marched peaceably with his armie, paying the poore countrey people for whatsoeuer he tooke; and so in foure and fiftie dayes march, came from Nice in Bythinia, to the citie of Coim in Armenia the greater, which is supposed to be built in the ruines of the famous and antient citie Artaxata. But hearing such newes as is aforesaid from the Bassa, he doubled his march, and so in short time after came and ioyned his forces with the Bassa at Tauris. Tamas (who yet dayly expected the comming of the Georgian light horsmen) vnderstanding that Solyman was comming against him with a world of men, thought it not good to abide the comming of so puissant an enemie, but with delay to wearie him out, that drew such a multitude of people after him; and by taking of him at all aduantages, to cut off his people, spent with long trauell, wanting victuall, victuall, and falling into diuers diseases; as it commonly chanceth to populous armies in G strange countries, where the change of the aire, with the ineuitable necessitie alwayes attending vpon a great armie, most times causeth grieuous and contagious diseases. Wherefore Solyman followeth Tamas the Persian king into Sultania. Tamas to shun the comming of Solyman, retyred farther off into Sultania, about six days journey from Tauris. Whereof Solyman hauing knowledge, departed from that rich Citie without doing any harme therein; following after Tamas into Sultania, to joyne battell with him if he could possible: leauing behind him for hast, a great part of his carriages and baggage, with fiue hundred Ianizaries, and three of his Sanzacks with their companies. The citie of Sultania was in antient time one of the royall seats of the Persian Kings, but ruinated by the Scythian Tamerlane, retained no shew of the antient maiestie, but onely in the churches by him spared. Neere vnto this citie Solyman lay incamped many dayes, expecting that the Persian King (in H reuenge of the iniuries to him done, and for the safegard of his honour) should at length come out of the mountaines, and shew himselfe in plaine field, and giue him battell. Which was a thing so far from Tamas his resolution, vpon the due comparing of his owne strength with his enemies, that he retired in such sort, that Solyman could by no means learne what was become of him, or which way to follow him.

Solymans army distressed with tempest. The countrey neere vnto the citie of Sultania, wherein Solyman lay incamped at large, is on euerie side inuironed with hugie mountaines, whose tops are to be seene a far off, alwayes couered with deepe snow: these mountains were in antient time called Nyphates, Caspius, Coathras, and Zagrus, taking their beginning no doubt from Caucasus the father of mountaines; I and joyning one to another, some one way, some another, doe diuide most large and wide Countries. Whilest Solyman in those vast and plaine fields most fit to fight a battell in, expected the comming of Tamas, such a horrible and cruel tempest (as the like whereof the Persians had neuer before seene at that time of the yeare) fell downe from those mountains (which was so much the more strange, for that it fell in the beginning of September) with such abundance of raine, which froze so eagerly as it fell, that it seemed the depth of Winter had euen then of a sudden been come in: for such was the rage of the blustring windes, striuing with themselues as if it had been for victorie, that they swept the snow from off the tops of those high mountaines, and cast it into the plaines in such aboundance, that the Turkes lay as men buried aliue in the deepe snow, most part of their tents being ouerthrowne and beaten downe K to the ground with the violence of the tempest, and weight of the snow; wherein a wonderful number of sicke souldiers and others of the baser sort which followed the campe, perished; and many others were so benummed, some their hands, some their feet, that they lost the vse of them for euer: most part of their beasts which they vsed for carriage, but especially their camels, were frozen to death. Yea Solyman himselfe was in great danger to haue beene ouerwhelmed in his Tent, all the Tents round about him being ouerthrowne with the violence of the tempest. Neither was there any remedie to be found for so great mischiefes, by reason of the hellish darknesse of that tempestuous night, most of their fires being put out by the extremitie of the storme: which did not a little terrifie the superstitious Turks, as a thing accounted of them ominous. And that which troubled them no lesse than the miseries of the tem- L pest, was the feare of the enemie, whose sudden comming they deadly feared: vntill that after so tedious a night, the Sun breaking out the next morning, with his cheerefull beams reuiued many, before readie to giue vp the ghost for cold, and gaue comfort vnto them all in generall, by discouering the open fields cleere of their feared enemies. It was a dreadfull thing to haue seen what miserie that one night had brought into the Turks camp: the ground lay almost couered with bodies of the dead; & many liued but so, as that they accounted the dead more happie than themselues. Many of the Turks vainly thought, that horrible tempest was brought vpon them by the charmes and inchantments of the Persian Magicians: whereas it was vndoubtedly by the hand of him who bringeth the proud deuices of Princes to naught.

Solyman troubled as well with the strangenesse of the accident, as the losse he had receiued, M after he had a little refreshed his discouraged soldiers, rose with his armie, and tooke his way on the left hand into Assyria: Vlemas the Persian persuading him thereunto for many causes, but especially by putting him in hope of the taking of Babylon; for that Mahometes a friend of his, was gouernour thereof. But he when the matter came to proofe, was not to be woon either by promise or reward, to betray the Citie. Wherefore Solyman resolued to take it

A it by force: neither did his fortune faile him therein: for as soone as Mahometes vnderstood that Vlemas was at hand with the forerunners of the Turks armie, and that Solyman with all his power was comming after, (who as he thought would neuer haue come so far;) he not prouided to withstand so mightie an enemie, and not beloued of the citizens, fled out of the citie. Babylon yeelded to Solyman. Solyman comming, in short time after was of the Babylonians receiued without resistance. The citie of Babylon, commonly called Bagdat, rise out of the ruines of the old citie of Babylon, so much spoken of in holy Writ: from whence it is not far distant, standing vpon the riuer Tygris, which not far beneath falleth into the riuer Euphrates. In this famous citie is the seat of the great Calyph, the chiefe Mahometan Priest, whom all the Mahometan Princes haue in great reuerence, and hath an old prerogatiue in the choice and confirmation of the B Kings of Assyria and the Sultans of Ægypt: of which Calyph, Solyman according to the old superstitious manner, receiued at his hands the ensignes and ornaments of the Assyrian kings, and with great bountie woon the hearts of the people: and thereupon resolued to spend that Winter there, billiting his armie in diuers places of that fertile countrey. The other cities of Assyria and Mesopotamia also, namely Caraemida, Meredinum, Orsa, and Asanceса, hearing that Solyman had without resistance taken Babylon, yeelded themselues and receiued his garrisons. Yea the fame thereof was so great, that Embassadours came vnto him as far as Ormus, (a citie in the mouth of Euphrates where it falleth into the Persian gulfe, famous for the great traffique out of India thither) suing vnto him for peace. Thus the antient Citie of Baby- The countries of Assyria and Mesopotamia possessed by the Turke.
C lon, with the great countries of Assyria and Mesopotamia, sometimes famous kingdomes of themselues, and lately part of the Persian kingdome, fell into the hands of the Turks, and became Prouinces of the Turkish empire, in the yeare 1534. Where Solyman after he had spent that Winter in great ioy and triumph, according to the manner of the Turkish gouernement, placed a great commander, which they by a proud name call the Beglerbeg, (which is as much as to say, the lord of lords) and vnder him diuers others for the gouernment of these Countries, by parts, which they cal Sanzacks, who are euer at the command of the Beglerbeg. Whilst he thus wintered at Babylon, he caused Asshender Zelibi (which is to say, Alexander the Noble) his great treasurer for the wars, to be hanged, for that he had vnfaithfully dealt in his Office; and confiscated all his goods.

D Tamas hearing that Solyman was gone to Babylon, returned to Tauris: of whose speedie Tamas comes to Tauris. comming the Ianizaries and other captaines there left by Solyman vnderstanding, fled in haste out of the citie, leauing all such things as were committed to their custodie, for a prey vnto the Persian souldiers.

Solymans armie being mightily increased by the comming vnto him of the great Bassa of 1535
Caire, with the Sanzacks of Alexandria, Iudea, Syria, and Comagena; by the persuasion of Abraham and Vlemas, the Spring now well come on, departed from Babylon again toward Tauris, with purpose either to draw Tamas to battell, or else to his eternall infamie, before his face to sacke that his regall citie. But Tamas aduertised of his comming, and knowing him- Tamas hearing of the comming of Solyman to Tauris, flieth into Hyrcania.
E selfe too weake to giue him battel, forsooke the citie, and fled into the mountains of Hircania: destroying all the countrey before him as he went, and carrying away the inhabitants, leauing nothing to relieue the Turkes souldiers, if they should pursue him. Solyman vnderstanding that Tamas was againe fled, sent Vlemas with all the choice horsemen of his armie to ouertake him if it were possible, and to fight with him. But when he had followed him two or three days journy, and still found the country desolate as he went, yeelding neither forrage for his horses, nor reliefe for his men, and saw no hope to ouertake the king; he began as a prouident General, to forecast the extremities like to befal in his return thorow those desolat countries with the enemie at his heeles: and therupon in time retired back againe to Solyman, declaring vnto him what had happened. Who fretting in his mind, that the Persian king was not to be drawne to battel, marched forthwith to Tauris, entring it without resistance, the citizens sub-F mitting themselues vnto him: whose liues spared, he gaue that rich citie for a prey to his soldiers, who left neither house nor corner thereof vnransacked, abusing the poore citizens with all manner of insolencie; euery common souldier without controlment fitting himselfe with whatsoeuer best pleased his greedie desire or filthie lust. Tamas had in this citie a most stately Solyman ransacks Tauris. and royal palace; so had also most part of the nobilitie their sumptuous & rich houses, which by the commandment of Solyman were all rased down to the ground, and the greatest part of the

the best citisens and beautifull personages of all sort and condition, at his departure thence carried away captiues. Solyman contenting himselfe to haue done the Persian king this disgrace, in spoyling this his rich and royall citie, returned again towards Mesopotamia, destroying the countries all the way as he went, killing the verie beasts and cattell, thereby the more to impouerish the Persians, wishing to leaue nothing vnto them but penurie and miserie. Hee was scarcely past Coim & the Calderan fields (famous for his fathers victory against Hismael) but that certain troups of Persian horsemen were in the taile of his armie, and had taken away some of his baggage, and slaine diuers of the sicke and stragling soldiers, and with their often skirmishes did not a little trouble his whole armie. Besides that, it was noysed thorow all his campe, That Tamas himselfe was comming after him with a greater power of horsemen, taken vp in Hiberia, Albania, Parthia, Media, and Armenia, and would be at their backs before they could get out of Armenia: for which cause he appointed the two great Bassa's of Caire and Syria (for so they were called) and Vlemas the Persian, with 18000 good soldiers to follow him in the reareward of his armie, to receiue and represse the sudden assaults of the Persians, if need should require: and so still kept on his march, vntill he was come to Amida, now called Caraemida, an antient citie of Mesopotamia. In the meane time Tamas the Persian king was returned to Tauris with a mighty armie, in hope there to haue suddenly surprised his enemie, surcharhed with the pleasures of so rich a citie: but finding him gone, and beholding the miserable spoyle and desolation he had made in the citie; mooued with indignation, hee resolued to pursue him whither soeuer he were gone, and was now on his way as far as Coim. Where vnderstanding that Solyman was gone so farre before, that he was hardly to be ouertaken, and finding the noble gentlemen in his armie vnwilling in their heauy armour to vndertake such a pursuit, as could not be performed without the wonderfull toyle of themselues, and most assured losse of their goodly horses; alledging, that they were prouided to fight a battel, and not to trauel so long a journy (all which, Tamas now that his choler was ouer knew to stand with good reason) he changed his former determination, thinking it best there to stay and not to follow the pursuit of his enemies any further: vntill that Delimenthes one of his Noblemen (alwayes more forward than the rest) offered with fiue thousand chosen horsemen to ouertake some part of the Turks armie, and to do on them some good seruice. Which his offer Tamas gladly accepted, commending him greatly for the same, promising him most honorable reward: and so in haste sent him away.

He forthwith taking the wel knowne and neerest way, vsed such expedition, that he was in hope to ouertake the rereward of the Turks armie (marching not far now before him) about the foot of the mountaine Taurus, as in deed it fell out at a place called Bethlis. This Bethlis is a famous towne in the confines of the Persian kingdome, where it bordereth vpon Mesopotamia, standing in a pleasant valley, by which runneth a little riuer falling out of the mountain Antitaurus; and had a castle kept with a garrison of Persians. In this valley the two Bassa's of Caire and Syria (conducted by Vlemas) thinking they had now bin past all danger of the enemies pursuit, stayd with the rereward of his armie to refresh their wearied soldiers, vpon certaine knowledge, that Solyman with the rest of his armie was alreadie come in safetie to Amida in Mesopotamia. And therefore lay as men secure, without any suspition of the comming of the Persians, whom they had not so much as heard any thing of in long time before. But Delimenthes vsing most faithfull and diligent espials of that countrey people, by that time he was come within one dayes journey of Bethlis, vnderstood certainly where the Turks lay, wearie of their long trauell, as men without feare, keeping little or no watch in their campe: Whereupon he determined in the dead time of the night following to assaile them in their camp: & by secret messengers gaue knowledge both of his comming, & of this his purpose, to the captaine of the castle of Bethlis; requesting him at an appointed houre vpon signe giuen, to be readie to sallie out with his garrison vpon that side of the Turkes campe which was towards the Castle. Which his venturous designement was so furthered both by the darkenesse of the night, and the aboundance of raine which fell at the same time, as if it had beene wished for; that he was got with all his resolute followers within the Turkes campe, before they were aware of his comming: where the Persian souldiers as wolues amongst sheepe, did such speedie execution amongst the sleepie Turkes, that the two great Bassa's and Vlemas had much adoo to get to horse and saue themselues by flight. And such was the furie of the Persians, fians, and the greatnesse of the sudden feare increased by the darkenesse of the night, that the Turks not knowing which way to turne themselues, or what to do, were slaine by thousands, some sleeping, some halfe waking, some making themselues readie to fight, and some to flie, few of all that great armie escaped the sword of the Persians. Of the fiue great Sanzackes which were in the armie, three were slaine, and one taken. Eight hundred Ianizaries seeing themselues forsaken of their chiefetaines, laid downe their harquebusies and other weapons, and yeelded themselues vpon Delimenthes his word. The fierce mountaine people also, who in former time had suffered great iniuries of the Turks, after the death of Aladeules their king, had now ioyned themselues to the Persians, and notably reuenged their wrongs; to whose share all the baggage of the Turks campe fell for a prey. It might then well haue bin sayd of the Turks, which the Poet speaketh of the night wherein Troy was sackt:

Quis cladem illius noctis qui funera fando explicet? ———

The slaughter of that night was so great, that it is of the Turks vntill this day accounted amongst their greatest losses: and the victorie so welcome to the Persians, that in memoriall thereof they kept that day (which was the thirteenth of October) as one of their solemne holidayes for many yeares after. Delimenthes returning all bloudie with the slaughter of the Turks, & loded with their spoiles, was of Tamas ioyfully receiued, and honorably rewarded.

Solyman discouraged.

This ouerthrow reported to Solyman by the two great Bassa's and Vlemas, as men that had hardly escaped shipwrecke, so daunted his proud conceits, that he resolued in himselfe to return home, and no further to prosecute that vnfortunat war; the euill euent whereof, his mother (as he said) had more truly presaged, than had the cold Prophet Mulearabe: but secretly in minde displeased with Abraham the great Bassa, by whose persuasion hee had taken in hand that dangerous expedition. By the way as he went he was met at Iconium by Barbarussa and Sinan Bassa syrnamed the Iew, a man for his skill at sea in reputation next to Barbarussa. These two great personages lately come from Algiers to Constantinople with the remainder of his fleet, met him so far by land, to shew their ioyfulnesse for the conquest he had made of Mesopotamia and Assyria, and to excuse themselues for the losse of the kingdome of Tunes; which woon by Barbarussa in the beginning of the Persian war, was before the ending thereof againe wrung out of his hands by Charles the Emperor, and restored to Muleasses, as shall be hereafter declared. They with great humilitie declared vnto him the whole processe of that war, and with what successe they had endured the force of Charles the Emperour himselfe in person: shewing plainly vnto him, that there wanted neither valour in the souldiers, nor direction in them the commanders, but only fortune, which as it mightily raigneth in all mens actions, so especially in matters of war. Solyman graciously accepted of their excuse, and curteously took them vp, prostrate at his feet, commending them for their valor in their euil haps, in a plot so well by them laid, more than he did the victory of others, got by good fortune, not grounded vpon any good reason: willing them to be of good cheere, saying, that he would in short time find occasion for them to recompence that disgrace, and again to shew their approued valour.

After long trauell he came to the strait of Bosphorus, where Abraham the Bassa going before him, had in token of triumph caused the shore all along the place where he should go aboord the gallie prouided for his transportation, to be couered with Persian silke for him to tread vpon: from whence he passed with much triumph ouer to his palace to Constantinople.

Abraham The great Bassa in disgrace with Solyman.

Enuie, the fatall and cruell companion of Princes immoderat fauours, had with her prying eys quickly discouered in court Solymans changed countenance vpon the great Bassa, & began now to shew her gastly face. They which before were most ready to do him all honor possible, yea to haue laid their hands vnder his feet, sought now by all secret means to worke his disgrace and confusion. But of all others, the two great ladies, Solymans mother and the faire Roxolana, ceased not by dayly complaints to incense Solyman against him: the mother, for that he had by his persuasion, contrary to her mind and her superstitious obseruations, drawn her son into the dangers of the Persian war: and Roxolana, for that he most honoured and sought the preferment of Mustapha, Solymans eldest sonne by another woman: whereas she aboue all things laboured by all subtill means to prefer Baiazet her owne sonne to the Empire after the death of Solyman his father: which her designement she perceiued to be much crossed by the credit which the Bassa had with her Solyman, and therefore did what she might, both to bring him him out of fauour, and to worke his destruction. But that which most impared his credit with G Solyman, was the common report raised of him by his enemies, That he being in heart a Christian, did in all things fauour the Christians, (a thing most odious among the Turks) and had for that cause craftily persuaded Solyman to take in hand the vnfortunat Persian war. And that which more increased the suspition, was, That he about that time had caused one Marke Nicholas a Venetian merchant (who had not without the suspition of some, oftentimes come vnto him with letters and secret messages whilest he lay at Babylon) to be taken in the night, and murdred at Constantinople, and cast into the sea, because he should not discouer any thing that might be hurtfull vnto him. Abraham thus brought in disgrace with Solyman, was (after the manner of the Turkish tyrannie) bid to a solemne supper in the court about the fourteenth of March (after which time he was neuer more seene. It is reported, That after supper Solyman H fell into a great rage with him, charging him bitterly, That he had misgouerned the State, inuerted his treasures to his own priuat, and as a traitor, had secret intelligence with the Christian Princes his enemies: for proofe whereof, Solyman with sterne countenance shewed him his owne letters, which had by chance beene intercepted; oftentimes asking him in furious manner, If he knew not that hand, if he knew not that seale. All which, the Bassa lying prostrat at his feet humbly confessed, and with many teares craued of him pardon. But his hard heart was not by any prayers to be moued: for the same night as he was slumbring vpon a palat in the court, ouercome with heauinesse, an Eunuch cut his throat with a crooked knife, which Solyman for that purpose had deliuered vnto him with his owne hand. He was murdered sleeping, because Solyman had in former time of his fauour solemnly sworne vnto him, That he I would neuer kill him whilest he liued. By which oath, the great Mahometan Priest sayd hee was not so bound, but that he might kill him sleeping, for as much as men by sleepe depriued of sence, are for that time not to be accounted as liuing, but as dead, mans life consisting altogether (as he said) in liuely actions. It is reported, that after Solyman had looked vpon the dead bodie, and bitterly curst the same, he caused a great weight to be tied vnto it, and so cast it into the sea. His treasure and goods, which were almost infinite, were the next day all seised vpon for the Emperor, and a small portion thereof appointed for his poore wife to liue vpon. His death was no sooner knowne, but that the vulgar people deuised of him infamous songs, and slanderous reports, as of a traitor most iustly condemned; & in further despight, with mire and stones defaced the trophies of the Hungarian victorie, which he had in a stately manner K erected before his sumptuous house in Constantinople. This was the wofull end of Abraham the great Bassa, who whilest he stood in fauour with his Prince, was of all others accounted most fortunate, wanting nothing but the name of the great Sultan: but after falling into disgrace, became the scorne of fortune, and the lamentable spectacle of mans fragilitie. Hee was murthered the fifteenth day of March, in the yeare 1536.

The causes that mooued Charles the Emperor to inuade Tunes.

How the kingdom of Tunes was by Barbarussa (the Turks great Admirall) taken from Mulasses, we haue alreadie told: but how the same was again taken from him by Charles the Emperor a little before the returne of Solyman out of Persia, remaineth now to be declared. It was commonly reported, and not without iust cause feared, that Barbarussa, possessed of the kingdome of Tunes, and supported by the power of Solyman, would the next Summer, not L content himselfe with the spoile of the coasts of Spaine, Sardinia, and Italie, as he had in former time, but with all his forces inuade Sicilia, the garnarie and storehouse of Italie, and from thence attempt to conquer the kingdom of Naples, which it was thought he in his immoderat desires had longed much after. To represse this his barbarous insolencie, and to work the safetie of the frontiers of the Christian kingdomes (much subiect to the rapines of the Turkish pyrats) Charles the Emperour resolued in person himselfe with a puissant armie to passe ouer into Affricke, whilest Solyman was yet buried in the Persian wars, and by force of arms to dispossesse the tyrant of his new gotten kingdome in Tunes. For the accomplishment whereof, he caused soldiers to be leuied in all parts of Spaine, and came downe to Barcelona with eight amongst whom were many of the nobilitie of Spaine, with their followers most gallantly appoynted: but especially Ferdinand of Toledo, Duke of Alba; whose forwardnesse in that honorable action, with the desire he had to reuenge the death of his father Garzias, slaine before by the Moores at Girapolis, gaue great hope euen then vnto his Countreymen, That he would Andrew Auria the Emperours Admirall.

In the meane time Andrew Auria the great Admirall, vnto whom onely for his approued fidelitie and long experience the Emperor had fully communicated what he had with himselfe before purposed, had with wonderfull diligence and celeritie rigged vp a great fleet of ships and gallies so furnished with all manner of warlike prouision, as might wel haue sufficed a great army: whereunto he ioined also his own fleet of 17 gallies and three galeasses, wherin he had imbarked the flower of Genoa and Liguria, who with exceeding cheerefulnesse had voluntarily offered themselues to follow him their old Generall in that sacred expedition. With this great preparation Auria came to the Emperour at Barcelonia. Thither came also Lewis the king of Portingals brother (whose sister Isabel, Charles the Emperour had married)
B with 25 Carauels, ships which the Portingals vsed in their Indian voyages, amongst whome was also one huge Galeon; all ships well appointed and fit for seruice, wherein were embarked 2000 Portingals, beside marriners: there also arriued sixtie saile of tall ships sent out of Flanders and the Low-countries; wherin were a great number of condemned persons, whose liues were spared that they might serue in the gallies. Vnto this warre Paulus the third of that name, then Bishop of Rome, sent ten gallies vnder the conduct of Virginius Vrsinus: the great Master of Malta sent thither his fleet also. At the same time that all this preparation was in making in other places, that worthie chiefetaine Alphonsus D'aualus Vastius, whom the Emperor had appointed Generall of all his forces at land, had by the Emperors commandement
C taken vp fiue thousand new souldiers in Italie, which were led by Hieronimus Tutauilla, Countie of Sarne, Fredericke, Caracte, and Augustine Spinola, all famous captaines. The old Spanish garrisons which lay in Lombardie, the Emperor commanded to be straitly looked vnto, that none of them should leaue their places to goe into this new expedition, but to remaine there still vnder their Generall Antonius Leua: which worthie captaine although hee would faine haue had him with him, as of all his great commanders the best; yet he thought it good to spare him, both for that he was much troubled with the gout, and also for that it was necessarie (as he thought) to leaue such a valiant captaine with his garrisons in the countrey, so neere vnto the French and Swissers, whom he durst not so well trust as to dis-furnish that countrey
D either of so great a commander, or of the woonted garrisons. At the same time Maximilian Eberstein, an old commander, came to Vastius with eight thousand Germans, ouer the Tridentine Alpes to Millaine, and so to Genoa; amongst whom were diuers noble Gentlemen, who then as voluntarie men serued of their owne charges. With these Germanes and the fiue thousand Italians, Vastius embarked himselfe at the port called Portus Veneris, in Liguria: hauing before persuaded them, with patience to indure the tediousnesse of the sea, and to comfort themselues with the hope of the victorie in Affrick; where they should fight in the quarrel of God, and for the Emperor, who did neuer forget his religious and valiant souldiers. So sailing
E alongst the coast of Italie, he came to Naples, where the viceroy and diuers other of the nobilitie had of their owne charges, euery man according to his deuotion or abilitie, built or furnished some one gallie, some moe, for that seruice. It was a wonder to see with what cheerfulnesse the gallants and lustie youths of Naples, and all that part of Italie, came and offered themselues vnto Vastius; so that it seemed there was none left behind in Naples: for he had with singular courtesie so woon the hearts of the old souldiers and lustie youths of that kingdome, that both the one and the other thought it a most honourable thing to adorne, the one their before deserued pensions, and the other their first entrance into martial affaires, with the participation of so notable a victorie. But whilest euery man was thus busied in setting forward, certaine mutinous souldiers (wearie of the sea, and fearing the dangers of so long a voyage) began to cast many perils, to finde fault with their small wages, and to discourage the multitude, persuading them with seditious speeches to forsake their colours, and to run away: for redresse whereof, Vastius caused the anthours of that mutinie to be taken and thrust into sacks, and in the sight of the whole fleet to be cast into the sea. So Vastius departing with his F fleet from Naples, came in few daies to Palermo in Sicilie. The Emperour also loosing from Barcelona, came to the Port of Mago in the Island of Minorica, and from thence to Caralis in Sardinia, whether Alphonsus Vastius was a little before come with all his fleet out of Sicilie. Not long after, the Emperour, now that all his forces were come together, passed ouer from Sardinia into Affricke, and with a faire Westerly winde put into the Port of of Vtica, which is of the seafaring men called Farina. In the entring wherof, the Admirall galley, wherein the Emperor himselfe was, by great mischance strake vpon a sand, & there stucke fast: which so much more troubled the Emperor, for that his father Philip had by like mishap bin like to haue bin cast away vpon the coast of England, as hee was sailing out of the Low-countries into Spaine: howbeit, by the good direction of Auria she was quickly got off the sand againe, and entred with the rest, to the great reioycing of the whole fleet. So presently departing again from Vtica, and sailing alongst the coast, he doubled the promontorie of Carthage, yet famous for the ruins of that proud citie, and came to anker before a castle, which of a well beneath it, is called by the name of Aquaria, or the water castle. The Moores, who from the hils of Vtica and their watch towers, had taken view of the Christian fleet and of the course it held, aduertised Barbarussa, That the Christians were comming against him with an innumerable fleet: for there was of one sort and other almost 700 saile, whereof 82 were great gallies, which gallantly garnished with flags and streamers, made a shew of moe than indeed they were, and wonderfully terrified the enemie. But that troubled Barbarussa most, that he was by messenger vpon messenger certainly informed, that the most mighty Christian Emperour Charles was in person himselfe in the fleet, with such a world of people, that it should seeme he had left none in Spaine and Italie that were able to beare armes. Which newes was brought by certain Mahometan slaues, who getting loose in the gallies, had in the night swum ashore, and reported the certaintie of the Emperours comming: for the proud Turke, great contemner of the Christian forces, neuer thought that the Emperour would haue aduentured his person vnto the dangers of the sea, and chances of warre, especially in an vnknowne barren and scorching countrey, but would rather haue attempted to doe something by his Lieutenants; or else by Auria his Admirall seeke to surprise some base places alongst the sea coast, but not to come directly for the regall citie of Tunes: in which opinion he was chiefly confirmed by Aloysius Præsenda, a gentleman of Genoa, who taken at sea, was kept as prisoner at large in Tunes: of whom Barbarussa had learned many things concerning the state of Italie, the manner of the Christians, and strength of the Emperour; craftily feeding him with the hope of libertie, if he would truly declare vnto him such things as he desired to know. Wherfore now in his rage he caused him to be brought before him; charging him bitterly, that he had craftily and perfidiously told him lies for truth, concerning the Emperor, and therefore commanded him to be forthwith executed. When he had thus with the vnworthie death of a guiltlesse Christian, somwhat mittigated the griefe of his light beleefe, he forthwith began to cast with himselfe how he might best withstand his puissant enemie. And first of all calling to counsell his sea captains, in whom for their approued valor he reposed most confidence, he shewed vnto them, that they as valiant men, acquainted with the dangers attending vpon honorable actions, were not to doubt of the victorie, forsomuch as he saw as it good as alreadie gained; for the same reasons for which he had before persuaded himselfe, that the Emperour (if he had not bin halfe mad) would not haue vndertaken so desperat and doubtfull a warre.

In his rage he executeth Aloysius Præsenda.

Barbarussa encourageth his souldiers.

For who is there (said hee) that knoweth this countrey (not to speake of our owne forces) which would not reasonably thinke our enemies should in short time know the price of their ambitious desire and rash attempt? which in a most vnseasonable time of the yeare, the dayes beeing now at the longest, and the Sunne in his greatest strength, are come to fight in a countrey scortched with heat, and altogether without water; where the verie sand which riseth with euerie blast of wind, flying into their eyes and faces, shall no lesse trouble them than their enemies? Shall we thinke that they, which as I heare for most part are fresh-water souldiers, and surcharged with heauie armor, can easily march forward, or retire, or yet keepe their ground, as the diuers occasions of battell shall require: when as the deepe and hollow burning sand vp to the mid leg, will not suffer them to keepe any order of array? How shall they bee able by any meanes to abide the force of our Turkish footmen, or the often charging of the nimble Numidian horsemen? And if they bee so many of them as they say there is, where can they get victuall to feed such a multitude, if wee doe but protract the warre? Assurealy (most valiant and couragious chiefetaines) wee shall erect a most rare and incomparable trophie in this countrey of Affricke: when as Charles the rich and great Emperour of the Christians shall either heere bee slaine in battell, or else fall into our hands as a most rich prey. For mine owne part, I will notably prouide, that you shall want neither weapons, victuall, nor aide, during the time of this warre: I will open the

the old armories, broach my store, and bring forth my treasures. The Numidian princes now our friends, I will without delay entertaine with great pay, and such Presents as shall be to them most welcome. As for the citizens of Tunes, you know how easily they are to be kept in obedience, and brought on against the enemie for a small pay, and hope of reward. But this one thing is it that I most earnestly require of your approued valor, That you most valiantly defend the strong Castle of Guletta, as the most assured defence not of this city onely, but of the whole kingdome; and especially of our nauie which there lieth in safe harbour: for that piece will our enemies with all their forces first assaile. Wherefore, as worthie men neuer to be vanquished, keepe that for Solyman and mee: so that it being vainly attempted by our enemies, and resolutely defended by you, the Christian Emperor there failing of his purpose, and shamefully foiled, shall now begin to despaire, not of the taking of the citie of Tunes, but of his owne returne and safetie.

When he had thus said, the sea captains answered with one consent, That they would most willingly and cheerfully performe whatsoeuer it should please him to command: and in confirmation therof, promised him not to do any thing which beseemed not most valiant and resolute men. Amongst these sea captains, Sinan of Smirna a Iew, who had lost his right eie, was both for his age and long experience in militarie affaires, of greatest account: next vnto him was Haidinus of Cilicia, for his furiousnesse in fight surnamed of the Italians Cacciadiabolo, and Salec of Ionia; which two had before in a great battell at sea, slaine Rodericus Portendus great Admirall of Spaine, and taken his son Iohn prisoner, and seuen great gallies: after these, was Tabacches of Laodicia, and Giaffer a valiant captaine of the Ianizaries: all which were notable pyrates, and then men of great fame. The strong castle of Gulletta standeth in the bottome of the bay of Carthage, vpon a point of the land, where the sea by a narrow strait runneth on the East side of the castle into the lake of Tunes, which being in a manner round, is about 12 Italian miles ouer. But now that castle is parted from the maine on the West side also, by the sea that way let in; which chargeable worke was by Barbarussa begun, but giuen ouer againe by him, perswaded by some, That the sea comming in that way, would in short time fil vp the lake with sand: but was afterwards for all that, perfected by others. So that now it standeth in the manner of an Iland, in the mouth of the lake, diuided from the firm land by two narrow strait passages; the one on the East, and the other on the West; yet so, that it commandeth both. This castle Barbarussa had before strongly fortified both with men and munition, as the key of that kingdome: but now vpon the comming of the Emperour, he put into it his most expert and resolute captaines before named: well foreseeing, that in the defence thereof rested the safetie of his nauie which then lay within the lake, as in a most sure harbour; and also the greatest hope he had for the holding of the citie of Tunes, whereon depended the whole state of that kingdome. The Emperor lying at anchor with all his fleet neere vnto the shore, gaue generall commandement, that his souldiers should with as much speed as was possible be landed with the long boats: which was so orderly done, that the Moores terrified with the hideous crie of the souldiers, making toward land, and not able to abide the showers of small shot, were easily beaten from the shore, whither they were come downe in great multitudes, and so suffered the Christian souldiers to land quietly. The first that landed were the Spanish companies, after them the Italians, and last of all the Germans, whom Vastius Generall of the army caused presently to encampe themselues; straitly commanding, that no man should straggle from the camp farther into the land, vntil the horsemen and great artillerie were all landed. The Emperour himselfe bearing victorie in the cheerfulnesse of his countenance, landed also. In the mean time certaine companies were sent out by the Generall, to view the places nighhand, and to seeke out the cisternes and fountaines of fresh waters thereabout, which sometime serued the famous citie of Carthage; with whom the Moores, but especially the Numidian horsemen, a swift, subtle, and painefull kind of souldiers, oftentimes and in many places suddenly skirmished: and though they were but naked men, yet taking all the aduantages they could of the places to them well knowne, with their arrowes and darts furiously assailed them vnawares, and ouerloaded with armour, sparing no mans life that fell into their hands. Among whom was Hieronimus Spinnula a Ligurian captaine, who ouerthrowne by a Numidian horseman, had his head cut off, and carried away by the same nimble horseman, before hee could bee rescued. The like mishap befell Fredericus Carellus a noble Gentleman, who going with Vastius

to view the places thereabouts, was fast by his side suddenly slaine with a small shot. All G which nimblenesse and fiercenesse of the enemie, could not for all that stay the Emperor: but that he would needs with a small troupe of horsemen, in person himselfe take view of the places thereabouts, euen in the sight of the Numidian horsemen, which were in euery place to be seene pricking vp and downe the countrey in troupes; although he was many times requested by his graue counsellors, to leaue that seruice for his inferior captains, & not to expose himself to so great danger both of his person & of the cõmon safety. Vastius had now brought on the armie neere vnto the castle of Guletta, still casting vp a rolling trench as he came neerer thereunto, thereby to keep his men out of the danger of the enemies shot: which worke was not done only by the pioners and gallie slaues, but by souldiers of all sorts; yea many of the H captaines themselues laid their hands to the spade and mattocke: for why, the Emperor was there a continuall beholder, and cheerfull commender of euery mans labor and forwardnesse, and the busie enemie was euer readie to take the aduantage, if any thing were by negligence omitted, oftentimes sallying out euen vnto the very trenches of the Christians, there giuing vnto them proud words of defiance. When the armie was to be martialled, and euery commander to be appointed to the place of his charge in this siege of Guletta: the countie of Sarne (a man famous both for the honour of his house, and for the good seruice hee had lately done against the Turks at Corone) requested of Vastius the Generall, to haue the charge of the mount neerest vnto the castle; which as it was a place of most danger, so was it also of greatest honor. Whereat the old Spaniards (after the manner of their proud nature) much repined. I Vpon the top of this mount, the countie set vp his rich tent in the eie of the enemy, and there lay with the Italian companies ouer whom he commanded. He had not there lien long, but Salec, one of the Turks famous pirats, with certaine companies of the garrison souldiers, sallied out of the castle directly vpon the mount whereon the countie lay; and by making shew as Salec sallieth out vpon the countie and the Italians. if he would desperatly haue assailed the same, raising a great alarme against the Italians: yet so as after certaine vollies of shot discharged on both sides, he began to retire as if he had beene thereto constrained. Which thing the county perceiuing, being a man of greater courage than direction, in great rage with bitter words reproued certaine of the captaines, whom hee perceiued not so forward in pursuit of the enemie as he would haue had them: and in his furie ran downe from the mount, the rest for shame following him, and ouertaking the enemies K slew diuers of them. The craftie pyrat now seeing the countie drawne out of his strength into the plaine ground, and perceiuing himselfe strong enough to encounter him, suddenly turning himselfe about, said vnto his souldiers: The aduantage you wished to haue of your enemies is now offred, they are now in your danger; wherefore now shew your selues valiant men, and suffer not one of these proud fresh-water souldiers to escape aliue or vnwounded. Which he had no sooner said, but they presently made a stand, and so hardly charged them from whom they but euen now seemed to flie, that the Italians not able longer to indure the fight, betooke themselues to flight.
The countie himselfe with Belingerus his kinsman, fighting valiantly in the formost of his companies, was slaine; many others indured the same fortune: others flying backe againe to the mount, were slaine there by the Turks; who resolutely entred into the trenches with them L so far, that they caried away with them the plate and riches of the counties tent. Neither was there any of the Spaniards which lay neerest vnto them, and might easily haue rescued them, that would once stir out of their places to helpe them: for it is reported, that they were nothing sorie for the ouerthrow of the Italians, forasmuch as the countie had so arrogantly cra-ued of the Generall the most honourable place, which he so euill held. His head & right hand Vastius comforted with cheerfull speeches, imputing all that losse, neither to the valour of the enemie, or cowardise of the Italians; but onely to the rashnesse of the countie, whome he said worthilie to haue paied the price of his inconsiderat forwardnesse. But the Spaniards hee

The Spaniards reioycing at the ouerthrow of the Italians, are themselues foiled by Tabaccbes. great ordnance, shewed the ioy they conceiued of this victory.

It oftentimes so falleth out, that whilest men laugh at their neighbors harmes, their own is not far off; and so it fell out with the Spaniards: for Tabaccbes another of the piraticall captains, shortly after sallying suddenly out of the castle in the dawning of the day, was got vp to the

A the top of the trenches wherein the Spaniards lay, before they were aware of his comming, and there slew some as they were asleepe, some idlie sitting fearing no harme, others, as they were arming themselues; and with their sudden crie, caused the rest which lay neere vnto that place, shamefully for feare to flie out of their trenches: where the Turks taking such trash as they there found, and hauing slaine and wounded many, amongst whom was one Cardenasa a captaine, and carrying away with them the enfigne of Sarmentus which stood vpon the top of the trench, returned with victory. The alarme raised in the armie was such, as that the Emperor himselfe came running to the place in his armor, seuerely reprouing them of cow-which had forsaken the place; and grieuously offended with them which had kept vnsuffiligent watch against such an enemie, as was not for wilinesse, agilitie, and courage, to bee B slightly regarded of the best and most expert souldiers. This disgrace of the Spaniards wa comforted the Italians, to see the old souldiers no lesse ouertaken in their negligence, than they had been in their vnaduised forwardnesse.

This tumult appeased, Vastius called into his tent the Colonels and chiefe Captaines of the Spaniards, and spake vnto them in this manner:

Friends (said he) elsewhere alwaies valiant, who together with me, haue by your inuincible prowesse gained vnto our Emperor many most glorious victories; you seeme vnto me at this time to haue needs to be called vpon, and to beput in remembrance of your wonted and approued valor: for as far as I can see, the remembrance of your antient fame, is in you growne altogether cold: your hands are become faint C for feare; and that which I am sorie and ashamed to say, you are growne I know not how altogether out of order, and heartlesse, shewing no courage for the subduing of these naked pyrats. Yesterday (as many say) you smiled at the vnskilfull and vnfortunat forwardnesse of your friends, which they bought deere; but to day they worthily laugh at your degenerat carelesse negligence: so that it concerneth you in honour, to blot out this so foule and publicke a disgrace, by some notable and worthie exploit. Wherefore I exhort you, and I straightly charge and command you, that with all speed you prepare both your minds and weapons for the atchieuement of some new honour: so that if the proud enemie shall againe presume to come forth and assaile your trenches, you shall forthwith breake out vpon him, and beat him backe againe euen to the gates of Guletta. Perhaps good fortune will so attend your valiant and resolute pursuit, that you may together with their disordered men, enter some of their rampiers, wherein we see their D whole hope consisteth: which if it shal otherwise fall out than is hoped for, yet shall you by this your notable deuoire wonderfull content the Emperour your soueraigne, and me your Generall, and withall, couer your late dishonour.

Wherunto they all answered, That they would so beare themselues against the enemie, as that hee should not desire greater courage or contempt of danger in men desirous of honour and commendation.

It was not long, but that the Turks incouraged with their former successe, after their wonted The Turks sally against out of Guletta.
manner sallied out againe, conducted by Giaffer captaine of the Ianizaries, a man of exceeding courage and strength of bodie: who with the Ianizaries and certaine companies of Moorish E archers, about the noone time of the day issuing out of the castle, assailed the vttermost trenches, hoping in that broiling heat to find the Christians in their stations negligent and vnprepared: wherin he was nothing deceiued; for the Spaniards that burning hoat time of the day, kept such negligent watch, that Giaffer with his Ianizaries and archers, was got vp to the top of the rampiers, and there discharged their shot & arrowes vpon the Christians in their trenches, before they were well aware of his comming. But vpon the striking vp of the drum, certaine companies of harquebusiers brake out vpon them in two places at one instant, as Vastius had before commanded; whom hee seconded with a company of halbardiers, keeping in rea-dines his squadrons to rescue his harquebusiers, if they should be inforced by the enemie to F retire: & in that order expected the euent of the skirmish, which was most valiantly maintained on both sides. For the Ianizaries, although they were inforced to giue ground, yet (as men not vsed to flie, & standing vpon the honor of their order) withstood the Christians with no lesse resolution than they were by them charged; vntill that Giaffer their leader, desirous fighting among the formost of the Ianizaries, was at once shot in with a bullets, & [illegible] dead bodie the Ianizaries laboring to carrie away, indured a most cruell fight, many being hurt

both sides slaine vpon his dead carkasse: yet at length they were inforced to flie, and so fiercely followed by the Spaniards, that they of Guletta, when they had receiued in the formost, shut out almost a fourth part of their owne men, for feare the Christians should together with them haue entred the castle. Didacus Abila, one of the Spanish ensigne-bearers, aduanced his ensigne vnto the top of one of the enemies rampiers, and was there slaine, but his ensigne saued by one of the souldiers of the same band. The Christians receiued more losse in their retreat, than they had in all the fight; for the Turks from their rampiers then discharged their shot as fast as they could vpon them, which they could not before doe, without the like danger to their own men mingled amongst them. This daies worke well abated the pride of the Turks, and gaue good hope to the Christians, that the castle would without any great losse be gained: for being neere vnto it, they perceiued it not to be so strong as they had supposed.

The Emperor hauing spent a few daies in consultation about his farther proceeding and preparing of things for the siege, resolued without further delay with all his forces to assaile the castle, perswaded thereunto by many reasons: first, by the cheerfulnes of his own soldiers and the courage of his enemies sore danted in the last skirmish, which he was loth they should againe recouer by the comming of new supplies; besides that, hee was informed, that diuers companies of the Numidians were comming to Tunes, entertained by Barbarussa, whose strength was like daily to encrease: but that which moued him most to hasten the matter, was, for that his men began to grow sickly in his camp, being all the day time scortched as it were with the feruent heat of the Sun; and well neere starued in the night with cold and exceeding dewes wherwith they were commonly wet to the skin; neither was there either good water, or fresh victuall by any meanes to be had in that sandie and barren soile, for the reliefe of the sicke, other than that was brought out of the fleet; for all the water thereabout was most vnpleasant and exceeding brackish, so that both sicke and whole were glad when they could get a crab to quench their extreame thirst: although the Emperor did what hee might to remedie these extremities, and much reliefe was in good time sent both from Sicilia and Naples: the bisket also in the ships, especially in the Spanish gallies, was growne hoarie and vnwholesome. Wherefore he began to place his batterie about the 15 of Iuly, which was defended all alongst with Gabions, and caske filled with sand, for that the countrey soyle in that place yeelded neither earth nor turfe to do it. Auria appointed to batter the castle by sea, diuided his gallies into three squadrons which orderly succeeding one another, should by turnes beat the same: his great ships rid at anker, and out of their forecastles thundered with their great ordnance. And Vastius at land had diuided the army into three battels; Spaniards, Italians, and Germans, euery station by themselues, in such sort, as that they might indifferently be partakers both of the danger of the assault, & of the glorie of the victory. There was neuer strong place in the memorie of man (since guns, that fatal engine were first inuented for the destruction of mankind) assailed with greater force, greater preparation, or industrie. The great ordnance in maner of a great earthquake, so terribly roared & thundred, that the earth seemed not only to tremble & quake vnder mens feet, but euen by and by to rent in sunder & swallow them vp: and the sea which was euen now quiet and calme, began to rise aloft, and to rage and fome as if it had bin in a great storm: at which time the aire became thicke, and the skie darkned with the smoke of the great artillerie: from the breake of the day vntil noon, the roaring cannon and culuering neuer ceased: so that the Vamures were beaten downe, the castle made faultable, & the wals so shaken, that in many places the Turks canoniers, together with their cannons lay buried in the ruins thereof. Which thing perceiued, they which were before appointed to giue the first assault, vpon signal giuen by the Emperor, presently vpon the ceasing of the great artillerie assailed the breach, & others with their scaling ladders scaled the wals: which was done with such courage & resolution, that the Turkes when they had done what they possibly could for the defence of the place, by casting down darts, wild fire, & such like things vpon the Christians as they were climbing vp; at length as men despairing longer to hold the place, & ouercome with a greater fortune, turned their backs and fled. Sinan & the rest of the captains by a wooden bridge, fled out at the further side of the castle, into the main, and so alongst the left side of the lake by land to Tunes, not looking behind them for hast: which way most part of his men followed him also. The rest were either slain or driuen into the lake, where seeking to saue their liues by swimming, they were either slain in comming to land, by the the Spanish horsemen, or else in their swimming shot at pleasure by the harquebusiers, so that all the lake was as it were couered with the dead bodies of the Turks and Moores. The Emperor with small shot thus gained the castle of Guletta, with all the warlike prouision therein, and with it all Barbarussa his great fleet and strength at sea, which he for the more safetie had before put into the lake: which as it was vnto the Emperour a thing most pleasant, so was it vnto Barbarussa and his pyrats the greatest griefe and losse possible, hauing at once lost all their power at sea, which but a little before was no small terror to all the frontiers of the Christian countries and Islands in the Mediterranian.

Guletta woon, and Barbarussa his fleet taken.

Barbarussa troubled and terrified with so great a losse, with a sterne and scornefull countenance receiued the Iew and the rest of the captains fled from Guletta, reuiling them bitterly in his rage, and calling them faint hearted cowards, which had in so short a time giuen ouer so strong a place. Whereunto Sinan answered for them all, in this sort:

Barbarussa rageth.

Hairadin (said he) so long as we were to fight with armed men, we did as thou well knowest, and our enemies cannot denie, what well beseemed vs and thy magnificent fortune. But when we are to withstand the Diuell and his infernall furies, which came against vs with flames of fire, and earthquakes, things of extreame terrour and danger; it ought not to seeme strange vnto thee, if we sought to escape the vncouth furie of the immortall enemies of mankinde, to do thee seruice in thy better fortune, in defence of thy citie and kingdome. Neither do we account it any disgrace to haue escaped that danger, as men that minde againe to fight: out of which thou, a most antient and expert Commander (if I may frankly speake vnto thee the truth) if thou hadst been there present, wouldst haue accounted it no dishonor, but very good discretion to haue escaped in safetie.

The short answer of Sinan the Iew vnto Barbarussa.

Barbarussa repressing his furie, began in a more temperat manner to request them euery one particularly, as valiant and couragious men to stand fast vnto him in that war against their enemies the Christians: telling them, that he well hoped, that after the great supplie of the Moorish footmen and Numidian horsemen were once come (which were now at hand) the enemy should not long reioyce of the taking of Guletta. After that, he forthwith conuerted all his studie and endeauour, to prepare such things as were needfull for the war, bringing forth his treasures, and bountifully bestowing the same amongst the Moors and Numidians, thereby to confirme the friendship of such as well affected him, and with his new bountie to winne the hearts of such as yet stood doubtfull.

In the mean time Muleasses the exiled king, with a smal retinue of his friends and followers came from the farthest part of Numidia, into the Emperors campe; the Emperor sitting in a royall seat in the midst of his pauilion, whereinto Muleasses was admitted, with a mytre vpon his head, in a garment of greene and blew changeable silke: he was of a tal and manly stature, of colour tawnie, but so squint-eyed, that he seemed spitefully to looke vpon them whom he beheld: whom after he had kissed the Emperors right hand, and had set himselfe downe with his legs gathered close vnder him, vpon a carpet spred vpon the bare ground, after the manner of his countrey, he by an interpreter spake vnto the Emperor as followeth:

Muleasses commeth to the emperour.

Thou art come in armes into this countrey, and art now almost conquerour of the same, (thrice mightie Emperour) prouoked thereunto not by any desert of mine, for that our different religion so required; yet as I verily thinke, not without the appointment of the most high God, whom both thou and I do with like deuotion worship, to take reuenge of the most perfidious and cruell tyrant and pyrat, the mortall enemie of mankind; whom I foresee as good as alreadie vanquished, now that Guletta is taken, and his Nauie surprised. So that I hope he shall in short time by thy reuenging hand, at once receiue the iust guerdon of all his former villanies: which shall be so much the more to my comfort, for that I hope the fruit of thy rare felicitie and glorious victorie will redound in great part to me, being restored by thee into my fathers kingdome: which I as a poore exiled Prince most humbly request of thy justice and bountie. For it shall be vnto thee a thing most honourable and profitable, if thou shalt receiue into thy protection me, a king royally discended of a most antient progenie, strengthned with the great allyance of the Numidians and Moores. Neither doe I refuse either to pay thee tribute therefore, or to acknowledge my selfe vassal vnto thee the Christian Emperor. Of which my fidelitie there can be no greater assurance, than the thankefull remembrance of so great a benefit receiued; which shall for euer remaine vnforgotten of me and my posteritie, euen for that especially, that I accept and esteeme the name of an vnthankefull G man; and do well by experience finde, how much my glorie may be increased, and the minds of my people to me assured, by thy garrisons so neere as Sicilia and Sardinia.

In conclusion [illegible] wards it fell out, that Barbarossa would neuer trust to the strength of the [illegible] ly be ouercome with [illegible] artillerie; but would [illegible] bring all his forces [illegible] of purpose to terrifie the Christians with the sight of the L multitude of his rascall souldiers, [illegible] with his [illegible] who with hideous and terrible cries, after the manner of that nation, would [illegible] them: and yet for all that would neuer bring [illegible] battell his Turkish footmen, in whom he reposed his greatest confidence, and whom he [illegible] spare, but would as a crafty and subtill Turke, by opposing of the Moores, whom he held in small regard, trie by their bloud what might be done without the danger of his own men. But as he said them, nothing could be more strange vnto the Moores his countrymen: or that they were more afraid of, than in a feeble and tired fight with that enemie whose squadrons commonly ouer-in shifting armor with long pikes, might scorne and easily ouer-throw the naked bare-backers of the Moores, and the vnarmed Numidian horsmen: and that our men should find nothing more grieuous or troublesome, than the scorching heate of the Sun, and the dust rising thereof; which might easily be M remedied by plenty of water, which by flates and small boats might easily be brought in casks and bottles from the fleet alongst the lake, and so distributed amongst the armie: although not far from the walls of the citie were certaine old conduits which would yeeld them great plentie of water, if the malicious enemie did not to his owne hurt and others, poyson the

A the same. These things orderly reported to the Emperour, confirmed the hope he had before conceiued of the desired victorie: so that wholly bent thereupon, and carefully forecasting all things, he resolued forthwith to depart from Guletta, and with all his power to besiege Tunes.

But whilest he was preparing things necessarie, ordering his souldiers, and discouering the enemies purposes, his souldiers had dayly diuers skirmishes with the Numidians; so that once the skirmish was like to haue come to a iust battel: which began in this sort; The Moors had planted certain field-pieces amongst the Oliue gardens, wherewith they shot continually into the campe: for remouing whereof, the Emperor leauing the Italians, with certain companies of the old Germane and Spanish soldiers, for the keeping of his campe and trenches, went
B forth with his horsemen and the rest of his armie: sending before him Montegius, Generall of the Spanish horsemen, who for most part were but raw souldiers, such as were of the Noblemens ordinarie seruants and followers, not before acquainted with the warres. These light horsemen with diuers fortune skirmished a while with the enemy; but when they saw themselues to be hardly charged, and Montegius their Generall grieuously wounded, they turned their backs, and in the sight of the Emperour shamefully fled to the men at armes which were comming after them. The manner of the enemies fight was, to giue at the first a fierce and desperat charge, and vpon the incounter giuen, of purpose to retyre, auoiding thereby the sudden force of their enemies, and by and by to turne againe vpon them with a fresh charge. The Emperour seeing the flight of his light horsemen, came on couragiously with his men at C arms; by whose comming in and valiant encounter the Turks and Moores were put to flight, and the field pieces wherewith they had before annoyed the campe, taken. In this skirmish the Emperour in person, as he stood formost in his armed troups, gaue the signe of battel himselfe, by crying with a loud voice, Saint Iames, Saint Iames, whom the Spaniards take for their Patron; and so chargiug the enemie, performed the part not only of a couragious Chieftaine, but of a resolute and valiant souldier also; rescuing with his owne hand Andreas Pontius a noble gentleman of Granado, whom vnhorsed and sore wounded, the enemie was readie presently to haue slaine, had not the Emperor by his comming in saued him: deseruing thereby the Oken garland, which the Romans by the name of Ciuica Corona, gaue as an honour to such as had in battell saued a citisen.

The Spanish light horsmen put to flight.

D About the same time it fortuned, that thirtie thousand Moores came vpon the sudden to haue surprised a little tower standing vpon a hil neere vnto the ruines of old Carthage: wherein the Emperor had placed certaine soldiers for the keeping thereof, because it was neere vnto his campe. Before these Moores went a Numidian Priest, who bellowing out certain superstitious charmes, cast diuers scrols of paper on each side the way, wherein he cursed and banned the Christians: and now they had with fire and smoake brought the Christians in that tower to great extremitie, when the Emperour himselfe comming to their rescue with certaine companies of horsemen and footmen, slew the coniuring Priest, with others, and put the rest to flight. The discomfiture of the Spanish horsemen caused many men to thinke, that if the Emperor should come to a set battell with the enemie, he should finde his horsemen too
E weake, both for that they were but few in number, and not to be compared with the Numidians. For which cause, and diuers others, certain of the Emperors graue counsellors, but none of the best soldiers, wished him not to proceed further in that dangerous war, but with speed to returne out of Affricke, for as much as he had woon honour enough by the taking of Guletta, and the surprising of the enemies fleet: whereby he had to his immortall praise, and the common good of Christendome, deliuered all the frontiers of the Christian countries in the Mediterranean, from the danger and feare of those most cruell pyrats: besides that, the fixe began to rage in his campe, whereof many of his soldiers fell sicke and died daily. Whereas on the contrarie part, the mightie Numidian Princes, such as were Muleasses old enemies, were reported to come in dayly to the aid of Barbarussa. These vnseasonable speeches the Empe-
F rour thought good to represse betime; reasoning against the authors thereof with great grauitie, as against men who with more feare doubted of the successe of things, and the euent of the victorie, than beseemed them, whom for their constant resolution, and good opinion conceiued of their discretion, he had chosen to be of his most secret counsell.

The Emperour aduised by his Counsellours to returne home.

Saying, That he desired not of them that their needlesse and dishonourable labour, wherein they The resolute answer of the Emperour. should should shew themselues more carefull of his person than of his honour: for as much as those things which G they now alledged, should haue been said before the war was taken in hand, now by good hap halfe ended; before he euer passed ouer into Affricke. For he might (as he said) haue rested quietly in Spaine, and haue easily neglected and reiected the iniuries done vpon the sea coasts, and the complaints of his subiects; but he was (as they well knew) for most vrgent causes come thither: whereas he was resolued to satisfie the expectation of the world with a notable victorie; or if God should otherwise appoint, there to end his dayes with honour. Wherefore he willed them to cease further to flatter him that was no way dismaid, or to possesse the minds of his valiant souldiers with a vaine foreboding feare, and with resolute mindes, together with him their chiefetaine, against the next day to expect what the fortune of the field should appoint for the full accomplishment of that war. For he was (as he said) set downe to giue the enemie bat- H tell; or if he refused the [illegible] to batter the walls of Tunes, not doubting but that God would stand on his side in so good and so goa[illegible] quarrell.

The Emperor marcheth toward Tunes.

The Emperour leauing a sufficient garrison in the castle of Guletta, commanded the [illegible]ches to be repaired, and the great ordnance there taken to be laid vpon carriages, which before after the old rude sea fashion lay bound in great vnweldie pieces of timber, with yron rings fastned thereunto, and could not handsomely be handled or remooued to or fro. After that, when he had caused the countrey to be well viewed all about, which betwixt the Oliue groues and the right side of the lake giueth a direct passage vnto the citie of Tunes; he set forward with his armie in so good order, that he still marched as readie to fight, for feare of the I policies and sudden assaults of the enemie. On the left hand marched the Italians next vnto the lake; on the right hand the Spaniards neere vnto the Oliue groues, which in the manner of a great wood ran all alongst the countrie, from the ruines of Carthage almost to the wals of Tunes: in the midst betwixt both marched the Germans; next vnto them followed the great ordnance; and after it, the carriages of all the armie. In the vaumgard was Vastius, whom the Emperour had made Generall of the armie, and especially for that day: in the rereward was the Duke of Alba with certaine troups of chosen horsemen: in the middle of the main battel was the Emperor, and by his side Lewis his brother in law the king of Portingals brother. The Italians were conducted by the Prince of Salerne, the Spaniards by Alarco an antient captaine, and the Germans by Maximilian Eberstein. But the Emperor in his armor ceased not to ride K from squadron to squadron, with cheerefull countenance and full of hope, recounting vnto them the former victories which they had gotten for him: and telling them, that he did that day expect of them a most honourable dayes seruice, forasmuch as they were to fight against the naked enemies of the Christian religion: wherefore they should with resolute minds set downe themselues to endure the weight of their armor, the painfulnesse of the march, the heat of the Sun and sand, and the tediousnesse of the thirst arising thereof; vntill they might joyne battell with their enemies, where they should vndoubtedly by the goodnes of God (in whose quarrel they fought) obtaine the victorie: in the meane time they should with patience ouercome all difficulties, comforting themselues with the vndoubted hope of a most rich prey, which they were to expect of the spoile of a rich citie. Whereunto euery squadron answered with a great shout, that he should not trouble himselfe with those matters which hee had L before rehearsed, but to assure himselfe, that they his souldiers would most patiently endure all extremities, and not deceiue the expectation he had conceiued of their wonted valour, but by valiant fight to make him Emperor, not of Affricke but of Asia also.

Now Vastius had withdrawn two companies of harquebusiers out of the Spanish squadron, to skirmish with the Moores who continually followed in the taile of the armie: whome, by those harquebusiers and certaine troups of horsemen deputed to that purpose, the duke of Alba notably repulsed in the rereward.

The soldiers for greedines of water disordered their march.

The armie was now come vnto the Cisternes of fresh water, which Muleasses and others which well knew the country, had before told them of; which as soon as the soldiers almost fainting vnder the weight of their armor, with the scorching heat of the Sun, & extremity of M thirst, descried afar off; they for desire they had to quench their thirst, forthwith forsook their colours, & disorderly ran as fast as they could to those cisternes: Vastius the Generall, to the vttermost of his power laboring in vaine both by faire meanes and foule to haue stayed them; who saw by that disordrednes of the soldiers, a great aduantage offred vnto the enemie, which then

A then was not far off. But when the Generall could neither with words or blows preuaile any thing with them, the Emperour himselfe was glad to haste thither, with his presence and authoritie to haue kept them in order: yet such was the force of their intollerable thirst, that neither the sight of the Emperour, nor all that he could do, could remedie the disorder; some fainting in the sand for lacke of drinke, and some other for greedinesse readie to burst their bellies at the fountains; so that the Emperor was faine with his truncheon to beat them away. Amongst the rest, one Sullius Cicero of Arpinas, a famous captain, died at the cisterne side with drinking too much. This extremitie for want of water seemed iustly to haue happened vnto them, forasmuch as Vastius the day before had by generall proclamation thorow the campe, commanded that euery soldier should carrie with him a bottle of wine or water at his girdle:
B although he caused so much water as he conueniently could, to be carried in great caskes for the common reliefe of the armie, whereof the Germanes had the greatest part; some almost readie to giue ouer for thirst, were glad to get a draught of cold water of their fellows which had it, for two duckets.

A draught of water sold for two duckets.

This disorder being with as much speed as was possible reformed, and the Armie againe brought into order, the Emperor held on his march towards the enemie: for Barbarussa with a wonderfull multitude of horsemen and footmen, and a number of ensignes (the instruments of vaine feare and foolish brauerie) gallantly displaied after the manner of the Moores, was come about three miles from the citie, and with certaine field pieces (as Muleasses had foretold) went about three miles from the citie, and with certaine field pieces (as Muleasses had foretold) went
C about to haue broken the battell of the Christians: which Pieces although they were often-times discharged, yet did they little or no harme by reason of the vnskilfulnesse of the Canoniers. Vastius in like manner, and for like purpose had commanded the great ordnance to be brought into the front of the battell: but perceiuing what time and toile it required to haue it done (for that it was drawne but by strength of men, and the wheels of the carriages sunk deep in the deuouring sand, and the shot and pouder which the Mariners and gally slaues carried altogether vpon their shoulders, came but softly on) he suddenly changed his purpose, and told the Emperor, That he thought it not best to stay for the great artillerie in that cheerfulnesse of his armie when euery man desired battell; but to commit all to the valour of his resolute men, and his own good fortune, which euer fauored his noble attempts: lest whilst we stay (said he) too long vpon our great ordnance (which doth not alwayes serue to great purpose in sudden D battels) our enemies gather courage in the time of this our vnnecessarie delay; and this exceeding cheerfulnes of our soldiers (the most sure token of vndoubted victorie) by deferring of time grow cold. Whereunto the Emperor, desirous of battell, and filled with good hope, joyfully answered; Vastius, if thou so think it good (which I also like wel of) in Gods name giue the signall. That shal I by & by do (said he) but first it is reason that you which sway and command a great part of the world, learne at this time to obey him, whom to his great charge and shame, you, laying aside the imperiall maiestie of your selfe, haue for this day made Generall and commander of so mightie an armie: wherefore (said Vastius) I wil now vse my authority, and command you, sith I may not so request you, to depart from this place, and to get you into the midst of the battell neere vnto the ensignes; lest by some vnluckie shot, the whole estate of

E the armie be brought into extream perill by the danger of one mans life. Whereat the Emperor smiling, willed him to feare no such thing; saying moreouer, That neuer Emperour was yet slain with a gun. For all that, he departed out of the place as he was commanded, & went into the middle of the battell. Whereupon the signal of battel was by the sound of the trumper, and striking vp of the drum, presently giuen, and the enemie (with more haste than the extream heat of the day required) furiously charged by the Emperors horsemen, who to auoid the danger of the great artillerie, made all the hast they could to come to handie blows. In the formost of these horsmen was Ferdinand Gonzaga, a most valiant nobleman, who then serued the emperor without charge: he being somwhat before the rest, at the first onset slew with his lance a great captain of the Moors, & presently with his sword so troubled them that were F next, that he opened a way for them that followed him, to break into the enemies battel. The harquebusiers also discharged so fast vpon the enemie, that 300 of them lay dead vpon the ground before the ioyning of the battell: which the rest of the footmen seeing, forsooke their great ordnance, and fled backe to Barbarussa. Who long endured not the force or sight of the Christians; but grinding his teeth for sorrow and griefe of mind, turned his horse, and with his his Turks retyred into Tunes. For now that his deſignes had in the beginning taken ſo euill G ſucceſſe, he thought it not beſt to aduenture all in one battell; knowing right wel, that the emperours armie could not long endure the inconueniences of the intollerable heat, and want of many things, eſpecially of freſh water: which fed him with hope, that he ſhould out of theſe his enemies diſtreſſes picke ſome fit occaſion of aduantage, if he could but a while defend the citie of Tunes. The Numidians and Moores, who in great troups and companies had alwaies houered about the Emperors armie, without doing any thing worth reporting, retired themſelues into the ſuburbes, gardens, and other places neere vnto the citie.

The Emperor glad of the flight of his enemies, which were thought to haue bin in number 100000, incamped with his armie that night in the ſame place where they before lay; determining the next day to batter the walls of Tunes. In the meane time Barbaruſſa, ſurpriſed H with an exceeding feare, and diſtracted with many cares, and now become more cruell than himſelfe, had in his mind purpoſed a fact full of exceeding and inhuman crueltie; which was at once to haue killed all the Chriſtian captiues in the caſtle of Tunes: fully reſolued to put the ſame in execution, had not Sinan the Iew diſſuaded him from that moſt execrable fact; proteſting ſuch a practiſe to be vnſeemly for a man of his valor, famous for his many victories, and carrying with him the maieſtie of a king: whereas he would ſhortly after wonderfully repent him for doing ſo ſhamefull a fact: the doing whereof, What was it elſe (as the Iew ſayd) but a manifeſt demonſtration of his extreame feare and deſperation? which two things were moſt dangerous to him, that was to maintaine ſo doubtfull a war, and would much deface the glorie of his former life: wherefore he ſhould do well to beware, that by the fame of ſuch a I moſt horrible fact, he did not prouoke Solymans heauie diſpleaſure againſt him: who deuoid of all human crueltie, had vſed both to deteſt and reuenge ſuch outrages. Wherfore he ſhould ſuffer the Chriſtian captiues to liue bound in their fatall chaines, ſo long as it were their fortunes; who being well kept, and vnarmed, might ſhortly after ſerue him to good purpoſe, and could no way without moſt certain danger moue themſelues, if they ſhould vnaduiſedly luſt after their vnluckie libertie: for by them, the expected victorie could neither be giuen to the enemie, nor taken from him, or yet ſo much as hindered. At which ſpeech the tyrant was aſhamed, and ſo ſparing the liues of the poore wretches, went out of the Caſtle, into the greateſt church of Tunes, whither he had cauſed to be aſſembled all the chiefe men of the citie, to tel them what he would haue done for the defence of the citie, and now by perſuaſion to encou- K rage them to fight: from whom, as men by him holden in diſtruſt, he had but a little before the comming of the Chriſtians, taken all manner of armor and weapons.

Barbaruſſa in mind to kil all the Chriſtian captiues, is diſſuaded by Sinan the Iew.

Whileſt Barbaruſſa was thus buſied, the moſt ioyfull and happie day appeared to thoſe miſerable captiues; by fortunes change no leſſe blacke and diſmall to the Turks and Moores. For that hainous purpoſe of the cruell tyrant could not long be couered or kept ſecret: ſo that a conſtant report of a danger ſo imminent, was run thorow the whole caſtle, euen into deep dungeons; by the compaſſion of certaine manumiſed ſlaues, who deteſting the ſauage crueltie of Barbaruſſa their maſter, and touched with deuotion, had in heart returned to their old and true Chriſtian religion; incouraging by ſecret ſpeeches the chiefe of the captiues with whom they L were acquainted, to lay hand now vpon their libertie. Amongſt theſe well minded men was one Francis a Spaniard, whom Barbaruſſa had from his youth brought vp as his minion, hauing him alwayes in great eſteem by the name of Memis; and another called Vincentius Caterus of Dalmatia an eunuch. Theſe two aduenturing a moſt memorable and godly attempt, ſet open the priſon doores, and gaue inſtruments vnto the poore priſoners, readie to take the occaſion offered; who boldly ſtarting vp, brake off their chains and gyues, and ſo by the great goodnes and mercie of God, about 6000 poore naked Chriſtians, armed with that came firſt in hand, but eſpecially with ſtones, brake forth ſuddenly vpon the Turks that were in the caſtle. Ramadas a renegate Spaniard captain of the caſtle, ſtirred vp with the vnexpected and terrible noiſe of ſo many priſoners breaking their yrons, with a few ſoldiers whom he had ſuddenly called M vnto him, ran to the caſtle gate, where one of the priſoners (a luſtie yong man of Sicilia) had with one of the bars of the gate ſtrucke downe one or two of the Warders, and hauing bolted the gate, was become maſter thereof: him Ramadas ſlew, and opening the gate, made way for himſelfe and his few followers, with whom he went to Barbaruſſa, to carrie him the newes of that his hard miſchance. But the Chriſtians now loſed from their bands, and hauing ſuddenly

The Chriſtian captiues breake priſon, & driue the Turkes out of the caſtle of Tunes.

A ſuddenly ſlaine diuers of the Turkes, poſſeſſed themſelues of all the caſtle, brake open the armorie, and ſo ſeizing vpon the kings treaſure, armor, & prouiſion, from a hie turret gaue ſignes of victorie to the Chriſtian army by ſmoke & falſe fires made with gunpowder; and laſtly by diſplaying of Sarmentus his enſigne, which (as we haue before declared) was by Tabaccbes taken from the top of the trenches at the ſiege of Guletta. Theſe ſignes although the Chriſtians in the army could not well perceiue, as being too far off, yet by the fugitiues which came oftentimes out of Tunes to the Emperour and Muleaſſes, they were both perſuaded, that ſome great tumult was riſen amongſt the enemies. Wherefore the Emperor ſent two of his captains with their companies, who going as neere as they could to the citie and the caſtle, ſhould diſcouer what the matter was. In the meane time, Barbaruſſa almoſt mad for anger, in his furie
B blaſpheming his vain gods, and bitterly curſing and banning the Iew, for diſſuading him from killing the captiues, came to the caſtle gate, with tears ſtanding in his eys pittifully requeſting the late Chriſtian captiues (which then ſtood vpon the top of the wals & the gate, with weapons in their hands) that they would forthwith let him in, faithfully promiſing them their libertie, with a generall and free pardon for all that they had done. But they mindfull both of their former and preſent fortune, and moued with iuſt hatred, caſt ſtones at him, and with many opprobrious words reiected his requeſt: ſo that he inraged with ſorrow and madneſſe, ſhot at them with his owne hand, and ſeeing all paſt remedie, and the citie not poſſible now to be kept, ſhamefully betooke himſelfe to flight. After him followed the Turkes, in number ſeuen thouſand, with purpoſe to flie to the citie Hippona, now called Bona, famous with the Bi-
C ſhopricke of that reuerend Father and great Diuine Auguſtine. For there (as in a moſt ſure harbour) had Barbaruſſa left foureteene gallies in the lake neere vnto the citie, to ſerue his turne whatſoeuer miſchance ſhould happen: but the tacklings, ſailes, oares, and ordnance, hee had laid vp in the caſtle faſt by, which was kept with a garriſon of his owne.

Tunes yeelded to the Emperor.

The Emperour vnderſtanding that Barbaruſſa with his Turks was fled, came with all his armie vnto the gates of Tunes, where the magiſtrates of the citie were ready to ſubmit themſelues vnto him, & to deliuer him the keies of the citie; only requeſting of him, that he would keep his ſoldiers incamped without the citie, and not to ſeeke the vtter ſpoile and ruin thereof: promiſing, that the ſouldiers ſhould want nothing that was there to be had. Muleaſſes alſo carefull of the ſafetie thereof, earneſtly intreated the Emperor in the citizens behalfe. But he,
D although he was of his own honorable diſpoſition ready enough to haue granted what they requeſted; yet for that he did, not without cauſe, doubt of the Moores fidelitie, and that the paiment of the mony which they of Tunes had by Muleaſſes promiſed for the paiment of the ſoldiers wages, was by them craftily delaied, expecting ſtill the vttermoſt deuoire of Barbaruſſa, he could not by any means be perſuaded to promiſe them any certaintie of their ſafetie: moued alſo ſo to do by the diſcontented ſpeeches of his ſoldiers, who ſpared not to ſay, That they ſhould be hardly and vnkindly dealt withall, if after ſo long trauell and ſo much paines taken both by ſea and land, they ſhould be defrauded of the reward of the victory, ſith nothing but only the hope of the preſent ſpoile did relieue and feed them, being poore and miſerable, hauing ſcarce clothes to couer their nakedneſſe, and their bodies ſpent with long labour and E thirſt; ſo that the Moores of Tunes, enemies of the Chriſtian religion, and the perpetuall receiuers of moſt horrible pyrats, might worthily reioice of the Chriſtian victorie; & the conquerors themſelues for euer bewaile their owne calamities and miſeries. Whileſt the Emperor ſtood thus in doubt what to reſolue vpon, Vaſtius with a ſmall companie came to the caſtle gate, & was with wonderfull ioy receiued by the Chriſtian captiues. But as he was viewing the wealth & prouiſion laid vp in the caſtle, a Ligurian captiue diſcouered vnto him where certain treaſure lay hid: for Barbaruſſa had there caſt into a well 30000 duckats ſowed vp in bags, which Vaſtius getting eaſily out, obtain'd them of the Emperor of gift, as he whoſe good ſeruice had wel deſerued them. The Spaniards and the Italians ſought moſt after the ſpoile; but the Germans deſiring more to glut themſelues with the Mahometan bloud, fill'd all places with dead bodies, without regard of ſex or age; ſo that the prophane temples of their vain prophet, ſwam with the bloud of them that were fled into them. Which furious execution continued vntill such time as the emperor mooued with the pittifull request of Muleasses, caused proclamation to be made, That no man should vpon paine of death hurt any citizen, or take any prisoners: yet for all that, it could not otherwise be, but that many young men and women were by the mariners (which were come to the spoile of the citie) carried away to the fleet. G

Muleasses for a little mony redeemed diuers which he knew, out of the hands of such as had them prisoners: amongst others, one of his wiues, whom he sometime held dearest, was ransomed for two duckats. The Emperour entering into the castle, commended the captiues, who were the occasion of that speedie victorie: and giuing to euery one of them money, set them at libertie, promising vnto them shipping and prouision to bring them home euery man into his owne country. Vnto the two manumised seruants of Barbarussa, which were the authours of breaking the prison, he gaue mony and apparell, & afterwards learned of them many things concerning Barbarussa his purposes, and secret disposition. In the spoile of the castle, Muleasses lamented the losse of three things especially: first, the antient Arabian bookes containing the interpretation of the Mahometane law, and the acts of the kings his predecessours, the want whereof, Muleasses (in the hearing of P. Iouius, out of whom this historie is taken) said (as he reporteth) that he would most gladly, if it had bin possible, haue redeemed with the price of a city: then the precious ointments and perfumes, with the wonderfull store of ambergrize, muske, and ciuet, worth much gold: all which, Barbarussa as a rude and rough man had made no reckoning of. And last of all, the rare and rich colours for painting, which lying by heapes, were by the ignorant souldiers, seeking for that might yeeld them present money, foolishly neglected & troden vnder foot, seruing no man to good. In this castle were found diuers head-pieces and other armor of the Christians, namely of the French, who with Lewis their king, had about three hundred yeares before besieged that Castle: which armour had been vntill that time there kept by the Moores in remembrance of that victorie against the Christians. H I

Three things especially lamented by Muleasses in the spoile of the castle of Tunes.

Barbarussa in the meane time was come to the riuer of Bagrada, which the Moores call Maiordech, which he easily passed ouer, though he was pursued by certain Numidian horsmen, whom Muleasses had raised of his old friends, and of the followers of his vncle Dorax, & sent them to pursue the Turks: but Barbarussa so marched with his harquebusiers & archers placed in the rereward, that the Numidian horsemen durst not come neere him, and so in safety came to Hippona, as he had before purposed. Yet in passing the riuer Bagrada, he lost Haydin of Smirna, that famous pirat: who being a fat man, and wearied with the heat of the Sunne and painefulnesse of the iourny, dranke so much, that he died presently vpon the banke of the riuer. When Barbarussa was come to Hippona, he rested his men two daies: then calling them together againe, he comforted them with good words; persuading them, that whatsoeuer mischance had hapned, they should impute it not to the valor of the enemie, but to the trecherie of the slaues: exhorting them, as valiant men patiently to indure that frowne of Fortune, and by some notable exploit to win againe her fauor: for hee was againe determined to put to sea with the fleet he had, and to go presently from thence to Algiers, where after he had with new supplies increased his power, and augmented his fleet, and better aduised himselfe, he would take an attempt in hand answerable to their desires, and not vnbeseeming his owne credit and estimation. It is reported, that neuer vanquished and beaten captaine was with a more cheerful acclamation answered by his souldiers, than he was at that present; they all with one consent most willingly requesting him to command whatsoeuer pleased him, which they would neuer refuse to vndertake, were it neuer so heauie or dangerous, so that they might bee brought to some notable exploit. Barbarussa vsing this exceeding cheerfulnesse and forwardnesse of his souldiers, did with wonderfull celeritie weigh vp the 14 gallies which he had sunke in the lake, & forthwith rigged them vp, & furnished them for all assaies: and vpon the very brinke of the lake cast vp a mount of earth, whereon he placed certain pieces of artillerie for defence of the harbour; not vainly coniecturing, that the Christian fleet would in short time come thither to impeach his going out: pointing therin as it were at the purpose of the Emperor and Auria his admirall, who were of opinion, that by sending part of the fleet thither, those gallies might be drown'd in the harbor with the great ordnance, before they could be rigged & made readie. Vnto this piece of seruice Auria appointed one Adam, a captain of Genoa, a man of no great skill in matters at sea, but yet of great wealth and credit, & the Admirals nigh kinsman: he K L M

Barbarussa flieth to Hippona, and there comforteth his souldiers.

Auria sendeth certaine gallies to intercept Barbarussa.

A he with certaine galliots and foureteene gallies, set forward towards Hippona, promising vnto himselfe a most certain and easie victorie, hoping to purchase vnto himselfe great honor of the vnprouided enemy: for that he thought to haue taken Barbarussa busie in setting forth of his fleet. But after he was past Biserta, & come neere to Hippona, he was certainly aduertised, that Barbarussa had with incredible celeritie rigged vp his gallies, & fortified the harbor, by planting great ordnance vpon the mount he had there raised. With which newes he wonderfully troubled, changed his purpose, persuaded by the other captains of the gallies, in no case to aduenture to fight with him, because the Spanish, Sicilian, and Neapolitan gallies were but weakly manned, many of the souldiers being for greedinesse of the spoile gone ashore without leaue at Tunes: so that he should at great disaduantage fight with the Turks, being more in
B number and desperatly bent. Wherefore he vpon good aduise presently changed his former course, and returned to the fleet for more aid. Barbarussa (as it was afterwards knowne) stood a good while in doubt, whether he should in hope of victoie pursue those gallies, forasmuch as they were in number no more than his owne, or else to persist in his former purpose of going to Algiers. Vnto which opinion al the vnder captains inclined, being altogether ignorant of the weaknesse of the Christians: and so letting slip a faire occasion, leauing a small garrison of Turks in the castle, he departed from Hippona & sailed alongst the coast to Algiers. When Adam was returned againe to the fleet, and had done nothing, many of the Christian princes were wonderfully offended, that by the negligence of some who were hardly to be commanded, and by the vnrulinesse of others who without leaue were gone ashore, so faire an occasion
C of the desired victorie, was neglected. For this thing onely wanted vnto the Emperors rare felicitie in that war: for if those few gallies had been taken from the cruell enemie, or sunke in the sea, there had been no means for him to haue escaped; being verily thought, that the Numidians in number infinit, and deadly enemies vnto the Turkes, would with often skirmishes out of their knowne places of aduantage, haue so cut him off in his long and painfull trauell by land, that they would altogether haue made an end both of him and his followers before hee could haue come to Algiers. Auria angrie both with himselfe and those whom he had put in trust, and yet not out of hope to ouertake his enemie; with his owne gallies and some other of the best ships went to Hippona: but finding Barbarussa gone, he tooke the city and ouerthrew
D the wals thereof: but in the castle which he by force tooke from the Turks, he placed Aluarus Gometius with a sufficient garrison, and so returned vnto the Emperor. This Gometius, though he was a most valiant captain, yet became so infamous for his auaritious dealing, both with the enemie and his friends, that for feare how to answer such things as he knew would be laid to his charge, he became the infamous executioner of himselfe. The castle was afterwards by the commandement of the Emperor, rased downe to the ground, for that it was not without a maruellous charge to be kept. After that, a counsell was holden concerning Muleasses, whom the Emperor placed againe in the kingdome of Tunes, there to raigne as his ancestors had don before him; paying him yearly by the name of a tribute, two Faulcons, and two Numidian coursers; with condition, that he should for euer honour the Emperour, and be a E friend vnto all Christians, and an vtter enemie vnto the Turks. Besides that, That he should from time to time defray the charges of a thousand Spaniards and more, to be left in garrison in the castle of Guletta; by holding whereof, the Emperour kept as it were the keies of that kingdome at his girdle. The Emperor hauing thus honourably driuen Barbarussa & the Turks pyrats out of Tunes, taken from them their gallies, deliuered the Christian countries (all along the sea coast into the Mediterranean) of a great feare, and restored Muleasses againe to his kingdome, sailed into Sicilia, where he was in great triumph receiued at Panormus and Messana, from whence he passed ouer to Rhegium in Italie, and from thence by land to Naples. Thus was the kingdome of Tunes taken by Barbarussa and the Turks; and by Charles the Emperour recouered againe out of their hands the selfe-same time that Solyman was in person himselfe
F in wars against the Persian: whom Barbarussa accompanied with Sinan the Iew, after this ouerthrow met at Iconium in his returne out of Persia, well accepting of their excuse, as is before declared.

Solyman as well of his own ambitious disposition, as following the manner of the Othoman kings, desirous by all meanes to increase the glory of his name, and to inlarge his empire, determined with himself to take away from the Portingals all their trafick into the East Indies. 1537.

It

It grieued him to heare, that the Christian religion should begin to take root amongst those Pagan kings, which had not long before receiued the Mahometan religion: Besides that, hee was credibly informed, that the Portingals in these late wars he had against the Persians, had aided them with certain harquebusiers, and also had sent them workemen to shew them both the making and vse of great artillerie. But that which moued him most of all, was for that the Portingals by their traffique into the Indies, had cut off all the trade of merchandise into the gulfe of Arabia, whereby the riches of the East were woont to be transported vnto Caire, and so to Alexandria, from whence they were afterwards by the Venetian merchants and others dispersed into all parts of Europe: but now were carried by the great Ocean into Portingall, and from thence conuaied into all parts of Christendome, to the great hindrance of his tributes and customs of Ægypt. For these causes, & at the instance of Solyman Bassa an eunuch, borne in Epirus, and then Gouernour of Ægypt; Solyman caused wonderfull preparation to be made, for the building of a great fleet in the red sea, to goe against the Portingals. The timber whereof was cut downe in the mountaines of Cilicia, and shipped in the bay of Italia in the bottome of the Mediterranean, from whence it was by sea transported to Pelusium, and so vp the riuer of Nilus to Caire; where after it was framed and readie to be set together, it was with infinit labour, and no lesse charge, carried by land with Camels thorow that hoat and sandie country, from Caire to Suetia, a port of the Red sea, called in antient time Arsinoe.

The Egyptian kings about to let in the red sea into the Mediterranean.

From which place eightie miles distant from Caire, the antient kings of Ægypt, seeking by vaine and wonderfull workes to eternise the memorie of themselues, had with incredible charge cut thorow al that main land; so that vessels of good burthen might come vp the same from Arsinoe to Caire: which great cut or ditch, Sesostris the rich king of Ægypt, and long after him Ptolomeus Philadelphus, purposed to haue made a great deale wider and deeper, and thereby to haue let the Red sea into the Mediterranean, for the readier transportation of the Indian merchandise to Caire and Alexandria. Which mad worke, Sesostris preuented by death could not performe: and Ptolomeus otherwise perswaded by skilfull men, in time gaue ouer; for feare lest by lettting in the great South Sea into the Mediterranean, he should thereby as it were with another generall deluge haue drowned the greatest part of Græcia, & many other goodly countries in Asia, and with exceeding charge, in stead of honor, haue purchased himselfe eternall infamie. Yet by the singular industrie of Solyman the Eunuch, who with seuere commandement inforced all the people of the countries thereabouts to the furtherance of the building of that fleet; hee had with wonderfull celeritie in short time new built eightie tall ships and gallies at Arsinoe, and furnished them with men, and all things else needfull for so long a voyage. At which time, hee vpon a quarrell picked without cause, but not without the good liking of Solyman, most iniuriously confiscated the goods of the Venetian merchants in Alexandria and Caire, and thrust the mariners into his gallies as slaues. With which fleet in most warlike manner appointed, Solyman the Bassa, accompanied with Assan-Beg, commonly called the Moore of Alexandria, a most famous pyrat and an excellent sea-man, set forward against the Portingals: and sailing thorow the Red sea, and so Eastward by the gulfe of Persia, came at length as far as the great riuer Indus; where with all his power hee assaulted Dium a castle of the Portingals, scituate vpon the mouth of that great riuer: but in conclusion, after he had many days besieged the castle both by sea & land, and tried the vttermost of his strength, he was so repulsed by the Portingals, that he was glad to forsake the siege, & leaning his great ordnance behind him for hast, returned backe againe to Aden, a citie of great trade in Arabia Fœlix: where discouraged with the euill successe he had against the Portingals, because he would be thought to haue done something, he allured the king of that rich citie to come vnto him, vpon his false faith before giuen for his safe returne: but as soone as he had him aboord, he like a periured wretch hanged him vp at the yards arme of his Admirall galley, and so surprising the citie, enriched himselfe with the spoile thereof. The like barbarous crueltie hee vsed at Zibyth, another famous port of Arabia, where the pilgrims of the East doe commonly land when they after the manner of their superstition come to visit the temple of their false prophet at Mecha: the king of which place together with al his nobilitie he cruelly murthered, contrary to his faith giuen; and so trauelling himselfe by land to Mecha, as if he had been some deuout pilgrim, sent backe his fleet by the Moore to Suetia, hauing performed against the Portingals nothing at all.

was like enough to haue ouerwhelmed all Italie, by the comming ouer of Solyman with his whole armie, had not the rashnesse of one Venetian captaine by vnexpected chance turned that tempest from the Italians vpon the Venetians themselues.

Alexander Contarenus, a valiant captain of the Venetians, meeting with certaine of the Turks gallies, which would neither vaile their top sailes, nor in token of reuerence and friendship, discharge any of their great ordnance, as of dutie they ought to haue done in those seas where the Venetians commanded; offended with their proud insolencie, fiercely assailed them, and in fight sunke two of them: wherein Vstamenes Gouernour of Calipolis, a man of no smal reputation among the Turks, was reported to haue perished. Which outrage done by Contarenus in a most vnfit time (to the great hurt of the Venetian estate, as it appeared afterward) was imputed to his owne priuat grudge which he bare against the Turks, for that they intercepted a ship of his as she was coming out of the East countries laden with rich merchandise, so that it was thought, that he to please himselfe in reuenging of his own priuat iniurie, regarded not what in that dangerous time might ensue thereof to the common state.

A little before the comming ouer of the Turks into Italie, Andreas Auria the Emperours Admirall lying at Messana in Sicilia, vnderstanding that Solyman was come with his armie to Aulona, and that his fleet was arriued there also, put to sea, directing his course towards the Islands of Caphalenia and Zacynthus, hoping (as indeed it fell out) to meet with the taile of the Turks fleet: for there according to his expectation he chanced vpon diuers of the Turks victuallers, whom he easily tooke. The marriners he chained in his owne gallies for slaues, and furnishing his fleet with the victual which was not for him prouided, fired the ships. Whilest Auria was thus beating too and fro in the Ionian sea, it fortuned that Solyman sent Iunusbeius his chiefe interpreter, a man whome hee made no small account of, with two gallies on a message to Lutzis his Admirall. This proud Turke comming neere vnto Corcyra, where the Venetian Admirall lay with his fleet, offered scornefully to passe, without vailing: which his pride tending to the disgrace of the Venetians, certain of the Venetian captains not enduring, set vpon him with such furie, that the Turks were enforced to run both their gallies on shore vpon the coast of Epirus, neere vnto the mountaines called Acroceraunij, where hauing escaped the danger at sea, they fell almost all into the hands of the cruel mountaine people, liuing for the most part by theft, and waiting for wracks, as hawks for their prey: by these shauers the Turks were stript of all they had, and Iunusbeius with much adoe redeeming himselfe out of their hands, returned to Solyman. Auria laying alongst the sea coast, chanced vpon these gallies, and finding them sore brused, set fire on them, Iunusbeius with two gallies, driuen by the Venetians vpon the Acroceraunian rocks.

For these vnkind parts, the Turks were wonderfully offended with the Venetians, & grieuously complained of them to Solyman: although the Venetian Admirall laboured by all means he could to appease Iunusbeius, and to excuse the matter, as a thing done by great ouersight on both sides. Vpon these small occasions, the Turkes sought to breake off the league with the Venetians; which fell out so much the sooner, for that about the same time Auria sailing vp & downe the Ionian sea, and diligently looking into euery harbor to intercept such as stragled from the Turkes fleet, hapned by night to light vpon 12 of Solymans great gallies neere vnto Corcyra, all filled with his Ianizaries and choice horsemen of the court, the best soldiers of the Turks, who had by land sent their horses to the camp by their lackies, & were comming themselues with the Ianizaries by sea. Auria falling vpon these gallies, had with them a cruell and deadly fight: for they as resolute men, wishing rather to die than to yeeld to their enemies, with inuincible courage maintained a most bloudie fight against Auria with his 30 gallies excellently appointed, vntill such time as most part of them were slaine, and the rest sore wounded; who seeing no remedie, but that they must needs come into the hands of their enemies, threw their scimitars ouerboord, because those choice weapons should not come into the hands of the Christians. In this conflict, Auria lost also many of his best soldiers: yet hauing got the victory, and possessed of the gallies, he ankered neere vnto Corcyra, there to take view of his own harms and the enemies: but whilst he rid there at anker, he was aduertised, that Barbarussa was comming against him with 80 gallies. Wherfore knowing himselfe too weake to incounter so strong an enemie, he departed thence, and returned againe to Messana to repaire his fleet. Solyman thorowly chafed with the losse of his gallies and best souldiers, and with the double iniurie done vnto him by the Venetians, fell into such a rage, that he cursed Auria taketh 12 of the Turks gallies full of Ianizaries and Solymans other best souldiers.

A cursed Barbarussa, as one who in these wars had done him no good seruice: and thundred out grieuous threats against the Venetians, saying, he was vnder the colour of an antient league, by them deceiued and greatly abused, and that they were secretly confederated with Charles his enemie, and had for that cause (as they had always) holpen Auria with intelligence, and all things necessarie, receiuing him into their harbors, and by their espials giuing him knowledge of the order of his fleet, that so he might at his own aduantage surprise his gallies, as he had alreadie done. Vnto which fire, Iunusbeius his Interpreter, Barbarussa, and Aiax, laid new coles, more and more incensing the tyrant, who was of himselfe sufficiently inflamed; persuading him by all means they could, to breake the league with the Venetians. Wherein Iunusbeius B dit, gaping after the spoile of the Islands neere hand, especially of Corcyra (now caled Corfu) Zazynthus, and Cephalenia, all subiect to the Venetian Seigniorie; finding the wars in Italie more dangerous and difficult than they had before imagined. For the French King came not then into Italie, as was by them expected: and it was commonly reported, That Petrus Toletanus Viceroy of Naples, hauing put strong garrisons into the townes all alongst the sea coast, was comming himselfe with a great armie: beside that, the horsemen sent ouer from Aulona, ranging about in the countrey of Salentum for spoile, were many times cut off by Scipio Sommeius a noble gentleman there gouernor for the Emperor. Wherefore Solyman changing his purpose for the inuasion of Italie, in his mad mood proclaimed war against the Venetians: and rising with his armie from Aulona, and marching alongst the sea coast vntill hee came ouer C against Corcyra, he incamped neere vnto the mountains called Acroceraunij, where the fierce and wilde people inhabiting the high and rough mountaine of Chimera, a part of the Acroceraunian mountaines; by the instigation of one Damianus a notable Theefe, and verie perfect in the blinde and difficult passages amongst the Rockes and Woods in those desolate Mountaines; conspired to attempt a most strange and desperate exploit, which was, by night to spoile Solyman in his owne pauilion. These beggarly wilde rogues liuing for most part by murther & robbery, altogether without law or any manner of religion, in hope of so great a prey, and to become famous in killing one of the greatest Monarks of the world in the midst of his strength, garded with so many thousands of his soldiers, were not affraid of any danger, how great soeuer, hoping in the dead time of the night to steale into the campe vndiscouered, D and there so to oppresse Solyman sleeping in his tent. Which (as was by many afterwards supposed) they were like enough to haue performed, to the astonishment of the world, had it not by chance discouered: for when they had put all things in readinesse for that purpose, Dabin by chance discouered: for when they had put all things in readinesse for that purpose, Dabinus ringleader of these desperat sauage people, by secret wayes stealing down the broken rocks of those huge mountaines, and comming verie neere vnto the campe, to view the standing of Solymans pauilion, with the order of the Turks watch, was by the cracking of a bough espied by the Ianizaries, where he stood in a tree prying all ouer the campe: and being there taken, and afterward put to torture, and confessing what he had intended, was by the commandement of Solyman torne in pieces. Whereupon he forthwith sent a great part of his armie vp into the mountains, which hunting after these wild people, as if they had bin wild beasts, slew E many of them, and by Solymans appointment did what they possibly could to haue quite destroyed them, as an infamous people, enemie to all men.

Iunusbeius, Barbarussa, and Aiax, intende Solyman against the Venetians.

Solymã conuerteth his Forces from the Italians against the Venetians.

Solymã in danger to haue bin slain in the midst of his armie.

When Solyman had thus fully reuenged himselfe vpon this barbarous nation, he purposed to inuade the Island of Corcyra, now called Corfu, part of the Venetian seigniorie: sending before, Barbarussa with his great artillerie, whom he had but a little before called out of Italie with his forces. Pisaurius the Venetian Admirall in good time perceiuing the tyrants purpose, strengthened the garrisons in both the castles of Corfu, with new supplies of good souldiers sent out of the gallies: and knowing himselfe vnable to incounter with the Turks great fleet at sea, withdrew himselfe farther off from the Island, into the gulfe of the Adriatik, to the intent to joyne his power with Ioannes Veturius, who kept that sea with another fleet of the Venetian F gallies, and so with ioyned forces to defend the Venetian coasts against the Turkes: whom he thought himselfe strong enough for with the helpe of Veturius and of Auria, whose comming was dayly expected. Solyman sending a great part of his armie out of the Main, into the Island, burnt and destroyed the countrey villages, leading away a wonderfull number of poore countrey people into most miserable captiuitie. Aiax the Bassa, and Barbarussa, in two small pinnaces came came as neere vnto the citie of Corfu as they possibly could, to see which way they might G most conueniently lay siege vnto it: but perceiuing the great strength thereof, being wonderfully fortified and thorowly manned, they aduertised Solyman, that it was a place impregnable. Aloysius Ripa, and Symon Leonius, two Senators of Venice, were then gouernors of Corfu: who not without cause standing in doubt of the great strength of the Turks both by sea and land, caused the citie suburbs (which were verie great and sumptuously built) to be pluckt downe, for feare that the Turks shrouding themselues in them, should more easily besiege the towne. This was a woful and lamentable thing to behold, when as at the same time a man might haue seene the magnificent houses of the Venetian merchants, built in time of long peace, both for profit and for pleasure in euery place of the Island, and set on fire by the Turks. But the regard of the publique State in so great a danger, made all those goodly things which went so H to wracke, to be lightly accounted of in comparison of their liues and libertie; for as much as those lost things might with new charge be againe in short time recouered.

The two Venetian gouernours aforesaid, fearing a long siege, and not prouided of victuall to suffice such a multitude as were got into the Citie, for any long time; vsed a heauie and sharpe remedie, by turning a great number of weake people and children vnable for seruice, out of the city; of whom many, especially children, died in the town ditches in their mothers armes, vnder the walls of the citie, not daring to go any further for feare of the enemie, who had fast by, in places conuenient cast vp great mounts, and planted his ordnance against the citie. Only the castle called S. Angelo, standing in the middle of the Island, about fifteene miles from the citie of Corfu, being valiantly defended by the Inhabitants against the assaults of the I Turkes, happily saued aboue three thousand poore people which fled thither from the furie of the Turkes, who in all other places of the Island had made all desolate. The Turkes the more to terrifie them of Corfu, taking a hil not far from the city, couered the same with their tents, and from the rocke called Maripetrus, shot with their great ordnance into the Towne: some of them in the meane time standing close in the ruins of the suburbs, did with their harquebusies kill or wound them which appeared vpon the walls. The gallies also did oftentimes out of their prows discharge their great pieces against the citie, to the greater terrour than hurt of the defendants. Solyman perceiuing that he did but lose his labour in besieging the citie (as he was told at the first by his great captaines, Lutzis, Aiax, and Barbarussa) determined K now to raise his siege, and to returne to Constantinople, greatly ashamed that he had no better sped, neither in Italie, nor at the siege of Corfu. But when he was about to haue departed, it was told him how vnfaithfully some of his souldiers had dealt with them of Castrum in Italie, who yeelding themselues vpon the Turks faith to them giuen for the safegard of their libertie and goods, were neuertheless most iniuriously spoiled of all that they had, and carried away into bondage. Which fact, as tending to the dishonor of his name, and the deterring of others from yeelding, Solyman tooke in so euill part, that for amending thereof, he caused the authours of that fact to be put to death, and the captiues of Castrum to be diligently sought out, and sent home againe into their countrey; well deseruing therein the commendation of a most iust Prince. The Turks left the siege of Corfu and departed out of the Island about the L twelfth of September, in the yeare 1537; carrying away aboue sixteen thousand of the Island people into perpetuall captiuitie. So Solyman rising with his armie, marching thorow Acarnania and Ætolia, returned thorow Macedonia to Constantinople: hauing in this his expedition done great harme both in Italie and Corcyra, but yet nothing increased his Empire or honour.

Good Iustice done by Solymã

The Turkes depart frõ Corfu, and carry away with thé aboue 16000 Christiãs vnto captiuitie.

Before his departure, calling vnto him Lutzis his Admirall, he commanded him also to returne with his fleet to Hellespontus: who passing by Zazinthus, and landing some of his men in the night, tooke diuers of the country people prisoners. But vnderstanding that the citie it selfe was both strong and well manned, he departed thence to Cythera, where vnfortunately attempting to haue taken the castle, and disappointed of his purpose, he made what spoyle he M could vpon that Island, and with 800 prisoners returned into Ægium to Ægyna, a rich and famous Island, and well peopled both with mariners and other inhabitants. Approching the Island, he by his messengers sent before vnto the Gouernour of the Citie, attempted first by faire means, and afterwards by threats, to haue had the same yeelded vnto him: and not so preuailing, but perceiuing them to stand vpon their defence, landed his men, and gaue the signall

A nall of battell. Which they of the Island refused not, but manfully met him, and at the first incounter slew many of his men. Wherewith the Admirall grieuously offended, and still landing fresh men, euen with his multitude oppressed them of the Island, being but in number few, and wearie of long fight; and so inforced them to retyre into the citie.

Aegina with other Islands of the Aegeã spoyled.

To be reuenged of this iniurie, the Bassa caused certaine pieces of great ordnance to be landed, and a batterie planted against the citie: by force whereof he had in short time in diuers places opened the walls, and then with all his power assaulting the breaches, forthwith tooke the citie, which after he had rifled, he burnt it down to the ground, rased the walls, and put the men euerie mothers son to the sword. As for the women, he gaue them without respect vnto the lust of his soldiers and mariners, whom afterwards together with the boyes and young
B children he shipped into the countrie neere vnto Athens, to be from thence conueyed vnto Constantinople, into most miserable seruitude.

Ægina thus vtterly rased, he with much like force and crueltie raged vpon them of Paros and the other Islands thereabouts, killing the old men and such as made resistance, and thrusting the rest into his gallies. Shortly after he came to the Isle of Naxos, where all the Island people were for feare of his comming fled out of the country into the citie: where landing his men, he made hauocke of whatsoeuer came to his hand. And in the mean time sent a messenger vnto the Duke, to will him to yeeld himselfe and his citie into the obedience of the Turkish Emperour Solyman. Which messenger admitted into the citie, and brought before the C Duke, in blunt and plaine termes, without further circumstance, deliuered his message thus:

The blunt speech of a Turke sent by Lutzis Bassa vnto the Duke of Naxos.

If thou wilt without more adoo, yeeld thy selfe, thy citie, and territorie, to the Constantinopolitan emperour, thou shalt deserue his fauour, and so saue thy selfe with that thou hast. But if thou, otherwise aduised, shalt now refuse this grace, thou shalt neuer hereafter haue the like offer, but for euer vndoe thy selfe, thy wife, and children, thy citizens, and subiects in generall. Here is present a most mightie fleet, with most valiant and victorious souldiers, furnished with all the habiliments of war requisit for battel or siege. Be warned by them of Ægina, Paros, and other thy neighbour Princes of the Islands. Thy hap is good, if thou be not misaduised, and (warned by other mens harmes) wilfully refuse to remedie thine owne; and when thou mightst be safe, wilfully cast away thy selfe.

This said, he was commanded by the duke to stand aside, and a while to expect his answer: who with the chiefe of his subiects there present, but much troubled, and all full of heauines and sorrow, consulted what answer to make. But after they had according to the weightinesse of the cause, & necessitie of time fully debated the matter, it was with general consent agreed, That forasmuch as they were not themselues of power to withstand so furious an enemie, neither to expect for helpe from others, they should therefore yeeld vnto the present necessitie, which otherwise threatned vnto them vtter destruction, and reserue themselues vnto better times. Whereupon answer was giuen vnto the messenger by the Duke, That he was readie to yeeld himselfe vnto Solyman as his vassall, and of him as of his Soueraigne to hold his Seigni-

Naxos becometh tributarie vnto the Turke.

E orie for the yerely tribute of 5000 duckets. Of which offer the Bassa accepted, receiuing in hand one yeares tribute. So was that notable Island yeelded vnto the Turkish obeisance the 11 of Nouember, the yeare 1537: from whence Lutzis the proud Bassa, laded with the rich spoyle of the countries & Islands he had passed by, returned to Constantinople with his fleet. Not long after, this great Bassa (then in credit and authoritie next vnto Solyman himselfe) fell at ods with his wife Solymans sister: for that he, after the vnnaturall manner of those barbarous people, kept in his house a most delicate youth, in whom he tooke more pleasure than in his wife. Which she, being a woman of great spirit, not able to endure, and knowing her husband by marrying of her, to haue bin from base degree aduanced vnto the highest honors the Emperor her brother could heap vpon him; in great rage reproued him with most bitter words, F saying, That she had married him to be of him beloued, and vsed as his wife, & not contemptuously abused by his minions. Wherwith the Bassa moued, gaue her a blow on the eare, and caused her as a foolish and vnquiet woman to be shut vp in her chamber. But she not brooking such abuse, came weeping to Solyman her brother, and complaining of her husband, requested to be diuorsed from him who made no better reckoning of her. And with her complaint so incensed Solyman, that he tooke from him his Seale, and thrust him out of all his honourable promotions; and had vndoubtedly put him to death, had not the remembrance of his old C loue and friendſhip ſtayed his furie: yet hauing vtterly diſgraced him, he baniſhed him the court, into Macedonia, where he ſpent the remainder of his loathed life like as a poore priuat man: of whom Boiſardus thus writeth:

Quæ tibi cum molli res eſt pollute Cynedo:
Cum cubet in Thalamis regia nympha tuis?
Ex humili fortuna loco te euexit in altum

On daintie boyes thou filthie man, why do'ſt thou fix thine eye; Whileſt prin[illegible] dame of royal bloud doth in thy chamber lie? H
From baſe eſtate, to honors height blind Fortune did thee call,
And ſet thee vp with Princes great, to worke thy greater fall.

The Turks ſpoil the Venetians, and the Venetians them likewiſe.

Solyman thus fallen out with the Venetians, as is aforeſaid, to intangle them at once with warres in diuers places, commanded his lieutenants in euery place bordring vpon any part of the Venetian Seignioric, to vex and moleſt them with all hoſtilitie, which they did accordingly. In Peloponeſſus, Caſimes beſieged Mauplium and Epidaurus, two ſtrong cities of the Venetians: Barbaruſſa landing his men in Dalmatia, ſurpriſed the antient citie of Botrotus belonging to the Venetians, carried away the citiſens, and raſed the citie: Obroatium another citie I of the Venetians in Dalmatia, called in antient time Argirutum, with the caſtle of Nadin, were taken by Vſtref, Solymans lieutenant in Illyria. The Venetians thus inuaded on euery ſide, requited them againe with the like: Piſaurius and Veturius the Venetian Admirals landing their men, beſieged Scardona a citie of the Turks in the borders of Dalmatia, which they tooke by force, put the Turks to the ſword, and ouerthrew the walls of the citie, becauſe it ſhould be no more a refuge vnto the Turks: they ſent alſo one of their Captaines called Gabriel Ribeus to beſiege Obroatium; who vpon the comming of Amurathes one of Vſtref his Captaines, cowardly fled, and in flight loſt moſt of his men: for which his cowardiſe, Piſaurus cauſed his head to be ſtrucke off aboord the Admirall Galley: And Camillus Vrſinus, appointed by the Venetian State Gouernour of Iadera a ſtrong towne vpon the frontiers of their territorie in K Dalmatia, tooke from the Turkes the towne of Oſtrouizza, which hee burnt downe to the ground: hee recouered alſo Obroatium, which was a little before loſt; which by the commandement of the Senat hee vtterly raſed, as a place not well to be kept againſt the Enemie.

The ſame Autumne that Solyman hauing waſted Corcyra, returned to Conſtantinople, and the Venetians held wars with the Turks for the townes and caſtles in Dalmatia; King Ferdinand receiued ſuch an ouerthrow at Exek by the Turkes, as a greater or more ſhamefull vnto the name of the Chriſtians was hardly in that age ſeene; if the loſſe of the choice ſouldiours and captaines of foure great Nations, with the ſhamefull flight of the Generall be well conſi-dered. After the battell of Mohahz, wherein King Lewis was loſt, the Turks hauing gotten the L victorie, kept vnto themſelues that part of Hungarie which is called Poſſega, becauſe thereby they had a fit paſſage from Belgrade further into Hungarie. The two great riuers of Sauus and Dranus running almoſt with equall diſtance from the Weſt, taking with them diuers other ſmaller Riuers, before they fall into the great riuer of Danubius Eaſtward, doe on both ſides incloſe this Countrey of Poſſega, being a rich and plentifull Countrey, and wonderfull well peopled: it bordereth vpon the Prouinces of Croatia and Corbania, which in times paſt were at continuall wars with the Turks garriſons there by in Illyria and alſo in Boſna.

Mahometes gouernour of Belgrade.

At that time one Mahometes a moſt valiant captain of the Turks was gouernor of Belgrade: to whom for his approued valor and wiſedome Solyman had committed the keeping of thoſe M frontiers, and the protection of the kingdome of Hungarie in the behalfe of king Iohn. He the yeare before had ſo vſed the matter, that what by force, what by policie, he had taken from the Chriſtians aboue thirtie ſmall Caſtles in the Coun[illegible]ey, (which was ſometime part of the patrimonie of the Deſpot of Raſcia) and had ioyn[illegible] them to the regiment of Boſna.

of Hungary had of long time vſed with the Turks, doing them with their nimble light horſebut ſeruing vpon great horſes, and charged with heauie armour, receiued great hurt by thoſe tinuall iniuries, and grieued in mind at the league which Solyman had to his profit made with him at his going into Perſia; finding the ſame both vnprofitable and hurtfull to himſelfe, determined to take vp armes, with purpoſe that if he could driue the Turks out of the countrey of Poſſega, then forthwith to paſſe ouer Dranus, and to go directly to Buda againſt King Iohn.

It ſtil ſtucke in his minde, how that kingdome was taken from him by Solyman; and that more C was, as it were in diſgrace of him and the Houſe of Auſtria, beſtowed vpon a ſtranger, which had neither right thereto, nor was any way royally diſcended. Yet were there ſome which wiſhed him, not raſhly to enter into armes againſt ſo mightie an enemie, as was not to be van-quiſhed but by the vnited forces of all the Chriſtian Princes of Europe. For they foreſaw, that Solyman ſo prouoked, would not put it vp, but for the hatred he bare againſt the Chriſti-ans, and for his honour, ſeeke more cruell reuenge: as he had of late done againſt the Venetiaans, with whom vpon a light occaſion he had broken an antient league, for ſinking one or two of his gallies; for which he would admit no excuſe or ſatisfaction. All this Ferdinand knew to be true; yet all the people of his dominions lay ſo earneſtly vpon him to take that warre in hand, that they ſaid plainly, they would neuer beare armes more againſt the Turks, if he omit-D ted that occaſion. For they of Carinthia, Stiria, Croatia, and Noricum, ſubiect to the inuaſion of the Turks, and dayly receiuing great harmes, thought the Turks might eaſily be driuen out of Poſſega, for as much as Mahometes had no great power, nor like to haue any greater, Autumne now almoſt ſpent.

So king Ferdinand, with the wonderfull reioycing of his ſubiects, cauſed ſouldiers to be taken vp in all parts of his kingdome, ſending for moſt of his nobilitie and beſt captaines, as to a religious warre: and in a verie ſhort ſpace had raiſed a good armie, yet ſuppoſed of greater ſtrength than number, as conſiſting moſt of ſelect men. The footmen were for moſt part Germans, to whom were ioyned as wings certaine companies of Italians, harquebuſiers, whome Lewis Lodronius, a valiant captaine, and Generall of the footmen, had raiſed in Rhetia and thoſe E parts of Italie which lie neere vnto the Alps. The horſmen were of Bohemia, Sileſia, Morauia, Stiria, Carinthia, and ſome alſo out of Hungarie, all conducted by their ſeuerall captaines: all theſe horſemen were in number 8000, but the footmen were 16000 ſtrong, with great ſtore of artillerie of all ſorts. This armie for the expertneſſe and valour of the ſoldiers, was thought ſufficient to haue met the greateſt armie of the Turks in field, if it had bin conducted by a politique Generall, and (as he had at other times bin) fortunat: which was one Iohn Cuzzianer, *Cuzzianer Gea Nobleman of Croatia, whom as one of great experience, and famous for the late defence of Vienna, King Ferdinand had made Generall of his armie. For Ferdinand by the aduice of his beſt friends neuer vſed to aduenture his perſon vnto the danger of any battel, eſpecially againſt the Turks, by whom many Chriſtian Kings had in former time bin vanquiſhed and ſlain; but of Belgrade vnderſtanding of this preparation made againſt him, ſent for diuers companies of the garriſon ſouldiers which lay vpon the borders neere hand; he required aid of the gouer-nours of the Turks prouince thereabouts; and was eſpecially holpen by Vſtref gouernour of Boſna, who of all Solymans lieutenants in Europe, was able to bring into the field moſt good horſe-

horsemen; he sent him Amurathes a famous captaine, with a great companie of gallant horse- G men, vnto whom were ioyned certaine companies of footmen of the wild and mountain people of Dalmatia, entertained for pay: which rough and rude kinde of people were gouerned and kept in order by certaine companies of Ianizaries drawne out of the garrison towns as far as Belgrade and Samandria: after whom followed many out of Seruia and Rascia, some for pay, some for prey. The Turks receiuer liberally paying to such as were willing to serue, two months pay before hand. Neither wanted he aid of the Hungarians from Buda: so that the Turkish gouernors on euery side putting to their helping hands, Mahometes had in short time gathered such an armie, as for number and strength was not much inferior to king Ferdinands, and resolued to expect the comming of his enemies at Exek. Cazzianer was now come as far on his way as Caprunza, a towne vpon the riuer Dranus; hauing before wel and conueniently H prouided for the victualling of his armie, if they whom he put in trust, and had taken ti[me] matter vpon them, had with like speed and diligence performed their charge: for they w[ere] the chiefe men of all the countrey, who all followed the direction of Symon Bishop of Za[g]rabia; who inflamed with zeale aboue measure, or else for want of iudgement deceiued, had promised to serue the whole campe with plentie of victuals at a verie low rate. Which thing the countrey people which were to bring in the victuall, some by waggon, some by boats alongst the riuers, many difficulties now arising, were not able to perfourn: which was not to be remedied by reason of the neereneſſe of the enemie; and also for that Mahometes with small gallies in both riuers, and his troups of horsemen pricking vp and down the countrey, did either stay the country people from bringing of victuall, or else allured them for a greater price to bring I it to his owne campe, where they receiued readie mony. Cazzianer setting forward from Caprunza, hardly came in ten dayes to the castle of Verucza, which is about fortie miles distant from Caprunza; being inforced to make short marches, by reason of the troublesome carriage of some great pieces of artillerie for batterie. The wiser sort began euen then to misdoubt the want of victuall, both for the reasons before alledged, and for that such victual as was loo-A slow march. ked for, came not, although they marched verie softly: so that they were then inforced to spend such victuall as they had prouided, not for the beginning, but for the difficulties of a long protracted warr. Wherefore Cazzianer wrot sharply to the Bishop and the other which had taken vpon them the charge of prouiding victuall for the armie; commanding them to vse all possible diligence and speed, and not to let the hope of a notable victorie to be lost K through their negligence, for want of victuall, rather than the valour of the enemie. In the meane time Cazzianer thought good there to stay, and to expect the comming of the victual, sending before him Paulus Bachitius with a thousand Hungarian light horsemen and certaine companies of Italian harquebusiers, as farre as the castle of Zopia, to the intent that he might of such prisoners as he could take, learne somthing of the enemies purpose. The Turks in the castle of Zopia descrying the comming of Bachitius, & thinking the whole armie of the Christians had bin at hand, set fire on the castle, which they thought they could not keepe, and by boats fled down the riuer Dranus. Yet for all their hast, Bachitius tooke some of them in their flight; of whom Cazzianer learned that which he before knew by his owne espials, how that Mahometes and the Turks lay incamped at Exek, with a full resolution to giue him battell. Caz- L falleth into Dranus, vntil such time as a bridge was made for the transporting of his armie, for that the riuer was not to be waded ouer: in which time Cazzianer entred oftentimes into counsell with the other Captaines, what course to hold for the better proceeding in that warre.

Where diuers men were of diuers opinions: some said, It were best to leaue Exek, and to besiege a castle of the enemies there by, called Villach: others more warie than the rest, were of opinion, That it were better there to stay vntill the rest of the aid and victuall, which they dayly expected, were come. But the greater number, which also preuailed, vrged the first determination, of going directly to the enemie at Exek, for that longer delay would but M breed further danger; and there was in the campe (as they said) both strength and victual sufficient for the obtaining of the victorie, if they would make an end of their needlesse consultations, and not protract the warre vntill Winter were come on: whereby they did nothing else, but cause the Souldiours to thinke that they were afraid to meet the enemie, and secretly

A cretly to steale away back again into their countries: wheras if they would like resolute men march on forward against the enemy, who at other times trusting most vnto his multitudes, & now hauing no great power, would neuer abide the sight of the Christian army, bringing with it so much artillerie, but would forthwith forsake the place, & neuer shew his face: forasmuch as the Christian men at arms would (as they said) easily breake thorow & ouerthrow the naked Turkish horsmen, if they durst abide the field. The yong souldiers, who as yet had neuer made proofe of the Turks manner of fight, did with such cheerfulnes like of this resolution, that they thought two daies staying, a long delay of so ready & easie a victory. Wherefore it was resolued vpon, presently to set forward, and therupon the army was mustred: where, vpon view taken, there was found to be 10000 horsmen (for diuers troups of Germans were come B to the camp, after the time of the first setting forward of the army:) a more gallant company of horsemen, both for the strength of their horses, & goodly furniture of the men, had seldom bin seen in an army so suddenly raised. But the footmen, selected out of all the prouinces, was greatly diminished, being now in number scarce 8000 strong: for many were sick in the camp, others weary of the long iourney, lingering behind were stolne away: and generally all they which were left, moyled with dirt and myre, by reason of the deepnes of the rotten way, wet thorow with rain, and almost starued with cold, and therto pinch't with hunger, were thought scarce able to indure the hardnesse of the present war. After that, commandement was giuen, That euery soldier should carry with him three daies victual: & proclamation made, That no man should vpon paine of death take any Turke prisoner, although he yeelded himselfe, or C charge himselfe with any spoile before the battell were fully ended; forasmuch as the captains would afterwards diuide the spoile of the enemy among the soldiers. This proclamation thus made thorow the campe, they set forward towards Exek: and the third day they came to a certain vally, about three miles from Exek, where they incamped. The next day a company of Turks shewed themselues, which was by the great ordnance repulsed. The day follow- The Turks skir- ing, the enemie sallied out of the towne and skirmished oftentimes with the Christians: in which skirmishes many were slain on both sides, but more wounded of the Christians, for that the Turkes had politickly mingled certaine Ianizaries harquebusiers, and archers, with their horsemen; who, vsed to that manner of fight, sore gauled the Christian horsemen. For which cause the Generall forbad all such light skirmishes, as purposing to keepe his strength whole D against the generall day of battell: commanding his canoniers so to place the great ordnance as might most annoy the enemy, if he should shew himselfe by troupes within the danger of the shot: which was so well performed, that the Turks sallying forth, receiued therby great hurt, the deadly shot flying thorow the midst of their companies. The same day Symon Bishop of Zagrabia came into the camp with his horsemen, and a certain prouision of victual, whereby the feare of the want before conceiued, was wel eased. Mahometes perceiuing that the Christians were not longer to be drawn to those harmful skirmishes, but that he must bring his men in danger of the great shot, to annoy them by another means, sent many small boats, manned with harquebusiers & small pieces of ordnance, into the lake neere vnto the camp, so to keepe the Christians from watering there, & with those small pieces shot oftentimes into the camp.

E Neere vnto the vally where the Christians lay, was a hill, whereupon stood a village, wherin were placed certaine companies of Turks, to skirmish as occasion should serue with the Christians; for displacing of whom the whole army was put in order of battel, and the great artillerie bent vpon them, that they should not with their light skirmishes, after the maner of the Turkish fight, trouble the order of the armie. Which thing the Turks perceiuing, & that they were not able to hold the place, set fire on the town, & so retired to Exek. The Christians keeping on their march, came to the top of the hil, from whence they might see Exek stand about two miles off in a faire plaine, neere vnto the banke of Dranus: all which low ground betwixt the hil and Exek, was so subiect to the castle, that it was thought a matter too ful of danger, to attempt, that way to batter the castle, & expose the army to the ineuitable fury of the enemies F shot. Wherfore descrying a rising ground on the further side of the city equal with the top of the wals, they thought it best to remoue their camp thither, & on that side to plant their bat-terie against the city. But to come to that place was thought a matter of no smal trouble: for they must fet a compasse three miles on the right hand thorow a forrest by a foule & troublesome way, before they could come to the place they desired: for the army was not so great, as to beſiege the citie round; wherein were not (as is reported) aboue ſixteen thouſand men: neither was there ſuch ſtore of victuals in the camp, but that the army was like ſoone to feele the want thereof, without a continuall ſupplie, which would hardly be had, the enemie ſtil beſetting euery paſſage, and with their light horſemen ſcouring about all the countrey, of purpoſe to keep them from victual. For which cauſe, ſome were of opinion, That it were beſt for them there to ſtay where they were, vntill ſuch time as both more aid and better ſtore of victuals were come vnto them: but others of contrary mind, ſaid the enemy was but barely ſtored with victuall himſelfe, and therefore could not long hold out; which they ſaid they vnderſtood by certain Chriſtian fugitiues; and that Mahometes had put his chiefe ſubſtance into certain boats, to be conueied downe the riuer, as purpoſing to flie, and would not hold out the ſiege aboue three daies: as for the forreſt, they thought it would well enough be paſſed thorow, if they would couragiouſly ſet forward: beſide that, the time of the yeare ſuffered no delay, Winter comming ſo faſt on, that except ſome notable thing were done quickly, they ſhould be preuented by the very time of the yeare to returne with ſhame, without doing any thing. This opinion was beſt liked of, as more honorable and better beſeeming men of valor, than to lie ſtill in one place: whereupon the next day the army remoued, and in good order marched thorow the forreſt. Which thing Mahometes quickly perceiuing, preſently ſent forth a thouſand light horſemen, and certaine companies of the Ianizaries, harquebuſiers, to trouble the Chriſtians in their paſſage: who by a neere and well knowne way ouertaking the armie, ſuddenly charged the rereward, wherin the Italians and Bohemians marched. The Bohemians quickly fled, and the Italians with much adoe endured the charge: but being relieued by the Carinthian men at armes, they notably repulſed the Turks, and put them to flight. So the army with ſmall loſſe paſſed the forreſt, and came to the place they deſired: where, after they had incamped themſelues, and in good order placed all things needfull for the ſiege, they in ſeemely order offered vnto the enemie battell: but he keeping himſelfe within the towne, ſhot at the Chriſtians with his great ordnance: and they to requite him, with two great pieces which they had placed vpon the riſing of a hill, ſhot thorow both the wals of the towne and the bulwarke alſo, to the great terror of the defendants. The Chriſtians in the meane time hauing ſtood almoſt all the day in order of battell in ſight of the enemie, vainely expecting when hee ſhould come forth to giue them battell, returned at night into their camp: for Mahometes vpon great conſideration kept in his ſouldiers, although they were moſt deſirous to fight; vnderſtanding right well of the want of victuall in the Chriſtian camp; and beſide that (as the fugitiues reported) being ſtraitly commanded by letters from Solyman, that he ſhould not vpon pain of a moſt ſhamefull death forſake the place, but to defend it to the laſt. Now the Chriſtians deſirous of battell, being thus delaied and deceiued of their expectation, had in a few daies ſpent the ſmal ſtore of victuall they had, and began to feele a generall want: neither was there any apparant meanes how they ſhould bee relieued, ſo that euery man began to feare ſome generall miſchiefe to inſue. When Balthaſar Pamphilus, a noble Hungarian, & a captain of great experience, ſitting in counſell with the reſt, entred into this ſpeech.

Captaines (ſaid hee) we doe all that wee doe, vnaduiſedly: For whileſt we conſult at large how wee may ouercome our enemies, the ſtrength of our armie is in the meane time ſo weakened for want of victuall, that the ſouldiers are neither well able to ſtand on their legs, nor to hold their weapons in their feeble hands: and generally, euen they which are of greateſt courage begin now to quaile, and deſpairing of battell, ſee that they muſt miſerably and ſhamefully periſh for want. Wherefore in my opinion, wee ought firſt and aboue all things moſt ſpeedily to prouide for this want, which ſo grieuouſly pincheth vs: and preſently to remoone hence vnto the caſtle of Hermande, that with the proviſion thereof, which is not like to be little, we may refreſh our whole armie; and ſo relieued, to proceed further as occaſion ſhall require.

This caſtle was about ten miles diſtant from Exek; whereinto many of the Turks had conueied their wiues & children, and chiefeſt ſubſtance, being kept with a ſmal garriſon of 20 Turks. Faſt by the caſtle was a prettie little walled towne, without flankers, after the manner of the old fortifying: which towne and caſtle Balthazer ſaid would eaſily be taken. This his counſell was well liked of all men, and he himſelfe ſent with certain companies of ſoldiers to take the towne. Wherin fortune ſo fauored him, that it was at his firſt comming ſurrendred vnto him: but when he had it, he found not therein any ſuch ſtore of corne or victuall as he had hoped for:

The Turkes skirmiſh with the Chriſtians in paſſing the forreſt.

for: yet he tooke there certaine veſſels of wine, to the great reliefe of the weake ſouldiers. Vpon the newes of the taking of this towne, the campe remoued from Exek about ten a clock in the night, but ſo diſorderly, that the ſouldiers ſcarce knowing their owne enſignes, ſeemed rather to haue fled for feare, than marched for ſpoile: yet the Turks for all that mooued not out of Exek, miſdoubting ſome deceit, & loth to attempt any thing raſhly in the night. When the army was come to the towne, the captains tooke order, that the victuall there found, was equally diuided amongſt the ſouldiers, and the next morning batterie laied againſt the caſtle; which thoſe few Turks valiantly defended halfe a day, and then by compoſition yeelded it. But when the caſtle was taken, there was found in it but two barrels of meale, and other two of millet. Then might a man haue ſeene the captaines themſelues hanging their heads, as men ſtrucken with a ſudden feare, who in ſtead of a great prey & victual to haue ſerued many daies, found nothing but a few women and children, and ſcarce ſo much victuall both in the town & caſtle, as would ſerue the army two daies. Yet they diſſembled the matter, & fed the ſoldiers with hope of better ſtore, after the bridge were once repaired, that they might paſſe the riuer of Bodrog, which ran by the town: which bridge the Turks had before (for defence of themſelues) broken, by plucking vp of certain piles, & taking away of the planks; wherfore the carpenters being ſet on worke, and euery man putting too his helping hand, the bridge was with continual labor in 3 daies repaired. The fourth day, the wagons & ſmaller pieces of ordnance paſſed ouer the bridge, & after them ſix of the great pieces for batterie; but the bridge ouercharged with the ſeuenth, which was of a wonderfull weight, & much greater than the reſt, began to breake; ſo that the captains were inforced to breake that faire piece of ordnance, and ſo by pieces to carry it away, that the enemy ſhould not get ſo great a ſpoile. All things being thus well paſſed ouer, the piles were again cut down, & the plancks ſtrucke off, to the intent the enemie ſhould not that way purſue them: & other way there was none, but to fetch a compaſſe about the great lake which was many miles about. Here the captaines began to conſult, whether it were beſt to break the great pieces of ordnance, that ſo they might more ſpeedily march away, or not. Of which opinion was Cazzianer himſelfe, promiſing of his own charge to new caſt them. As for the ſcaling ladders, & ſuch other like things prouided for the ſiege, they burnt becauſe they ſhould not come into the enemies hand, or trouble themſelues in their march. But moſt of the captains were of opinion, that it was not beſt ſo diſhonorably to break those goodly pieces, the greateſt ornament and defence of their country; but to hold on their march thorow Poſſega, vntill they came to Iuvancha, where they ſhould find great ſtore both of corne and wine: which towne with the caſtle of Gara faſt by it, ſtored with all kind of proviſion, they ſaid would eaſily be taken before the Turks could poſſibly come ſo far about the lake from Exek: and that it were a great ſhame, ſo to return without doing any thing. Cazzianer thus perſuaded, ſet forward, & with great toile (by reaſon of the deepnes of the way and heauines of the great ordnance) came by night to Iuvancha, which was but three miles off: where the Turkes hauing with incredible celeritie paſſed a long iourney, arriued at the ſame time alſo. Neere vnto this caſtle was a little towne, out of which all the Turks were fled: the townſmen being Chriſtians, opened the gates and receiued in the ſouldiers; who there filled themſelues aboundantly with wine, & could hardly be driuen out thence by their captains to the camp. The ſame night the Turks burnt the ſame towne, and whatſoeuer the Chriſtians had therin left: and euery man betooke him to his armour in the camp, for the enemie was now at hand: & in the dawning of the day began hotly to skirmiſh in diuers places with the Chriſtians; but eſpecially in that quarter of the camp where the Bohemians lay. Wherwith Petrus Raſchinius Generall of the Bohemians, being grieued, ſet vpon them with a troup of his beſt horſmen, & inforced them to flie: but the Turks after the manner of their fight, quickly returning again, & relieued by the comming in of their fellows, beſet the Bohemians on euery ſide, and ſlew many of them. Raſchinius the Generall fighting moſt valiantly, was there ſlaine with his followers. The Chriſtian captains purpoſing to retire home, placed on each ſide of the armie foure ranks of wagons for defence on both ſides: in the vauward were placed the weake and ſick men, yet ſo, that in the front of the army were certain companies of luſty tal ſoldiers: but in the rereward was placed the greateſt ſtrength both of horſe & foot. The army thus marching as it were on both ſides intrenched, as it oftimes met with woody hils hindring their way, ſo did the ſame fitly ſerue the Chriſtians, that the Turkes could not wel aſſaile them in their march, march, both before and behind. Which thing Mahometes perceiuing, sent before certain companies of Ianizaries and nimble footmen, which knew the country and the passages well, with certaine faulcons and other small pieces to take the straits whereby the armie was to passe, and so to gaul them in their passage; & when they could keep the place no longer, to flie back to another, and so from place to place: and in the open places he had his troups of light horsemen, which were euer busie in one place or another of the armie. By which meanes the Christians in their march receiued much harme, which grieued them the more, for that no great power of the Turks was any where to be seen together, but straggling companies; which as they were commanded, sometime would come on with a fierce charge, and by and by retire againe, and with their arrows and faulcon shot, from places of aduantage assaile them. At one of these straits somewhat bigger than the rest, Paulus Bachitius one of the Hungarian captains, in whom the souldiers generally reposed their greatest trust, was slaine with a faulcon shot, with diuers other of the valiant Hungarians; who seeing there a greater number of the Turks than they had seen in other places, thought to haue don som good seruice vpon them: his death bred a generall feare vpon the whole army, forasmuch as both then and at other times, without him they neuer had any good successe against the Turks. Yet in that skirmish, the Hungarians, to reuenge the dearth of their captaine, did with such force repulse the enemy, that they caused him after he had lost many of his men, to run away and leaue his small field-pieces behinde him. But such was the weakenesse or cowardise of the Christian footmen, and the agilitie of the Turks, especially the Ianizaries, that they with their shot out of the woods, staid the Hungarian horsemen from the pursuit of their fellowes, and recouered their small field-pieces before they could be carried away by the Christian footmen: wherewith they did againe forerun the army, and still trouble it as before. The Christians beset with these dangers, and almost spent for want of victuall, seeing no meanes to relieue their weake bodies, nor any hope to comfort their fainting spirits, did generally feare some extreame calamitie to insue: and so much the more, for that it was reported, that Mahometes stil expected fresh supplies from Belgrade, Samandria, and Nicopolis: and many of the Hungarian light horsemen stole away from them, as carefull of their owne safetie: neither did they see any comfort in the dismaied captaines, who at other times were woont with cheerefull and couragious wordes to relieue the souldiers, if they saw them any thing discouraged. But when they were come into a faire open field neere vnto a towne called Gara, they were aduertised, That the enemy had in the woods before them, whereby they were to passe, cut downe great trees crosse the waies, so that neither their great ordnance nor wagons, nor yet their horsemen could possibly passe that way but that they must needs breake their order.

A generall feare in the Christians camp

This once bruted thorow the army, filled them with all heauinesse and desperation, and so much the more, for that Ladislaus Moreus, and others which knew the country well, said there was but two wayes to escape; the one thorow the woods about ten miles space to Walpo, which by reason of the trees cut downe crosse the waies by the Turkes was not to be passed, but they must needs leaue behind them their great ordnance and carriages: the other towards the castle of Zenthuerzebeth, which was in Ladislaus Moreus his countrey, certaine miles distant from Gara: by taking of which way, the enemy by reason of the straightnesse of the passage, must of necessitie be inforced to giue ouer his pursuit. Yet for all that, it was in counsell resolued vpon, to take the way thorow the woods of Walpo, for that there was there victuall enough, and in the castle of Walpo was kept mony sent from king Ferdinand, sufficient to pay the souldiers for all that Winter. And so leauing the great ordnance behind them, and burning the pouder and whatsoeuer els could not well be carried on horseback, to set forward with all speed: as for the trees they said, they would be well enough remoued, & the way opened by the pioners and waggoners: wherfore euery captain was commanded to haue his souldiers in readines to set forward vpon the signe giuen, which was by the sound of a shalm or hoboy; which when it should be giuen, was referred to the discretion of the Generall. There were many which wonderfully disliked of this resolution, and said openly, that the enemy was fewer in number than their horsmen, and pinched almost with like want of victuall: besides, that the Turks durst neuer in just fight incounter with the Christian men at arms, but like theeues assaile them vpon a sudden at some aduantage, and by & by be gone again: and that the town of Gara where the enemy lay incamped, was not so strong but that it might be won: wherfore all

The fearefull resolution of the Christians to get from the Turks

all things were to be proued, and some great matter to be attempted of valiant men, pinched with wants: for that to run away, would be not only a dishonor vnto the captains themselues, who ought always to prefer their honor before their liues, but also dangerous to them, which respected nothing but life. And if they should set forward in the night, many would be lost in the woods; and valor in the darke could not be knowne from cowardise: besides that, the Turks (as they said) lay so nigh, that it was not possible to depart without their knowledge, especially if they should burne the pouder, or breake the great ordnance. For which causes, they thought it better to fight a battel with them, & not to beleeue the false reports of new supplies come vnto them, and that God would vndoubtedly giue them aid, which were ready to lay down their liues for their religion and glory of the Christian name. After all this, they began to consult what was now to bee done with the sicke and wounded souldiers, which were before carried in wagons or among the other baggage of the armie: for it was like, that so great a multitude of sicke and wounded men, vnderstanding what was decreed concerning the departure of the army, would as miserable forsaken men, fill the campe with lamentation and mourning; which it was thought would be also increased by the weeping and wailing of them which should neuer afterwards see their brethren, kinsmen, fellowes, or friends, so miserably and shamefully left behind and forsaken: the noise wherof, must needs come to the ears of the Turks, which lay within a small gun shot. Wherefore it was determined, that these sicke and wounded souldiers should be carried vpon the wagon and cart horses; and that such as were not able to stay themselues, should be holden vp by other of more strength riding behind thē vpon the bottocks of the horse. In fine, to color the matter, they which were so desirous to go, said that this their maner of departure grounded vpon good reason, was not to be accounted a shameful flight (as some would tearm it) but a right honest & necessary maner of retiring: forasmuch as the were stronger than their enemies in horsmen, & equal also (if not stronger) in footmen, although they were sore weakned with sicknes. Whilst these things were in counsel diuersly discoursed, & the resolution set down as is before said, the matter was brought to this passe, that euery captain with troubled iudgement conceiued in himselfe secret cogitations, far from the common good; & without regard of shame & dishonor, bethought himself how he might betake himselfe to flight, the vncertaine hope of desired life. On the contrarie part, Mahometes vsing most certain spies, & aduertised euery houre of all the distresses of the Christians, and thereby presaging his future victorie; did by most diligent watch and troupes of horsemen, besetting the passages farre and neere, most vigilantly attend euery motion in the Christian camp: of purpose, that when the army should rise and set forward, he after his wonted manner might in the straits (fit for his purpose) set vpon them being diuided and disperſed one from another, as they must needs in those troublesome passages: for he had so placed his horsmen & footmen in the knowne tracts of those woods, that he had shut vp the Christians as it were in a toile. It was now almost midnight, and the army taking no rest, so carefully expected the signe of setting forward, that euery little delay seemed to most men both tedious and dangerous: so that many great captains vpon a cowardly conceit would stay no longer, but hasted to depart, and to go before the rest, without any leaue of the Generall. The beginning of this mischieuous departure, is reported to haue bin begun by the common Hungarian horsmen, which knowing the passages & waies thorow the woods, made most hast to Walpo. Ladislaus Moreus dishonourably following their example, went the other way to his castle Zenthuerzebeth. After them followed in great hast the Stirian horsmen, without regard of shame, led by Iohn Hunganot their General, who was appointed to haue guarded the rereward. Symon Bishop of Zagrabia fled in like manner, knowne by his great lanthorne wandring in the wood: yet with lesse shame than the rest, because he being a clergie man, thought it not to belong to his vocation to put on armes, or to goe into battell. In the meantime it was fearefully told to Cazzianer, That the Hungarian horsemen were fled, and that Ladislaus and Hunganot, with the Stirian troupes were gone also; and that all the rest of the armie not expecting the appointed signall, were in like manner vpon flying: with which report, the cowardly and dismaid Generall was so terrified, that he presently got to horse, quite forgetting the signall he should haue giuen (for that he thought all the rest, as he afterwards said, to haue beene gone before) and as hee was vnarmed, betooke himselfe to flight, leauing behinde him for hast his Tent stored with plate and other rich furniture. In this tumult of them which so disorderly fled, Lodro-

trey, and authour of the publique calamitie: so that it was reported, that he durst neither goe abroad, nor shew his face for shame. He was so generally hated, that infamous libels, made against him & the other captains which shamefully fled as he did, were commonly sung in the streets by boyes in all places of Germanie. Wherewith he was so much grieued, that hee requested of K. Ferdinand, that he might safely come to the court, to answer whatsoeuer could be laid against him: which his request the king easily granted, and when he came to the court, receiued him with doubtfull countenance. But when the hearing of his cause was by the king somewhat longer protracted than he would haue had it, and he in the meane time kept vnder safe custodie; impatient of such delay, and halfe doubtfull whether he should be quitted or condemned, thought it better to flie, than to abide the triall. So feigning himselfe sicke, and scraping vp by little and little with his knife a bricke pauement vnder his bed, and so in the night getting out one bricke, first and then another, at length brake thorow the vault, & with his sheets letting himself downe, escaped, hauing post horses readie for him without the castle. Not long after, as he was a man of a hastie and vnconstant nature, despairing of his [illegible], he fled to the Turks; Mahometes gladly receiuing him, and beside his great entertainment, promising him the gouernment of all Croatia in manner of a tributarie king, if he would faithfully serue Solyman, and helpe him in the subduing of the cities of Austria. After he had agreed vpon all the conditions of his reuolt, that he might return to Mahometes with some more credit, he began boldly to deale with Nicholaus Sirenus a Nobleman of Croatia, and his deere friend, as he supposed, to reuolt with him; assuring him, that Solyman would deale as kindely with them both, as he had before with king Iohn in the kingdom of Hungarie. Sirenus promised him he would, or at least made as if he promised to do what he desired, and so agreed as it were vpon the matter, promising to goe ouer with him to the Turke with a troupe of his best and most trustie horsemen. But Sirenus considering with himselfe the hainousnesse and impietie of so great an offence, changing his purpose, chose rather to deale treacherously with his old friend, fearing no such thing in his house, than to offend both against God and his Prince. Wherefore after he had well feasted Cazzianer in his house, he as a most cruell hoast, caused him to be slaine, and sent his head to King Ferdinand: in reward whereof he receiued of the Kings gift Cazzianer his castle, with all his substance.

Cazzianer imprisoned, breaketh prison.

Cazzianer most shamefully murdred, and his head sent vnto K. Ferdinand.

In the meantime the Venetians, prouoked by the Turks with diuers iniuries both by sea & land (when as Solyman but a little before hardly besieging Corcyra, and with most barbarous cruelty wasting the Island, had broken the league, & euen then by his lieutenant Cassimes Bassa besieged Epidaurus and Nauplium, two of their cities in Peloponesus) resolued without defence. Whereunto they were also animated both by Charles the Emperor, and Paulus the great Bishop: who warned by the late and dangerous attempts of Solyman and Barbarussa, thought it more for the safetie of their estates, by giuing aid to the Venetians, to keepe the Turks busied further off, than to suffer them to acquaint themselues too much with the ports of Italy and Sicilia. Wherefore all the Winter following they labored by their Embassadors, to set down what number and what manner of ships, what souldiers, what money was to be prouided, and how to be according to their estates apportioned, for the setting forth of a strong fleet against the next Summer, to be sent into Grecia against the Turks. At last it was agreed amongst these confederat Princes, by their Embassadors at Rome, That the Emperour should furnish and set forth 82 gallies, the Venetians the like number, and the Bishop 36, to make vp the number of two hundred gallies; that the Venetians should send vnto the Bishop so many gallies readie rigged, as he should desire, to be furnished by him with mariners and soldiers; and that the Emperor and the State of Genoa should find sufficient shipping for the transportation of the land forces and victuall. The Generals also of this great fleet to be set forth, were at the same time appointed: Andreas Auria for the Emperour, Vincentius Capellus for the Venetians, and Marcus Grimmenus, Patriarch of Aquilea for the Bishop; to whom was ioyned Paulus Iustinianus one of the chiefe Senatours, a man of great experience in sea matters. It was also agreed, that Ferdinand Gonzaga Viceroy of Sicilie, should haue the commanding of the land forces; and that whatsoeuer was got from the Turks in that expedition in Grecia, the islands, or Dalmatia, should be all faithfully deliuered to the Venetians, who had receiued so many iniuries from the Turks. The Emperour also of his liberalitie promised vnto the other Confederats,

The Emperour, the Venetians, and the Bishop of Rome, enter into a confederation against the Turks.

federats, that they should for reasonable price haue as much wheat as they would out of Sicilia, without paying any custome.

Solyman vnderstanding of this confederation and preparation made against him by these Christian Princes, commanded Barbarussa his Admirall to make readie his fleet to goe against these enemies, and to do all the harme he could vpon the Islands subiect to the Venetian state. Which thing Barbarussa with great care and diligence in short time performed: and so with 130 gallies in most warlike manner appointed, with the first of the Spring, in the yeare 1538, departed from Hellespontus directly to Crete; where hauing passed the promontorie of Gyamus, which at this day is called Sparta, he vnaduisedly landed most part of his men, to haue surprised the citie Canea, which was in antient time called Sydonia. But Grittus one of the Venetian Senatours then kept the Citie with a strong garrison; who from the walls and bulwarks thereof so plagued the Turks with great and small shot, and the sallying out of two companies of Italians, that Barbarussa hauing lost many of his men, was faine to retyre againe to his fleet in such hast, that he left behind him 1000 of his Turks, which were gone further into the Island after bootie, who were afterwards all slain by them of Crete. After that, he attempted to haue taken diuers places in the Island, and was euery where notably repulsed. With the citie of Candia, whereof the Island now taketh name, and was in antient time called Cytheum, he durst not meddle: but sailing almost round about the Island, tooke only Cecilia, a little towne before forsaken of the inhabitants, which he set on fire, and so departed from Crete: for he was aduertised, That Vincentius Capellius the Venetian Admirall, who was now come to Corcyra, would in short time come to relieue them of Crete. Auria, Admiral of the Emperors fleet, passing the strait of Messana, came to Corcyra also, and there ioyned with the Venetians. The Christian fleet was then so great that it was thought the Turks durst not meet it at sea, but by all means shun to giue battell. For Barbarussa then lay with the Turkes fleet in the bay of Ambracia, expecting when the Christians should enter the strait entrance thereof, where he had on both sides placed diuers pieces of great ordnance, to haue sunk them in their comming in: for Grimanus the Patriarch, a little before departing from Corcyra, had with the great Bishops gallies begun to besiege Preuesa, a towne vpon the promontorie of Actium fast by that strait; and landing some of his souldiers, with three great pieces of artillerie so battered the castle of Preuesa, that he was like enough to haue taken it, had not the Turks from Ætolia come to relieue it with a strong power both of horse and foot. Wherefore the Patriarch shipping againe his men and ordnance, returned to the fleet at Corcyra, not repenting him of his journey, for that he had well viewed the straits of that Bay, and all the enemies fleet riding at anchor within it. Vpon the returne of the Patriarch, and relation made, what he had both done and seene, the great commanders of the Christian fleet entred into counsell, what course were best to take for their better proceeding in that great action. Gonzaga the Viceroy, Generall of the land forces, was of opinion, That it were best to land the souldiers and great ordnance, and with all their force to assault the castle of Preuesa: which once trken, and their ordnance there planted, the enemies fleet might in the Bay be vtterly defeated, for that all passage to sea might easily be taken from them, by sinking of one of the great ships in the mouth of the Strait, and by moaring there of three great Galleons full of Artillerie: so that if Barbarussa would desperatly aduenture to come out, he must needs be sunke in the mouth of the Bay. Whereunto Auria replied, That Gonzaga his counsell was in words and shew glorious, but to put in execution most dangerous: for that first to land the souldiers and great artillerie, hee said was a thing too too full of hazard and perill: for it was to be thought, that the Turkes in Ætolia would as they had before done, come with speed with their horsemen to relieue the besieged in the castle; whose force the Christian footmen could hardly abide. Besides that, if the fleet should by force of weather be constrained to leaue that coast, (as it wel might, Autumne now comming fast on) after the souldiers were landed, From whence should they then get victuall in the enemies countrey? or what relefe should they hope for, if they should happ to be distressed; being on euery side beset with their enemies, and their friends by tempest driuen from them? Wherefore he thought it best, if the enemie could not be drawne out of the Bay to battell, to go directly into the Bay of Naupactum, and to take that town which was not greatly fortified, and to ransacke and spoile all the townes, euen to the bottom of the Bay of Corinth. Which the Grecians in the Fleet, said might easily be done: by taking of which course it might so fall out, that Barbarussa mooued with the danger of his friends, would for G shame come out and ioyne with them in battell. This counsell of Auria was best liked both of Capellius and the Patriarch, being far more desirous to fight with their enemies at sea, than land.

Auria braueth Barbarussa lying in the Bay of Ambracia.

Auria hauing put in order his fleet, came to Preuesa, and so to the strait of the bay of Ambracia, where he so placed the whole fleet, which was in number 250 saile, that it might easily of the enemie be numbred. Which sight (as it was reported) wonderfully troubled Barbarussa; who although he was of a couragious disposition, and such a man as greatly feared not either the valor or martial discipline of the Christians, yet was he exceedingly moued with the sight of so great a fleet so well appointed; for a greater had not of long time bin seen in the Ionian sea. So that an Eunuch of [illegible]mans court, sent by him as Barbarussa his companion, seeing him to delay the time as a [illegible]re discouraged, did with most vnciuil and proud words take him vp, because he would not forthwith go out of the bay and fight with the Christians wh[illegible]ay at the mouth thereof daring of them: wherein he was not (as he said) to regard his ow[illegible]- tie (who as a coward could not endure the sight of the enemie) but the honour of Solyman his Soueraigne, who would not take it well, to haue the glorie of his name stained with so shamefull a delay: for if he were a valiant and martiall man, as he professed himselfe to be, he ought neuer to dispaire of victorie: and if it should so fall out, that fortune should frown vpon them, and not answer to their desires, yet should not Solyman therefore want captaines and souldiers better than they, if they were ouercome; and the woods of Pontus would afford him timber I enough to build twice so great and strong a fleet. And for a conclusion, the insolent Eunuch willed Barbarussa to beware, that whilest he feared a most honorable death (which was vncertain, though the battell were lost) he drew not vpon himselfe the certaine danger of a most shamefull death by the displeasure of Solyman.

Barbarussa reproued of cowardise by one of the Turkes Eunuchs.

Barbarussa his answere to Salec concerning the Eunuchs speech.

At which speech Barbarussa turning himself about to Salec, one of the arch pyrats, a famous sea man, said vnto him, We must for ought that I can see, most valiant and faithfull captaine, aduenture this battell, although it be at too much disaduantage; lest haply we perish by the complaints of this barking demie man. And so presently commanded all his fleet to weigh anchor, at the same time that Auria had hoised saile, and was on his way toward the bay of Naupactus, thinking that the enemie durst not for feare haue come out of the bay of Ambracia. Auria keeping on his K course, was come to Leucade, when the enemies fleet was descried out of the top of Bondelmerius galleon, to be come out of the Bay, & to make towards them, keeping close by the shore: which manner of course the craftie Turke, misdoubting his owne strength, held of purpose, that if he should chance to be ouermatched by the Christians, he might turne the prow of his gallies vpon them, and running the poups aground, so to land his men and great ordnance, and from land as hee might to defend his fleet: accounting it a lesse losse (if the worst should chance) to lose the gallies, than the men.

Barbarussa putteth out of the bay of Ambracia, and followeth Auria.

Auria somewhat troubled with this sudden comming out of the enemie, as with a thing which he then least expected, yet notably staid himselfe, and commanded all the fleet to pre- L pare themselues to battel, and to follow his Admirall gally. Now all the Turks fleet was come into the open sea in such order, that Barbarussa himselfe was in the middle battell; where his Admirall gallie was to be seene with many purple flagges and streamers flying gallantly in the winde: on his right hand was Tabaches, and Salec on the left, both men of great fame, euerie one of them hauing almost like number of gallies, which were in all 150. Vnto the middle battell were ioyned two wings, in such order, that which way soeuer the Admirall turned, they turning also, still represented the forme of a flying Eagle: so that (as Auria himselfe afterwards confessed) a more firme or orderly fleet could not haue bin brought out by any expert captain. Before the fleet, came about 20 nimble gallies conducted by Drogut (or Dragut) an arch pyrat, famous afterwards for the great harme he did vnto the Christians. Capellius the Venetian Admirall came in his long boat to Auria, requesting him, That he with his gallies might giue the first charge vpon the enemy: to whom Auria gaue great thanks, and praising his forwardnes, requested him to follow him, to whom he would in good time giue a signe what he would M haue done. The formost of the Turks light gallies was now come to the great galleon of Bondelmerius, which was the formost of the Christian fleet, whereunto were sent also certaine gallies from Salec, to helpe to assaile that tall ship; which shooting a far off, did no harme, neither

A Bondelmerius them; who would not suffer one piece to be discharged; for he being an expert sea man, and loth to shoot in vain, expected that they should come neerer vnto him, and then vpon the sudden to discharge all his great ordnance vpon them. Neither was he deceiued in that his expectation, for the Turks comming neere vnto him, were so ouerwhelmed with the great and small shot out of the galleon, that they were glad to stay their course, and retyre. In the meane time Auria called backe again the ships which were gon before, and caused his galleon to be towed out; and by boats of purpose sent out, charged the captains of the gallies to make themselues readie to fight, vpon signal giuen by the sound of the trumper, and displaying of the Admirals ensigne: yet was not Auria of mind to fight, with his gallies without his ships. Which thing the craftie enemie well perceiued, and therefore sought by all meanes to ioyne
B battel with the gallies, before the comming in of the tall ships, which were as castles in respect of the gallies: for it was then such a calme, that the ships were not able to keepe way with the gallies, and the smooth water seemed to offer a fit opportunity for battell; which so wel pleased the Patriarch, that many heard him crying aloud to Auria to giue the signal; and maruelled much why he deferred to giue battell. For he fetching a great compasse, and houering about his ships, with his gallies kept such a course, that many thought he would vpon a sudden haue done some strange & vnexpected exploit vpon the enemie: but Auria held that strange course Auria his politique course.
of purpose to haue drawn the enemies gallies within the danger of his great ships, who thundring amongst them with their great ordnance, might haue easily sore beaten and disordered them, and opened a way vnto his gallies to haue gotten a most certain victorie. But the craftie
C old Turke doubting by the strangenes of Auria's course, to be circumuented with some fineasse, changed his course, and lay still with his own squadron of gallies, warily expecting to what purpose that strange course of the enemie tended. In the meane time, both the wings of his fleet had a little before Sun-set, begun in diuers places to encounter with the Christians: some were in vaine still assailing Bondelmerius his great galleon; others with their great ordnance had so sore beaten two tall ships (wherein Buccanigra and Mongaia, two Spanish captains, were imbarked with their companies) that they were giuen for lost, many of the souldiers and mariners being slain. Two other ships loded with victual, the one of Venice, the other of Dalmatia, were burnt by the Turks, & some few of the men saued by their ship boats, & by swimming to the ships neerest vnto them. In the shutting in of the euening Salec tooke two gallies D straggling behind the rest of the fleet, whereof Mozenicus a Venetian, and Bebiena a Florentine, were captains. After these gallies, was taken also the ship of Aloysius Figaroa a Spaniard, although his souldiers had for a time fought most valiantly. In this ship, with Figaroa the father, was taken his son, a yong gentleman, and beautified with all the good gifts of nature; who afterwards presented to Solyman, turned Turke: and growing in credit in Solymans chamber, after 3 yeres miserable imprisonment, obtained his poore fathers libertie, and sent him well rewarded home againe into Spain. Whilst both the fleets were thus expecting how they might to their most aduantage ioyne battell, suddenly arose a great tempest of thunder, lightning, and rain, with a fresh gale of Easterly wind: whereupon the Christians seeing the Turks hoising vp The christian fleet shamefully flieth.
their small sails, without delay hoised vp both small and great to cleere themselues of the ene-
E mie, and with that faire wind returned again to Corcyra; so disordredly and in such hast, sparing neither saile nor oare, that it seemed rather a shamefull flight, than an orderly retreat. So that Auria, a man of so great fame at sea, as that he was called a second Neptune, was that day accounted no captain. It is reported, that Barbarussa with the same wind pursued the Christians a while, and being not able longer to see what course they held, by reason of the darknesse of the night, to haue staid his course: for the Admirals had caused their lights which they vsed to carrie in the poups of their gallies, to be put out. Wherat Barbarussa heartily laughing, said oftentimes in the Spanish tongue; Auria hath therefore put out his light, the better in the darke to hide his flight: noting in him such a feare, as that he without regard of honour, fought onely Barbarussa scoffeth at Auria.
how by flight to escape. When they were come to Corcyra, they were all generally of opi-
F nion, That by the benefit of that sudden storme they had auoided a great danger. The Imperials, especially the Genowaies, to excuse Auria, imputed the cause of so shameful a flight vnto the Venetians, who would not from the beginning receiue any Spanish souldiers into their gallies, the better to haue withstood the enemy; and that Auria therfore doubting of the Venetians, refrained from ioyning battell; and the rather, because that vpon the comming forth of the Turks fleet, they had hoised vp their sailes tied vp to the yards with small lines, which they might at their pleasure easily cut, and set saile to flie which way they would. Shortly after came Barbarussa with all his fleet to the Island of Paxus, about foure leagues from Corcyra Eastward, braving the Christians as if he would haue fought with them, if they durst come out. Whereat Gonzaga the Viceroy fretting, went to euery one of the three great commanders, requesting them for the honor of the Christians, to represse that proud Turkes insolencie. At last the matter was brought to that passe, that the Venetians hauing taken in certain companies of Spaniards, the fleet should be diuided into foure squadrons, and so to giue battel. But this consultation was so long protracted, that Barbarussa fearing the tempestuous Autumne weather, hoised saile, and about the seuenth of October returned again into the bay of Ambracia. After the departing of Barbarussa, the Generals of the Christian fleet directed their course into the Bay called Sinus Rizonicus, to besiege Castronovum, or New-castle, a strong town of the Turks standing in that bay, and bordering vpon the Venetian Senators. The Inhabitants were part Dalmatians, part Epirots, which had renounced the Christian religion, and some Turkes, liuing most part by merchandise. Vnto this towne the Christians laid siege, and in short time woon it, where they had a great prey, and a wonderfull number of captiues of all sorts. Three dayes after the taking of the towne, the castle was also yeelded by the Turkes garrison; couenanting in vain to depart with life and libertie.

Barbarussa braueth the Christians.

Castronovum taken by the Christians.

This towne taken by common force, ought of right by the couenants of the league to haue bin deliuered to the Venetians; yet was it for all that by Auria and Gonzaga reserued for the Emperor, and Franciscus Sarmentus with foure thousand Spaniards all old soldiers, left therein garrison: Capellius the Venetian Admirall vrging in vaine the right of the Venetians. Which thing so much grieued the Senat, (who euer had the ambitious Spaniard in suspect, and now assured of him as an euill neighbour to their towne of Catarum) that repenting themselues of the league with the Emperour, they decreed to sue to Solyman for peace: which they afterwards easily obtained, for a short space, by Laurentius Gritti their dukes son, and by the helpe of Antonius Rincus the French kings Embassador; who then lying at Constantinople, in good time told the great Bassa's, that the league the Venetians had made with the Emperour, was made without the consent of the greatest part of the Senat, and that war taken in hand against most of their wils.

Whilst these things were in doing, Barbarussa put to sea againe to haue relieued Castronovum: but being at sea, many of his gallies were by the violence of a sudden tempest driuen vpon the Acroceraunian rocks, and there cast away. It is reported that he lost there 20000 men, which with the broken pieces of his gallies were found almost all alongst the coast of Dalmatia. This shipwrack being certainly knowne, Capellius would haue perswaded Auria to haue presently pursued Barbarussa so distressed: which motion Gonzaga wel liked, as a man desirous by some notable exploit to recompence the disgrace before receiued at Leucade. But Auria for diuers causes not liking of the matter, was so set down vpon his return to Italie, that he presently hoised saile, leauing the Venetian Admirall in such a rage, that he detested himselfe, for submitting himselfe to another mans power; and wished the captaines there present, neuer to subiect themselues to the command of a stranger, forasmuch as that Genoway, either vpon cowardise or malicious mind, as an old enemie to the Venetian State, would not prosecute so manifest a victorie, but put vp so shamefull a disgrace as he had before receiued. But of all this Auria made small reckoning, referring all that he both said and did, so far vnto the Emperours commodity, that Valerius Vrsinus a noble gentleman then seruing in the Venetian pay, merrily said, That Auria had done nothing but wisely & politickly, in setting the Venetians together by the ears with the Turks, & opening a gate for a long war, whether the Venetians would or not: so as the emperor himself could not haue better wished, and that without the losse of one gallie. For it was thought by many, that the long wars betwixt the Turkes and the Venetians, would fort to the great good of the Emperor; when as the Venetians worne out and spent with those long and chargeable wars against so mightie an enemy, should be stripped of their lands and territories either by force, or some hard composition wrung from them by necessitie.

Auria neglecting to pursue Barbarussa, returneth into Italie to the griefe of the Venetian Admirall.

Castronovum thus taken, and Sarmentus with a garrison of foure thousand Spaniards there placed, as is aforesaid, and the Christian fleet dissolued, Solyman tooke the matter so grieuously, that hee determined to besiege it againe both by sea and land: and in his furie, caused Naupli-

A Nauplium and Epidaurus, two of the Venetian cities in the country of Peloponesus, to bee straitly besieged. Yet tooke he singular pleasure, that Barbarussa his Admirall, in all respects worse furnished, had driuen out of the sea the great fleet of the Christians, which hee before that time had made too great account of. Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring, which was in the yeare 1539, Barbarussa by his commandement repaired againe his fleet, & notably furnished it with all maner of warlike prouision, manning his gallies for the most part with Ianizaries and other such select soldiers. With this fleet Barbarussa (Sommer now wel come on) departed out of the Helespontus, and came to the bay Risonicus; at which time also Vlames the Persian then Gouernor of Bosna, shewed himselfe with his forces vpon the mountains, as he had in charge from Solyman. Barbarussa before he entred the straits of the bay, sent before him Dragut and Corsetus, two notable pirats, with thirty galliots, who landing their men neere vnto Castronovum (as they were commanded) were valiantly encountered by Sarmentus with his Spaniards, and forced againe to their galliots, many of the Turks being slaine and taken prisoners. After that came Barbarussa with 90 gallies, and 3 tal ships which carried the artillerie for batterie and other necessarie prouision for the campe; where he spent three daies landing his great ordnance & casting vp trenches, which could not be done but by night by reason of the continuall shot out of the towne: wherewith the Spaniards had in that three days space slaine aboue 1000 Turks: amongst whom was Agis Hariadenus, who had made himselfe as it were a king at Taiorea, a citie neere Tripolis in Africa, whose death much grieued Barbarussa, as one of his most antient and best friends. At length Barbarussa hauing cast vp his trenches, landed foure and fiftie great pieces of artillerie for batterie; whereof he gaue a fourth part to Vlames to batter the towne on the North side, whilest he in the meane time, in three diuers places battered the East side, and Salec from sea with ten gallies, did morning and euening batter another part of the wall. Whilest Sarmentus was thus in so many places assailed, and did what was possible to haue repaired the breaches; the Turks by force tooke one of the towers, where after they had displaied their ensignes, they from thence with their shot sore troubled the Spaniards. At the same time also, Vlames had made a breach, and was ready on the other side of the citie to enter. In which extremities, Sarmentus seeing no means longer to defend the city, commanded the hurt soldiers to get them into the castle below, & the rest with him to take the market place, there to die together like men: where the Turkes straight way breaking in on euery side vpon them, made a most cruell and bloudie fight, wherein the Spaniards ouerwhelmed with shot, and the mukitude of their enemies, were slaine almost euerie man. Sarmentus wounded in the face with three arrowes, and wearied with long fight, seeing Sancius Fria a captain ready to flie, sharply reproued him, and catching him by the hand, made him there to tarrie by it, vntill they were both together slaine. Many valiant captaines were there lost, whose names for breuitie I omit. Aloysius Arius, and certaine other captaines who together with the wounded souldiers were got into the castle, seeing no means to defend the place, yeelded themselues: whom Barbarussa according to his promise, tooke to mercie in sparing their liues, yet carried them away into captiuitie to Constantinople. The dead bodie of Sarmentus could not be knowne amongst so many heaps of the dead, although Barbarussa had caused most diligent search to be made for it, and offered great sums of money and libertie also, to whosoeuer could recouer it; being desirous to haue sent his head for a Present to Solyman. Barbarussa proud of this victorie, began forthwith to gape after Cattarus a citie of the Venetians in the bottome of the same bay: and thereupon writ threatning letters to Bembus one of the Venetian Senatours then Gouernour of the citie, presently to surrender the citie; which he would (as he said) otherwise assault by force. Whereunto Bembus answered again by letters, that in so doing he should violate the league lately made with Turkie, and that he should find him readie by force to repell his forces. Wherewith Barbarussa sent certaine gallies into the bottome of the bay; who discharging certaine pieces of the citie, made shew as if they had come to besiege it. At whom Bembus as it were in derision caused as many mo like pieces to be discharged, and shewed his men ready to the same thing Barbarussa perceiuing staid his course, and calling backe his gallies from Castronovum, from whence (better appeased with Presents afterwards sent) he departed out of that bay.

Barbarussa sent by Solyman to besiege Castronouum.

The long wars betwixt Charles the Emperour and Francis the pacified, and such friendship (at leastwise in shew) now growne betwixt these two great princes, that most men thought that all other quarrels laid aside, they would now at length with vnited forces goe against the great and dangerous enemie of Christendome: which opinion not altogether of the wiser sort beleeued, was yet at this time wonderfully confirmed by many extraordinarie and rare courtesies then passing betwixt them, which concerne not this historie; as also, in that two of their most famous captains, Alphonsus Vastius, and Hanebald, were as it were with one consent by them both sent embassadors to Venice: to haue drawn the Venetians into the confederation of that warre against the Turke. Which two renowned captains comming to Venice, most gallantly accompanied, were by Landus the duke, and the whole State, with great magnificence receiued, the people after their wonted manner flocking together in euery place to behold them so noble captains sent from such mightie princes; but especially Vastius, whose fame hauing many times before filled their eares, made them now the more desirous to satisfie their eies also with the beholding of his tall and comely person. Which two famous captaines admitted into the Senate, for that purpose fully assembled, audience giuen: Vastius arising from the dukes side, in these or like words deliuered their embassage.

Alphonsus Vastius and Hanebaldus sent embassadours from the Emperor & the French king to the State of Venice.

Vastius his Oration to the Venetian Senat.

It is come to passe (as I suppose) by the great prouidence of Almightie God, and of all the Diuine powers (most noble Duke and honourable Senatours) that two of the most mightie Kings of Europe, who of late had of long time made mortall warres one vpon another, touched with the Zeale of religion, are become great friends: vndoubtedly to that purpose onely; that hauing made a firme peace, they may bring such a generall quietnesse to the long troubled and afflicted state of Christendome, as best beseemeth their greatnesse; and taking in hand a sacred war, to reuenge so many calamities receiued from the Infidel. That this might be made knowne vnto you (most noble Venetians) these mightie Monarchs haue sent vs hither in good time to kindle in you the like Zeale, wherewith it is well knowne you haue alwaies for the honour of your State bin inflamed: for you of all others, which are of such power and valour at sea, they wish for, as their fellows and confederats in this sacred war and hoped victorie, and thinke you worthie, which should enioy the especiall fruit of all that labour. Forasmuch as the Christian forces once renewed, and so great and strong a fleet one assembled, euery man seeth that the Turks must needs be too weake: although they brag, that they carried away the victorie of late at Actium, when as they then escaped the victorious hands of our men, not by their owne valour, but by the vnexpected hap of a sudden storm. For all the powers of heauen and earth, and of the sea also, will be propitious vnto vs, vniting so great forces, in regard of our sacred religion; and will so take away the hearts of the Infidels, that they shall learne to be ouercome. As for our land forces, wee are to hope nothing but well, forasmuch as vnto those which the Emperour of late brought into the field at Vienna, and caused the Turkish Emperour to flie, shall be ioyned not onely all the horsemen and infanterie of Fraunce (a wonderfull strength) but Sigismund also King of Polonia will without delay bring foorth his armies, wherewith he hath beene vsed in the quarrell of the Christian Religion happily to fight against the Infidels: so that it is not to be doubted of a most certaine and assured victorie. Wherefore the victorious Emperor and most Christian king Francis most instantly request you to enter into the like godly cogitations, conceiued for the general good of the Christian name, and religiously to embrace the hope of a most true and glorious victorie: and further exhort you, by a wholsome decree to auert your religious and courageous hearts from the friendship of the Infidels: for it may worthily seeme vnto your most honourable minds, a most foule and shamefull thing, to haue renewed your league, and to haue preferred an infamous and vncertaine peace, before a most religious and iust warre. Neither doth it beseeme this most wealthie State to be terrified from that which is good and right, with any charges of warre, be they neuer so great: for if wee shall once ouercome, which is incident to this present and long wished occasion, wee shall by the profit of one victorie, either by sea or land, to your incomparable praise recompence all the losses by vs in former times receiued.

The answere of the duke to Vastius.

Whereunto the duke in the name of the whole State answered, That there neuer happened any thing at any time vnto the Venetian Senat more honorable, for the manner of the embassage, or for the publick security of their state, more to be desired than the hope of such a peace: after that two most mightie kings by two such famous captains their embassadors, did certifie them of their attonement & assured peace, most glorious to themselues, to their eternal praise, whole-wholesome also to the Venetian State, beset with so many dangers, and wonderfully to bee wished for of all the other princes of Christendome, if they would sincerely and religiously with their forces by common consent vnited, resolue vpon that sacred war: for then would not the Venetians bee wanting to themselues or the Christian common-weale, but end the league they had with the Turke, not with a dishonourable peace, but with armes and victory. Wherefore it was to be requested of Almightie God by prayer, That those puissant Kings would with religious & happie euent speedily & seriously fulfil all that hope of peace, which they had by their mutuall discourses and embracings in shew promised vnto the world.

In few daies after, certain of the select Senators sitting in counsell, after the manner of that State, called the embassadors vnto them, and asked them, Whether they knew any thing of the articles & capitulations wherein that league and confederation was to be concluded? and by the way, Whether they thought the Emperour in regard of that peace would giue vnto the French kings son the Dukedom of Millain, as was reported? Whereunto Hanebald the French embassador answering nothing, Vastius said, that he knew nothing more, but that the two great princes had agreed of betwixt themselues, and that the Emperour had desired the peace, as one willing to help the afflicted & declining state of the Christian common-weale: which thing any man might see could not be effected or brought to passe, but that the Emperor must in many things yeeld to the requests of the French king, and redeeme his good will: for the noble mind (said he) worthie Senators, can easily make light of the greatest losse of his owne things, when it foreseeth a large way opened therby to eternall fame and glory. These words were very glorious & gracious to the hearers: but they, as men of great experience, could not let it sinke in their minds, that the Emperour whom they had often deeply sounded, would euer part with the Dukedome of Millan, which onely thing the French king required, and had for the recouering therof vnfortunatly striuen almost 20 years, to the trouble & disquiet of a great part of the world. The nobilitie and authoritie of this embassage more moued the Senat than did the other former embassadors, Didaco Mendoza, a Spaniard, and Gulielmus Pellicerius, a Frenchman, then both present: yet was it much suspected by the Venetians, because it contained no certaine resolution, but only the bare hope of a future peace; so that it was by many men supposed to be but a matter deuised to deceiue others, and to serue the Emperors turne to his great profit. Yet all the cunning seemed to rest in this point, That the Venetians led on with the hope of this league, should neglect the renewing of the league they had the yeare before taken with Solyman, which was now almost expired. Vpon which vncertainty of other mens resolutions, the graue Senators thought too dangerous a matter to depend.

Vastius his answer to the demand of the Venetian Senatours.

Vpon this question of this new league and confederation to be made with these Christian princes against the Turke, the Senat was wonderfully diuided: some fauoring the Emperours request, inueighed against the renewing of that shameful league with the Infidels, which they said was nothing els, but as much as in them lay to betray vnto them the other parts of Christendom, & especially Italie, destitute of their help, and yet not to be obtained without great charge; & with many reasons vrged the honourable confederation with these Christian princes: others of a deeper reach, considering what infinit harmes they had from time to time receiued by falling out with the Turks, & suspecting also the Emperors drift; and ioining thereunto the consideration of the great dearth then raigning in the citie, which was not to be relieued but out of Macedonia & Grecia, the Turks countries; the emperor hauing at that time as it were of purpose imposed so great a custome vpon all corne to be transported out of Sicilie, that the very custome came to as much as both the price of the corne & the fraight together: al which mischiefs they said were to be preuented by renuing the league with Solyman. This matter was with great heat debated in the Senat too & fro, either part hauing great faultours: so that the Senatours spent almost whole Winter nights in the court in discoursing and consulting what were best to be don: but whatsoeuer was there said or decreed, was forthwith by one of the factions or other made known, not only to the embassadors present in the city, but by letters also discouered into prouinces far off: a thing neuer before in that state known, which had euer vsed as it were with a religious silence to keepe secret whatsoeuer was there decreed. Which thing Marcus Foscarus, an old Senator & a man of great wisedom, perceiuing, said openly, That the state was betraied by the multitude and corruption of voices, and must needs shortly perish, if it were not speedily committed to the graue & faithfull iudgement of some some few: for there was almost two hundred of them which gaue voices, reducing the multitude to the number of fiftie, who for their experience and loue toward their countrey, were holden for men of greatest grauitie and secrecie: so was the madnesse of many staied by the discretion of a few. But Foscarus shortly after fell into such hatred of the multitude, grieuing to be as light headed men without discretion, so excluded out of the counsell; that he was by the voices of the multitude first thrust out of the counsell himselfe, and by them kept a great while after from all the preferments and honours of the citie: being indeed one of the grauest Senatours, and a man of deepest iudgement. Which disgrace turned afterward to his great honour and credit, as one that had foreseene much, after they were once found out and condemned which had traiterously reuealed the secrets of the State.

Foscarus disgraced by the multitude.

The Venetians sent Aloysius Badoerius their Embassadour to Solyman, to conclude a peace.

But this long consultati[on] concerning the confederation, came to this end, That the Senators doubting the vnion of [two] great princes, and yet willing to expect the euent, decreed forthwith to send three [Em]bassadours; whereof two should be sent to the Emperour and the French king to discouer their designes; and the third, which was Aloysius Badoerius, a wi[se] well spoken man, was with all speed dispatched away to Solyman, to preuent the fame [of] distrust to be conceiued of the agreement of these great Christian princes, and if he could by any meanes, to spare for no cost, to saue vnto the Venetians their cities of Nauplium and Epidaurus, which Solyman required of them before hee would graunt them peace. Which if it could not be obtained of the proud and craftie tyrant, then to yeeld vnto necessitie, and to conclude a peace with him vpon any conditions: which course the Decem-viri thought to be most expedient for the State: yet concerning the yeelding vp of the cities, they gaue him secret instructions and warrant, fearing forsooth the force and tumult of the headstrong multitude, who if they had knowne any such thing, would vndoubtedly thereupon haue taken occasion to haue crossed and ouerthrown that most wholesome decree: for there was no doubt, that if they had delaied the matter, and sought for peace too late, but that Solyman would vpon another mans weaknesse and necessitie haue increased his insatiable desire, and not granted them peace, being brought low and forsaken, except they would deliuer vnto him the Islands of Cephalenia, Zacinthus, & Corcyra, a matter no lesse grieuous than the destruction of the very city of Venice it selfe. So that the great embassadors Vastius and Hanebald, who came of purpose to haue hindred the league with the Turk, by their great diligence wrought nothing more effectually, than that the Venetians the better foreseeing the danger of their state, should as they did, make hast to conclude the same: for it falleth out in mens purposes & actions, That a good and happie successe otherwise well hoped for, is oftentimes marred with too much diligence and care. Neither was it any doubt, but that Hanebald was sent by the French King but for fashion sake, and secretly vnderhand by Pellicerius the old embassadour, perswaded the Venetians to hasten the conclusion of peace with Solyman. Which as Badoerius their embassador was carefully soliciting the matter at Constantinople, & being loth to yeeld the strong cities which Solyman required, offering vnto him in stead of them a great sum of mony: Solyman took him vp with threatning words as a shamelesse dissembler, earnestly protesting, That he would neuer grant him peace, without the yeelding of those cities, rehearsing vnto him the most secretest points of his embassage, and how that he was authorised from the Decem-viri to yeeld them vnto him: which thing the embassadour little thought Solyman had knowne. Wherefore Badoerius so shamefully reproued, & standing in doubt of his life, seeing the greatest secrets of his embassage reuealed to Solyman and his Bassaes, was glad to accept of peace, by yeelding vnto him Nauplium and Epidaurus, two cities in Peloponesus, and with them Nadinum and Labrania, two castles of Dalmatia, to the great griefe of the whole Senate: for granting whereof the common people ignorant of the secret decree of the Decem-viri, and supposing that Badoerius had giuen away that which he had no authoritie to giue, were so inraged against him at his returne, that there was much adoe to saue the guiltlesse man from exile, and his goods from confiscation, although the traitors were then knowne which had discouered the secrets of the state vnto the Turkes. These were Mapheus Leonius a Senatour, and Constantinus Cobatius, Secretarie to the colledge of the Decem-viri, and Franciscus Valerius, one of the Senatours base sonnes, the traiterous dispersers of the Turks money for the corruption of others: who with other his complices were for the same fact hanged in the market place; when as Leonius and Cobatius were a little before fled into France.

The most secret decree of the Venetian Senat made knowne to Solyman.

1540 A peace concluded betwixt the Venetians and Solyman.

The traitours which reuealed the secrets of the Venetian state to Solyman executed.

About

About the same time, which was in the yeare of our Lord 1540, died Ioannes Sepusius king of Hungarie, Solymans tributarie; after whose death ensued great wars in Hungarie, and the lamentable subuersion of that flourishing kingdome: for the better conceiuing whereof, it shal not be amisse with as much breuitie as the plainnesse of the historie will permit, to open the causes and grounds of the endlesse calamities which afterwards ensued, and neuer tooke end, vntill that warlike kingdome was to the great weakning of Christendome vtterly subuerted.

King Ferdinand and this tributarie king Iohn, had with like desire of peace and quietnesse, made betweene them a league; profitable to them both as their estates then stood, rather than honorable: yet most welcome to the Hungarians, who diuided into factions, and hauing followed some the one king and some the other, enioyed neuertheless their lands and goods by the benefit of this peace; the townes and castles being still kept by them in whose possession they then were at the making of the peace. In the capitulations of which peace, it was comprised, That Ferdinand should from thence forth call Iohn by the name of a king; whereas before he had both in his common talke and letters called him by the name of the Vayuod only: It was also expresly set downe in the same articles of peace, and subscribed by the hands of diuers of the nobility of Hungary, That if king Iohn should die, king Ferdinand should succeed him in the whole kingdome of Hungarie: Which condition was suppressed and kept very secret for feare of Solyman, who accounted of that kingdom as of his owne, gotten by law of armes, and bestowed vpon king Iohn as vpón his vassaile: neither was it to haue bin thought, that if he should haue knowne thereof (being of a hauty mind by nature, and not able to indure any iniurie) he would haue suffered that kingdome, got and defended with so great danger and cost, to be by the Will of an vnthankfull man, transferred vnto his enemie.

This matter of so great importance, was (as it is reported) by Hieronimus Lascus embassador for king Ferdinand to Constantinople, reuealed vnto Solyman and the Bassaes, to bring King Iohn into hatred. So much did this noble gentleman, for his rare vertues otherwise greatly to haue bin commended, yeeld vnto his griefe, and desire of reuenge: when after the death of Aloysius Gritti, he fell from the friendship of king Iohn, being (as is before declared) by him committed to prison, and hardly afterwards inlarged, at the request of king Sigismund. Whereupon Solyman being exceedingly angry with king Iohn, called him vnthankfull churle, and turning himselfe about to Lutzis Bassa his brother in law, said, How vnworthily doe these two Christian kings weare their crownes vpon their faithlesse heads; who as shamefull deceiuers are not afraid, either for worldy shame or feare of God, for their profit to falsifie their faith? But king Iohn vnderstanding therof, & wonderfully fearing his own estate, did by good friends and rich Presents, pacifie Solyman againe, laying all the blame vpon king Ferdinand, as better able to beare it. Not long after, king Iohn hauing set his kingdome in good order, and strongly fortified the citie of Buda; being now far stricken in yeares, at the earnest request of most of the nobilitie of Hungarie, & other his best friends, married Isabella the daughter of Sigismund king of Polonia, a gracious ladie and of great spirit: which king Sigismund, had long before married Barbara king Iohns sister, after whose death he maried the lady Bona Sforcia, the daughter of Ioannes Galeacius duke of Millain, by whom he had this ladie Isabella whom king Iohn now married. Which marriage Solyman liked well of, hauing many times by way of talke before condemned the single life of the king: but king Ferdinand liked thereof nothing at all, plainly foreseeing, that the Hungarians (if the king should chance to haue a son) would forthwith looke vpon him as their naturall king, and reiect himselfe as but a stranger.

King Iohn in his old yeares marrieth Isabel la king Sigismunds daughter.

The Queene with child.

This yong queene in short time (as he had feared) conceiued with child, and was now very big: when king Iohn was inforced to make an expedition in person himselfe against Maylat (famous for the death of Aloysius Grittus) and Balas both Gouernors of Transyluania: whereof Maylat not contented with the name of Vayuod or Gouernor, sought to make himselfe king. But Solyman detesting the impudent arrogancie of the faithlesse man, and hating him for the death of Grittus, and the Turks slaine with him, aduertised king Iohn of all the matter, wishing him to be more circumspect, whom hee trusted with the gouernment of so great and rich a countrey. So Maylat shamefully reiected of Solyman, and out of hope of a kingdome, fearing also to be thrust quite out of his gouernment by king Iohn, thought it best for his owne safety to raise vp all the prouince into rebellion, and to take part with king Ferdinand: which thing Ferdinand by his diuers agents secretly furthered to the vttermost. For these two Kings, although though they were at peace the one with the other, and in words and shew made semblance of friendship, yet in heart they enuied and hated each other, as if they should presently haue waged war. At that same time king Iohn exacted of his subiects, and especially of them of Transiluania, a great sum of money, to pay the Turks his tribute, then two yeares behind: Which thing serued Maylat and his complices, as a fit occasion to raise the people into rebellion, persuading them, that there was no reason to pay vnto the Turke such a tribute, as would serue wel to wage ten years honorable war against him: so that by that, and such like persuasion, all the prouince was in an vprore, little differing from manifest rebellion. To appease these dangerous troubles thus arising, king Iohn sent certaine of his chiefe nobilitie and best captaines with a great power into Transyluania, following after himselfe in his chariot, not yet well recouered of his late sickn[illegible]. These noblemen entering in two places into Transyluania, and scouting vp and down the countrey, had in short time so vsed the matter, that what by force, what by policie, the tumult was well pacified, and diuers of the chiefe offenders wor[illegible] executed. Maylat the ambitious author of this sedition, not able to hold the field against t[illegible], and seeing himselfe beset on euery side with his enemies, retired himselfe with all his [illegible] into a towne called Fogaras, a place of great strength, which the kiugs power shortly after hardly besieged: the king himselfe then lying at Sibynium, the chiefe citie of Transyluania, about a mile distant from Fogaras, sicke of anague, wherinto he was ag[illegible] fallen through too much care and paines taken in trauelling in that hoat time of the yeare, the daies being then at the longest. Whilest he thus lay sicke at Sibynium, and his army fast by at the siege of Fogaras, newes was brought vnto him from the court, That the Queene his wife was deliuered of a faire yong son: which was no sooner bruted abroad, but the Hungarians as men ouerioyed, came flocking to the court where the king lay, discharging their pieces in triumph, with all other signes of ioy and mirth they could possibly deuise: the noble men came from the camp to reioice with the king, and all the armie was filled with gladnesse. And for the greater solemnitie of this so common a ioy, a royall feast was prepared, which the noble men would needs haue the king to honour with his presence, though he were thereto vnwilling, being as yet but a little recouered: howbeit yeelding to their importunitie, he suffered himselfe to be ouerruled and brought to the feast by them, which was vnto him the merriest and the last that euer he made: for willing to shew his inward ioy, and to content his nobilitie there present, he forgot himselfe, and eat and dranke more liberally than was for the health of his weak bodie: whereby the feauer which had but a little before left him, was againe renewed, in such sort, as that he well perceiued he could not long endure. Wherefore feeling his end to draw fast on, he made his Will, appointing his yong son to be his heire, whom he committed to the tuition of George, Bishop of Veradium, and Peter Vicche a noble gentleman and his neere kinsman, vntill he came to age: requesting the rest of the noblemen to prefer his son in the succession of the kingdom, before a stranger; telling them, That Solyman would vndoubtedly take vpon him the protection both of the kingdome and of his sonne, if they would in time send embassadors vnto him with presents, and promise for his sonne, that he should raigne as his tributarie as he had done before: and so presently after died.

Queene Isabella deliuered of a sonne.

The death of king Iohn.

This king was of a courteous and gentle nature, bountifull, and in all his doings iust, of no fierce and rough disposition, as the Hungarians commonly are, but of a most ciuill behauiour, garnished with good letters, and thorowly schooled in the diuers chances of both fortunes, not measuring his actions by the strength of his power, but by the exact rule of descretion; for in time of businesse no man was more circumspect or vigilant than he, nor in time of recreation any man more courteous or pleasant. He vsed oftentimes to say, That the fauor and loue of valiant men gotten by bountie and courtesie, was the best treasures of a prince; for that courteous and thankfull men, did oftentimes in some one worthie piece of seruice, plentifully repay whatsoeuer had been bestowed vpon them: as for such as were vnthankfull, they did to their shame beare the testimonie of another mans vertue.

The honourable saying of king Iohn.

The kings death was kept secret vntill such time as the noble men had agreed with Maylat that he should take an oath of his faithfull allegeance to the king, and his son his lawful heire, and so still to inioy his former place & gouernment: which offer Maylat gladly accepted. Then calling together the counsel, it was decreed to send the same embassage to Solyman, which was appointed the old king yet liuing. So were presently dispatched away two most honourable Embassadours, Ioannes Exechius Bishop of Quinque Ecclesiæ, and Stephanus Verbetius the Chancellor, a man of great yeres; carrying with them ten boles of pure gold curiously wrote, 600 of siluer, gilt and ingrauen; fortie pieces of purple silke and cloath of gold for Turkes gownes, and 50 li. of coyned gold to be paid in the name of two yeres tribute. Which Embassadors passing directly from Sybinium ouer Danubius into Seruia, and so trauelling thorow Thracia, came to Constantinople. In the meantime, the dead body of the king was with much heauinesse carried from Sybinium to Alba Regalis, most part of the armie following it, and there with great solemnitie buried. After this, the young child was christened and called Stephen, and there presently crowned with the antient Crowne of King Stephen, who first erected that kingdome, & without which the Hungarians neuer accounted their kings lawfully crowned. Yet the royal dignitie was by the common consent of the nobilitie giuen vnto the queen, with condition, that in all publique writings, the names of the sonne and of the mother should be ioyned, and the kings mony coyned with the same inscription: but the chiefest authoritie rested in George the Bishop, for he was Treasurer, and had at his command the castles & strong Holds: yet were the soldiers with their ensignes and furniture, at the deuotion of Valentinus Thuracus: In the middle betweene these two was placed Peter Vicche the kings kinseman, and by the old king appointed for one of the Tutors of his young sonne, suspected of neither part, honoured with the name of high Constable. But because the name of this George the Bishop was most famous in this wofull war which we are about to write, I thought it worth the labor to speake something of his nature and disposition, that it may be knowne to all posteritie, by what policie this war was managed, and how this flourishing kingdome by the madnes of the Hungarians came into the hands of the Turks.

Embassadours sent out of Hungarie to Solyman.

A young childe crowned king of Hungarie.

This George was born in Croatia, and brought vp from his youth in the house of king Iohn, where vertue and industrie neuer wanted relefe; when as hee vnaduisedly before had entred into the orders of a monasticall life, and wearie too late of the straitnesse thereof, had forsaken his profession. Wherfore being of a very pleasing nature, and stil following K. Iohn driuen out of his kingdome, and long liuing in exile, he woon such credit and commendation for his fidelitie, integritie, and readie counsel in the kings most doubtfull and dangerous affairs, that after Sibacchus that worthie Bishop was by the treacherie of Aloysius Gritti slain at Baxouia, he obtained the great Bishopricke of Veradium. After that, when he had strengthned his credit with great wealth, he always as a faithfull counsellor swayd and happily ruled both the court and kingdome, to the profit of the king. But he was of such a diuers and pliant nature, that performing in all actions all the parts of a most readie and excellent man, he seemed to be made of contrarie qualities, and borne to do any thing: for in saying of his priestly seruice, and performing the other ceremonies of the Christian religion, he shewed, or at least wise counterfeited such a contrition in his deuout countenance & speech, that a man would not haue thought it could possibly be the same man, who in the most weightie affairs both of war and peace, did most stourly shew the wonderfull force of a most pregnant and couragious wit: for he vsed to keepe whole companies of most excellent and readie horsmen, & would oftimes come forth into the battel armed: he would with often banquets & rewards win the hearts of the soldiers, and after the manner of great chieftains, maintain the honor and credit of his name, both with punishment and reward, as occasion required. Besides that, no man looked into the wealth of the kingdome more diligently than he, no man did to more profit let to farme the customes, old mines, feedings, and salt pits; no man could deuise finer means to raise mony, of all others the readiest way to credit: insomuch that K. Iohn would confesse himselfe to rain by the speciall industrie of that one man: And K. Ferdinand would many times say, That he enuied at K. Iohn for nothing he had, but for one hooded fellow, which was better for the defence of a kingdome than 1000 with helmets on their heads. Wherefore this Bishop hauing taken vpon him the tuition of the yong king, was still busied in all the weightie causes of the kingdome, both ciuil and martiall: he labored with great care, that the Hungarians should agree together in loue and vnity; and did what he might, prouidently to foresee, that no tumult or rebellion should any where arise, wherby the beginning of the kingdom, yet but weake, might any way be troubled. But king Ferdinand hearing of the death of king Iohn, thought it now a fit time for him to recouer again the kingdome of Hungarie, which he had so long desired. Whereunto he was also the more prickt forward by the persuasion of Alexius Torso, Ferentius Gnarus, Petrus

George bishop of Veradium, one of the kings tutors, a notable man.

The fugitive Hungarians perswade king Ferdinand to inuade Hungarie.

Bachio, Balthazar Pamphilus, Francus Capolnates, Ianus Castellamphus, and Casparus Seredus, all noblemen or gentlemen of great account in Hungarie, who in the former troubles followed the part of King Ferdinand against King Iohn, liued now in exile; these all with one consent told King Ferdinand, That now or neuer was the time when they might be againe restored vnto their countrey with honour, and that the war might that Autumne be dispatched, if he would make haſt, for as much as Winter comming fast on, would stay the comming of the Turkes, and such noblemen of Hungarie as tooke part with the Queene, did not verie well agree together, being vnwilling to be commanded by George the Apostata Monke, who (as they sayd) with great cunning and dissimulation seducing the Queene, and possessing the Treasure, enioyed all alone the power of a king: and that they, which for taking part with the right, had long liued as banished men, might now safely returne into their countrey, and be honourably preferred by the Queene; the Bishop (which all commanded) assuring them thereof, if they would returne vnto the young Kings Court, vnto their friends and antient Houses. [illegible] had (as they said) before giuen their faith vnto him, as to a vertuous & faithfull Prince, [illegible] they had preferred before one that was an Hungarian borne: wherefore he should doe both vnaduisedly and vnkindely, if letting slip the occasion presented, he should deferre to make warre. For, what could be more dishonorable to him so great a King, and also Emperor elect, than by shamefull delay to forsake them, being noble and valiant gentlemen, which had followed his part, and were then readie with strong troups of horsmen to do him the best seruice they could.

The German captaines in like manner perswaded him to take the matter in hand: who martiall men, expecting some one preferment, some another, in the armie, were desirous of honour, pay, and prey, the chiefe comforts of their trauell and perill.

Laschus disswadeth K. Ferdinand from setking for the Kingdome of Hungarie by force, perswading him rather to request it of curtesie, of Solyman.

But Laschus the Polonian (who in matters concerning peace and warre saw more than all they; as he that knew the dispositions of many Princes, and had seene the manners and fashions of diuers Nations, hauing trauelled thorow a great part of the world, and oftentimes beene Embassadour in the Courts of the greatest Princes) was of a contrarie opinion, and told King Ferdinand plainley, That the Kingdome of Hungarie was to be obtained rather by policie than by force, by craning it at Solymans hand, to hold it of him by tribute, as king Iohn had done.

For (said he) that may by petition and faire entreatance be easily obtained of that heroicall Prince (who in his vaine humor oftentimes fondly seeketh after honour) which will neuer be got from him by force of armes. I thorowly know (said he) Solymans haughtie minde, and the proud disposition of his Bassa's: he contemneth wealth, and is cloyed with so many kingdomes: but they, vpon their insatiable couetousnesse and exceeding pride, desire nothing, nor persuade him to nothing more than war. Wherefore it is good to beware, that with the noyse of this sudden war you stir not vp the Turkes, which lie readie as it were expecting such an occasion, which cannot be withstood but by the united forces of the Christian Princes; which might by their generall consent be done, but that their eyes blinded with fatall darknesse cannot see it, and the vnity of the Christians now desperat, seemeth by God reserued to some better time: seeing that of late the Christian Kings are fallen off, and cannot agree vpon the long expected peace. Is not (said he) the French King deceiued of his hope; and as he would haue it thought, greatly dishonored with this late vnkindenesse? which renewing his old wound will reuiue in him an endlesse hatred. Away with all dissimulations, enemie to graue counsels, and let plaine truth, although vnpleasant vnto Princes eares, preuent flatterie. Vndoubtedly he being a Prince of no base courage (as it oftentimes falleth out with men thorowly grieued) will in his anger, as an enemie poure forth his gold, whereof he hath great store, to crosse the Emperours designes, to trouble the assemblies of the States of Germanie, to withdraw the mindes of the Princes, and with bountie to gaine them to himselfe: who enuying mightily at the Imperiall dignitie, woont to be indifferently giuen to them that best deserued the same, to be as it were inuested in the House of Austria, which in this perpetuall succession of so many Emperours, hath as it were got aright by long custome. Wherefore they will secretly conspire together, and as notable lingerers by nature, will either giue no helpe at all, or else too late; at such time as the Turks garrisons shall come flying to the succor of the yong king. Neither is there any cause why any man should thinke that the gouernors of the Turks countries neere at hand, will for the approch of Winter be slacke in this cause: for they vndoubtedly, making an honest & honorable shew, wil take vpon them to defend the fatherlesse child and widow;

widow; of purpose to make an entrance to the secret desire they haue to gaine the kingdom to themselues: for if you shall once ioyne with them in battell, if the best happen, and fortune fauour our first attempts, yet you shall haue war without end, with such an enemie, which will bring with him wealth that will neuer be spent, power not to be ouercome, and courageous soldiers sworne to our destruction: So wil it come to passe, and I pray God I be a false Prophet, that in seeking for the kingdome of Hungarie by warre, you shall at length be glad to fight for Austria it selfe, and your owne kingdome also.

Laschus sent embassador frō K. Ferdinand to Solyman.

This speech so moued king Ferdinand, that although he purposed to go on with the warre, yet he thought it good by an honorable embassage to proue Solymans mind and purpose also: which to do, no man was thought fitter than Laschus himselfe, authour of that counsell, being vnto him verie well knowne, and familiarly acquainted with all the great Bassa's of the court. Which seruice Laschus refused not, but being furnished with all things needfull for such an embassage, departed from Vienna towards Constantinople.

K. Ferdinand sendeth an Embassador to the Queene, to demand of her the Kingdome of Hungarie.

Yet for all that, King Ferdinand persisting in his former purpose, made withall preparation for wars, trusting vpon the aid of the Emperor his brother, and the comming ouer of the Hungarians, who euer thought it cause honest enough for them to reuolt, if it so stood with their present profit. But before he would enter into open wars, he sent Nicholas Countie of Salma to the queen, to shew her the instruments of the last league betwixt the king her late husband and him, & to exhort her to yeeld vp the kingdom, which by the late league was another mans right; and not by delaying of the matter, to hurt both her selfe and her son: for K. Ferdinand offered to giue vnto the childe the prouince of Sepusia, as was before agreed betwixt the two kings expresly in the league; and to the queen a greater reuenue, and whatsoeuer else she had in dowrie. But if she would forget that lawfull league, he threatned, that neither the Emperor Charles his brother, nor he, wanted force wherewith to recouer by strong hand the kingdom, annexed to the house of Austria both by antient right & the new consent of most of the Hungarian nobilitie. The countie of Salma being receiued at Buda, hardly obtained to be admitted to the presence of the queen: for George the Bishop, and Vicche, mistrusting her womanlike courage, said, she was not to be spoken withall, by reason she was so full of heauinesse and sorrow: and that they were of authoritie, as the kings tutors, & readie to giue him both audience and answer. Which opinion of her weaknesse and want of iudgement, the queen, being a woman of an heroicall and royall spirit, tooke as tending so much to her disgrace, that she said she would kill her selfe, if the embassadors were not permitted to come into her chamber (which was a darke roome hanged with black, as the manner is:) and she sitting vpon a low pallet negligently attyred, as one that had no care of her selfe, wan and pale coloured, but as then shedding no teares, yet with voice and counteance so heauie, as might shew her teares to be rather dried vp with long mourning, than that her sorrow was any thing abated: for the desire of hearing rule had now so possessed her minde, that she contemned all the dangers of imminent war, and for defence of her soueraignetie resolued with her selfe to call in the Turks. After the countie admitted to her presence, had with due reuerence and great protestation deliuered his message, she demurely answered, That such was the fortune of her sex and yeares, that being bereft of the king her husband, and perplexed with the dayly griefs both of bodie and minde, she could neither take nor giue counsell, but purposed in so weightie a cause to vse the aduice of Sigismund her father, whose integritie and justice was such, as king Ferdinand need no other Iudge or arbitrator to end that controuersie: Wherefore she requested a conuenient time and space wherein shee might aske counsell of her father; to whose iust iudgement shee said shee would stand, as she thought the nobilitie of Hungarie would also. Which small time of delay if it should be denied, and that they would needs forthwith make war vpon her; she said, that the Emperor and king Ferdinand his brother should surely win no great honour, if they should come to oppugne her a widow consumed with teares, and a young child yet crying in his cradle. The Countie so sent away, when hee was returned to king Ferdinand, told him, That the queen was altogether in the power of the Bishop, and could neither say nor doe any thing, but what she had before receiued from him: for he onely (as he said) commanded all; as for the rest of the nobilitie, they shared amongst them the honors and preferments of the realme, and as men desirous of credit and gaine, had rather bee the gouernours of the young Prince, than the seruants and waiters of a great and mightie forreine king: all which, he said he had both heard and seen. Wherefore all the hope was in war, wherein such speed was to be vsed, as that the Queen with her sonne vnprouided, and expecting the euent of their embassage from Constantinople, might be driuen out of Buda before they could take vp arms, or well aduise themselues what to do: and that the Queene sought delay but to make her selfe the stronger, and in the meane time to call in the Turke, and so to make a more dangerous war. Wherefore if euer he purposed to raigne in Hungarie, he should forthwith cast off all other cogitations, and make readie his forces with all speed possible.

King Ferdinand inuadeth Hungarie.

Hereupon K. Ferdinand furnished with mony from Charles the Emperor, without delay raised a great armie, which he sent downe the riuer Danubius to Strigonium, which city had all the raign of king Iohn, continued faithfull to king Ferdinand. The Generall of his armie was Leonardus Velsius a nobleman of Rhetia: who for many causes, thought it expedient first [illegible] the way to Buda, for ai[illegible] the middle of the way stood Vicegrade, with a good[illegible] vpon the top of an hill by the riuer; which towne (but not the castle) Velsius after ni[illegible] siege tooke, with the losse of about 200 of his men, all the garrison souldiers therein b[illegible] ther slain or taken prisoners, with Valentinus Listeratus their captaine. From Vicegrade he passed ouer the riuer Danubius to Pesth, which he took, being forsaken of the enemie. Whith like successe he tooke the citie of Vacia without losse: and remouing thence, and crossing again the riuer with his fleet, came and incamped before Buda, so to terrifie the citizens, and to discouer as far as he could the purpose of the queen. Where Perenus, Stephanus Rascaius, and Franciscus Francopanes bishop of Agria, all men of great nobilitie amongst the Hungarians, reuolted from the queene to king Ferdinand: the Bishop was reputed for a man of great integritie, and vpon meere conscience to haue gon ouer to Ferdinand; yet was he by letters from George the kings tutor, challenged to haue reuolted, in hope by means of Charles the Emperor to be made a cardinall. Velsius lay with his armie at the hot baths, about a mile and a halfe from the citie, as if he would rather besiege it than assault it. The Germans lying there, did fetch in bootie round about the country; which was taken in euill part by the Hungarians on their side, who seeing their own cattell or their friends driuen away, the villages burnt, and the poore husbandmen bound & taken prisoners, fel together by the ears oftentimes with the Germans. On the other side they of Buda sending out their troups of horsmen, skirmisht with the Germans if they did but stir out of the campe, and well defended the villages from the iniurie of the enemie: for Valentinus Thurrascus Generall of the queens power, had taken into the citie a wonderful number of light horsemen. Whilest the armie lay thus incamped, it fortuned that Balthazar Pamphilus a noble Hungarian, straying out of the campe euen vnto the gates of Buda, desired the warders at the gate to giue him leaue to talke with Valentinus their Generall, for that he desired to see his old friend, and to conferre with him of certaine matters concerning the good of the common state. Which thing being granted by the Generall, he was immediatly receiued into the citie with his troupe of horsemen. Shortly after returning again into the campe, he reported how he had beene entertained by his old acquaintance in the citie: where viewing the garrison, the great artillerie, and fortification of the citie, he perceiued it was not to be taken without a greater power, and in a more seasonable time of the yeare. Which thing so mooued Velsius, by nature suspitious, and doubtfull of the fidelitie of a stranger, that he commanded him in anger to void the campe, because he had without his leaue gone into the city, and vpon his own priuat insolencie had conference with the enemie, and by amplifying their strength, to haue discouraged the armie, by putting them out of hope of victorie. Wherefore Velsius neuer attempting to assault the citie, returned again to Vicegrade to besiege the higher castle (wherein the antient crowne of king Stephen, wherewith the Hungarian kings were euer after him crowned, was kept) which castle he also took, with something lesse losse than he had done the lower towne. Not long after, he marched with his armie to Alba Regalis, the citie where the Hungarian Kings were vsually crowned and buried; which by the meanes of Perenus was deliuered vnto him, and a garrison put into it for king Ferdinand. These things thus done, Velsius retyred again to Strigonium; which hee did the rather, because the Germanes and Hungarians, two rough Nations, could by no meanes agree together, in so much as that Velsius the Generall in parting them was wounded in the th[illegible] and Perenus hurt with a stone: besid[illegible]s that, Winter was now come farre on, and the [illegible]iours cried out for pay. For which causes, Velsius (being also sicke of the Stone) bill[illegible]s Souldiours for that Winter about about the countrey. Yet before that, he new fortified Pesth, and left therein a garrison; because it was reported, that the Turkes vpon their frontiers were making preparation to come to aid them of Buda.

At such time as king Ferdinand was leuying his forces for the inuasion of Hungarie, the queene by the counsell of the bishop had in good time craued aid of the Turks lieutenants in the countries bordering vpon Hungarie, especially of Vstref gouernor of Bosna (a verie aged man, and of great honor, who had married one of the daughters of Baiazet the old Emperour) as also of Mahometes gouernour of Belgrade, and Amurathes who had the charge of the frontiers of Dalmatia; from whom she receiued one answer, That they might in no case without expresse commandement from Solyman depart from the places committed to their charge. Besides that, Mahometes was by rewards ouercome by Lascus, as he passed by Belgrade to Constantinople, not to stir or aid the Queene. Wherefore she, reiected by these great captains, certified Solyman by her Embassadours, what danger her selfe, her sonne, and the kingdome was in, crauing his speedie aid. Laschus was not yet come to Constantinople, being falne sicke by the way, but had sent before, Ptolomeus his Physitian to the great Bassa's, and especially to Lutzis, his old acquaintance, vpon whom he had bestowed great gifts, and was in hope by him to haue obtained what he desired: but all in vain; for Solyman who thought it much for his honour to defend his owne right, and that he had before giuen vnto king Iohn; thought also that it would redound both to his great profit and glorie, if he should as it were vpon charity take vpon him the protection of the widow and fatherlesse childe, in their so great distresse & danger. Wherfore calling vnto him the Embassadors, the three great Bassa's standing by, he said, That he had of his meere bountie before giuen the kingdome of Hungarie vnto King Iohn, to discend to his posteritie, so long as they should retaine the kinde remembrance of so great a benefit; wherefore to declare his constancie, inseperable from his bountie, he said he would take such a course in the matter, as that the Germans his enemies should not long reioyce of the wars they had begun. And in token of friendship, and that he had taken vpon him the protection of the yong King, he caused to be deliuered vnto the Embassadours a royall robe of purple and gold, a buckler with the bosse most curiously wrought, a horsemans Mace with a handle of gold, and a scimiter with the scabberd richly set with stones; and afterwards wrot effectuall to Vstref and Mahometes his lieutenants, That they should without delay aid the queen, and not to make excuse because it was Winter; threatning them, that if shee tooke any harme through their default and negligence, it should cost them their heads. The queens embassadors glad of their good dispatch, were scarce departed from the Turks court, when Lascus came to Constantinople; and vnderstanding by his physition the successe of the Hungarian Embassadors, proceeded for all that in his businesse, and deliuered his message, and vpon reasonable conditions requested the kingdome for King Ferdinand. But when he in speaking had oftentimes made mention of Charles the Emperour, as if he would with all the power of Germanie aid his brother; Solyman was so mooued therewith, that hee was presently taken away and committed to prison: the great Bassa's, but especially Rustan, Solymans son in law, a proud and furious young man, chiding him and shaking him vp as worthie of death, for offending with his liberall speech the maiestie of so curteous a Prince, and as it were mocking the king of kings; requiring friendship, when in the mean time his master most impudently made wars in Hungarie.

The Queen craueth aid of Solyman against Ferdinand.

Solyman promiseth to protect the Queene and her son, against Ferdinand, and sends presentis to the yong king.

Lasebus K. Ferdinand his Embassador imprisoned by Solyman.

Vstref and Mahometes the Bassa's aforesaid, hauing receiued such strait commandment from Solyman, assembled their dispersed souldiers, and by shipping brought them down the riuers Saus and Dranus, into Danubius: for it is a hard matter to performe any great thing by wars in Hungarie without the helpe of a great fleet, for conueying of the great ordnance, victuall, and other such necessaries of the armie, from one side of the great riuers to the other, as occasion requireth: but as then being the midst of Winter, and the North wind blowing hard, Danubius was so frozen on both sides, that the middle of the riuer was scarce open: so that the Turks not able to passe for the extremitie of the weather, not daring to return for the strait command of Solyman, were inforced in their tents there to abide the hardnesse of Winter, to shew their readinesse. It is almost incredible to be spoken, with what patience and resolution the souldiers endured all the extremities of the time, in so bare a place, their horses, which of all other things they hold most deere, staruing for cold and want of meat.

They paſſing ouer Danubius, tooke the citie of Vacia (being but badly defended for king Ferdinand) and putting many to the ſword, after the manner of their barbarous crueltie, burnt the citie. From thence King Ferdinand aduertiſed of the Turks departure, returned again to his old hope of recouering the kingdome: perſuading the Emperor his brother, not to giue ouer the war ſo fortunatly begun, eſpecially now that the Turks hauing forſaken the queen, were departed & gon. Wherefore the new forces lately before raiſed in Auſtria, Bohemia, Sileſia, and Morauia, for

Vpon this hill, Rogendorff to beat the caſtle, and to terrifie the queen, planted his batterie, and ſo ſhooke a new built tower thereof, that it was thought that it would haue ſuddenly fallen; which if it had, yet was it ſuppoſed a dangerous matter to haue aſſaulted it, becauſe it was walled about with a treble wall. For the biſhop was of a ſharpe & taunting ſpirit, and ſuch a contemner M of the Germans, that when two of them were taken in the kings orchards burning certain houſes, he in deriſion cauſed two hogs to be hanged vpon the ſame gallows with them. Not long after, Rogendorff remoued his campe from S. Gerrards mount, to a more conuenient place for the battering of the citie, called the Iewes Graues, neere vnto the gate called the Iewes gate.

A Which thing the Biſhop ſeeing, after his quipping manner requeſted of Rogendorff to pardon him, in that he had of late wrongully called him a doting old man; for that in remooving his camp into a more commodious place, he ſeemed to be a proper wiſe man and of good diſcretion, now that he had pitched his tents in a moſt fit place amongſt the dead, both for himſelfe being an old man and almoſt worne with vaine labour; and for his armie there condemned to die with him. Rogendorff thus encamped, begun in two places to batter the wals: Perenus and the Hungarians with the Bohemians neere vnto the gate called Sabatina in one place, and he himſelfe with the Germans betwixt the Iewes gate and the caſtle in another: which was don with ſuch violence, that a great part of the wall was beaten downe; and another part thereof ouercharged with earth, which the defendants had caſt vp on the inner ſide for the ſtrengthmaying of all that were in the citie. Which faire opportunitie to haue taken the citie, Rogendorff let ſlip, either not well aware thereof by reaſon of the great ſmoke of the artillerie on both ſides, and the duſt ariſing with the fall of the wall which couered all; or els according to his naturall diſpoſition, doing all things leaſurely and ſuſpitiouſly; ſo that a little delay bereft him of the preſent apprehenſion of ſo ſudden a reſolution: and the Germans, vſed more to ſtanding battels than to aſſault, were not to be ſo eaſily brought on to aſſault the breach vpon the ſudden, as were the Spaniards, Italians, or French. The wal was opened in that place almoſt two hundred paces in length, yet ſtanding almoſt the height of a man, which might eaſily haue beene ſcaled with ſhort ladders; but night was comming now faſt on, wherein the Germans

Whereas they of Buda in the meane time taking the aduantage of the enemies delay, with incredible diligence & labor in that night raiſed vp a new rampier inſtead of the wall that was fallen, euery man without exception putting his hand to the worke. In the morning the Germans comming to the breach, gaue ſuch a fierce aſſault vnto the new made rampier, that Otho Fotiſcus deſperatly entred into a ſhattered houſe, which ioyned vnto the wall; and certaine other companies, one ſouldier helping vp another, had almoſt recouered the top of the rampier, and were there readie to haue ſet vp their enſignes: when they of Buda with The Germans aſſaulting the breach, are with loſſe repulſed.

In this aſſault Rogendorff loſt aboue 800 men. Perenus was alſo in like maner, but with leſſe loſſe, repulſed at the other breach he had made at the gate Sabatina. After that, Rogendorff attempted by vndermining to haue taken the city, but was by countermines diſappointed of his purpoſe. Yet for all this, they in the citie began to feele the want of many things, ſo that it ſeemed they were not able to indure any longer ſiege; the common people pinched with hunger, crying openly out in mutinous ſort, that it was time to yeeld and make an end of thoſe common miſeries: but ſuch was the authoritie of the Biſhop, with his prouident foreſight of all
E vrgent euents, that once ſhewing himſelfe in the market place as if he would haue preached, he could turne the peeuiſh minded people which way he pleaſed.

After all this, it miſſed but a little, but that this citie which could not by enemies force be woon, had by ſhamefull treaſon bin loſt: there was at that time in Buda one Bornemiſſa a lawyer, who had in former time been Maior of the citie: this Bornemiſſa exceedingly hated the Bornemiſſa practiſeth to betray the city of Buda.
Biſhop for taking part with a banckerout Iew againſt him, and being full of malice, and deſirous of reuenge, promiſed to Renalius (Martial in the enemies camp) to deliuer to him blinde poſtern in S. Maries churchyard, wherby he might enter the citie: which gate ſerued the citiſens in time of peace to go thorow to the riuer. Rogendorff the General made acquainted with the matter, ſo liked thereof, that he in himſelfe thought it not good, in a matter of ſo great importance, to vſe at al the ſeruice of the Hungarians: Quite contrarie to that Bornemiſſa had re-against the appointed houre, which was about midnight, hauing before giuen straight charge that no man should stir in the camp, he sent foure select companies of Germans with great si-readie to haue entred, at such time as the Germans (receiued into the city) should breake open not what to do, and forgot to conduct the Germans: who altogether vnacquainted with the citie, knew not which way first to go; & stealing on softly in the darke, went on with no great courage, for feare of treason, still asking of them that followed, for him that should direct them. The Germans could not goe so closely, but that they were by the clattering of their ar-

Germans was Bacianus, who had that night the charge of the watch; and after him Vicche, who kept the court of guard in the market place; & hearing the alarme, came thither with a strong companie both of horsemen and footmen. Many of the most valiantest Germans, who com-

That hauing worthily got the name of an infamous traitor, he had therby lost all his substance and vndone his friends and kindred. The Generall Rogendorff (condemned euen of the com-as he that by two much insolencie had ouerthrowne the fairest occasion of a most goodly vi-ctorie: wherefore from that time he attempted no great matter, but set himselfe downe by long siege to tame his enemies, and so to win the citie.

Solyman vnderstanding of the Queenes distres in Hungarie, and with what desire Ferdinand those far distant one from another, whereby the greatnesse of his power is well to be perceiued. First, he sent Solyman Bassa an eunuch to Babylon, to defend the countrey of Mesopotamia, and the frontiers of his Empire alongst the Riuer Tygris, against Tamas the Persian King: Mahometes another of his great Bassaes, hee sent into Hungarie to relieue the besieged Queene: and after him, Vsref Bassa, which was the fourth of his chiefe Bassaes, with another armie to stay at Belgrade, in readinesse to aid the other Bassa sent before him, as occasion should require, if hee should find his enemies too strong. Vnto Barbarussa hee committed his nauie, for the defence of Græcia and Epirus against Andrea, who but a little before ai- M ded by the gallies of Sicilia and Naples, had driuen the Turkes and Moores (which tooke part with the Turks) out of Clupea, Neapolis, Adrumentum, Vsspina, Tapsus, and all alongst that coast of Affricke which the Moores call Mahomedia, except the Citie of Leptis, and caused those Cities to submit themselues to the gouernement of Muleasses King of Tunes.

A These cities are at this day called Calabia, Susa, Mahometa, Monasterim, Sfaxia, and Africa.
And because Solyman vnderstood, that Maylat the Vayuod of Transiluania took part with king Ferdinand, he sent against him Achomates Gouernour of Nicopolis, and commanded Peter of Moldauia, Prince of Valachia, to aid him: who afterwards accordingly came vnto him with 30000 horsemen. He himselfe also doubting the purposes of the Christian princes, and especially of Charles the Emperour, more than hee had need, came to Hadrianople, and in the countries thereabouts raised a third armie, to aid the two Bassaes sent before into Hungarie; keeping with him his sonne in law Rustan, whom he had made one of the foure great Bassaes of his Counsell, hauing thrust out Lutsibeius, whom the Turks call Lutzis, his brother in law, and exiled him into Macedonia for euill entreating and striking his wife, which was Solymans
B sister, as is before said, but was at this time done.

Hungarie with his armie about the middle of June in the yeare 1541, taking with him in his way the other Mahometes Gouernor of Belgrade, who gaue the shamefull ouerthrow vnto the Christians at Exek; ioyning also with him the power of Bosna, now commanded by Pliamas the Persian, for that Vsref the old Bassa was lately dead. The captaines of the Christian armie hearing of the comming of the Turks, entred into counsell, Whether they should continue the siege, or els go and meet them by the way and giue them battel. But the period of the Hungarian kingdome drawing fast on, and the inuitable Destinie thereof so requiring; the opinion of Rogendorff preuailed against the rest for the continuing of the siege, hee seeming more wil-C ling to die than to crosse ouer the riuer to Pesth, or to retire to Vicegrade or Strigonium, as diuers would haue persuaded him: wherfore he remoued from the place where he lay before, and encamped his army on the further side of the city, at the foot of S. Gerrards mount, where The order of king Ferdinands armies the hill lying between Buda and the campe, and departing from the riuer, loaueth a faire plain toward the East; of purpose that the Turks (which he knew would not go farre from the riuer and their fleet) should be enforced dangerously to passe by the mouth of his great ordnance, which he had aptly placed vpon the front of his trenches: for such was the nature of the place, that the campe lay defended on the right hand with the steepe hill, on the left hand with the riuer, and behind toward the citie with a strong bulwarke. Vpon the right hand, vpon a little rising ground, he placed the lesser campe; wherein were the Hungarians which fauoured king D Ferdinand, and then followed his ensignes. He made also a bridge from his campe into a little Iland which lay in the riuer, and with a fort wel planted with ordnance commanded both the riuer and the plaine, so to beat the enemies fleet comming vp the riuer, and themselues also as they should march alongst the plaine. He was about also to haue made a bridge of lighters and boats quite ouer the riuer, from his campe to Pesth, and in this order to expect the com-ming of new supplies from king Ferdinand, and to repell the enemie who was comming, and with long siege to wearie them in Buda: for there was such store both of victuall & all other warlike prouision in Pesth, as would well haue sufficed his armie vntill Winter had bin spent.
As soon as the Turks were come nigh the city, Valentinus as an embassador from the queene, met them with two thousand horse, and fully instructed both the Mahomets, what the Chri- The Bassa entrencheth his armie within halfe a mile of the kings army.

army. Wherfore the Bassa marching on boldly forward, came within halfe a mile of the Christian campe, where he quickly intrenched himselfe round with a strong trench, filling a great part of the plaine with his tents. But the other Mahometes, Gouernor of Belgrade, a most po-liticke captaine, tooke the higher ground towards the rising of the hill, neerer vnto the tents of the Hungarians than of the Germans. Vnto these two armies thus encamped, belonged also two fleets; the Christian fleet consisted of foure and twenty galleots, about fourscore small pinnaces, and little lesse than 100 ships of burden and other great boats: whereas the Turkes fleet was not thought to be past halfe so great. Neere vnto the little Iland, ioyned as we haue before said by a bridge to the Christian campe, beneath in the riuer had the Turks taken ano-in the vppermost end thereof, and planting it with great ordnance, they from thence shot at the fort which the Christians held in the little Iland, and at their vessels passing too and fro in the riuer, as the Christians did at them likewise. This Iland of Cepellia lyeth somewhat fly, that if Regendorff had at the first taken it and fortified it, before the comming of the Turks, as the Hungarians perſuaded him to haue done, the Turks could by no means haue incamped in the plaine, but muſt needs haue forſaken their fleet, fetching a great compaſſe about more toward the Weſt, further off from the riuer: which would haue turned to the Turks great diſ. aduantage. But no man is ſo wiſe as to foreſee all things, when as the very euill ſucceſſe, be the plot never ſo well laied, ſhall of it ſelfe, beſide the loſſe, leaue vnto the vnfortunat man the note of the want of prouident foreſight and diſcretion. But Regendorff was not willing to diuide his forces, vntill he had ſome new ſupplie from K. Ferdinand. Whileſt the armies lay thus neere one to the other, there were ſome light skirmiſhes made euery day, either by the horſemen or the footmen, & ſometime one braue man challenging forth another hand to hand, whom he thought by his armor or ſome other ſigne of his worth, to be like to himſelf: which was ſo pleaſant a fight to behold, that both the armies vpon a military courteſie, as if it had bin ſo agreed, would many times for certain houres forbeare to ſhoot any ſhot, of purpoſe to ſee thoſe gallants, with true proweſſe to proue their valor and manhood one vpon another, with their ſpeares and ſwords only. In which light skirmiſhes the German horſmen were often times put to the worſt; who mounted vpon great lieauie horſes, fitter for a ſet battell, could neither ſo readily charge the enemie, nor purſue him in his flight, as could the Turks with their nimble & ready light horſes, ſo well acquainted with that manner of flying fight, that they would with wheeling about eaſily fruſtrat the firſt charge of the heauy horſmen, & by & by come vpon them again with a freſh charge, & ſo often retire & come on again, vntil they had either wearied or ouerthrown them. But the Hungarians acquainted with that maner of fight as well as they, and alſo better armed, did eaſily incounter the Turks, and foile them, although they were in number moe.

Skirmiſhes betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks.

Rayſchachius for ſorrow of his ſonne ſlaine by the Turks, ſuddenly dieth.

There was amongſt the Germane captaines a noble man called Eckius Rayſchachius, whoſe ſonne (a valiant young gentleman) being got out of the armie without his fathers knowledge, bare himſelfe ſo gallantly in fight againſt the enemy in the ſight of his father & of the army, that he was highly commended of all men, and eſpecially of his father, who knew him not at all; yet before he could cleare himſelfe, hee was compaſſed in of the enemie, and valiantly fighting, ſlain. Rayſchachius exceedingly moued with the death of ſo braue a man, ignorant how neere it touched himſelfe, turning about to the other captains ſaid, This worthie gentleman, whatſoeuer he be, is worthie of eternall commendation, and to be moſt honorably buried by the whole army. As the reſt of the captains were with like compaſſion approuing his ſpeech, the dead bodie of the vnfortunate ſon reſcued, was preſented to the moſt miſerable father; which cauſed al them that were there preſent to ſhed tears; but ſuch a ſudden & inward griefe ſurpriſed the aged father, and ſtruck ſo to his heart, that after he had ſtood awhile ſpeechleſſe, with his eies ſet in his head, he ſuddenly fel down dead. From that time the general commanded, That no man ſhould vpon pain of death go out of the army to skirmiſh with the enemy without leaue: wherin he was ſo ſeuere, that he hanged vp one or two that preſumed to tranſgreſſe his commandement: which thing much diſcouraged his own men, & ſo incouraged the enemy, that they would ſometime braue the Chriſtians vpon the top of their own trenches.

Many daies had now paſſed ſince the comming of the Baſſa, the Turks and they of Buda dayly increaſing both in ſtrength and courage: when on the other ſide, faint courage, weake ſtrength, troubled counſell, vncertaine reſolution, the ominous ſignes of an vndoubted ouerthrow, were eaſie to be ſeen; & hope it ſelfe, the ſtay of all human actions, eſpecially of martiall affaires, almoſt loſt: the onely things that held their fainting hearts, was the often letters of king Ferdinand, and the firm opinion they had conceiued, That Charles the Emperor would not in ſo great a danger faile to aid his brother, both with men and mony: and laſt of all, the firme reſolution of a Generall, which far paſſed all reaſon, the ſooner to draw him to his end. The armies lying in this order, the Turks from the higher ground, and out of Ceppellia, perceiuing the Germans in the little Iſland as careleſſe men to keepe but negligent watch, agreed amongſt themſelues at one inſtant out of both their camps, to aſſaile diuers of their forts: and ſo in the breake of the day landed with their fleet ſo cloſely and ſuddenly to the Iſland, that they had ſlaine almoſt 600 of the Germans, before they were thorowly awake or could wel arm themſelues: wherwith the reſt were put in ſuch a feare, that they fled to the camp in ſuch haſt, that many of them fel beſide the bridge and were drowned in the riuer. All the camp was wonderfully troubled with the ſuddennes of the matter, the Turks with their hideous cries raiſing

For Herbeſtulfus the campmaſter, perſuading them not to ſuffrr the Chriſtian enſignes and great ordnance to bee ſo ſhamefully carried away of the Turks; and Marius the Admiral at the ſame time landing diuers companies in the Iſland with his pinnaces and great boats: they ſo couragiouſly charged the Turks, then buſied in the ſpoiling of the dead bodies and drawing away of the great ordnance, that they draue them againe to their boats; leauing vnto them as victors, both the Iſland and the ordnance, hauing before their departure, receiued no leſſe loſſe themſelues than had the Germans before.

B It was reported, that the Turks fleet might that day haue been quite ouerthrowne, if the Chriſtians vſing the victory, and holpen with the courſe of that ſwift riuer, had couragiouſly purſued them and landed with them. But many things after a matter is done are eaſily ſeene, which in the very heat and hurle of the danger cannot be foreſeene; forasmuch as ſudden accidents attended with great perill, do oftentimes dazle the minds of right wiſe & valiant captaines: yet foure of the Turks pinnaces were ſuncke, and three taken, and many of the Turks ſlaine or drowned in the riuer. Shortly after, the Turks more and more incouraged with the multitude of themſelues, and the fearefulneſſe they perceiued in their enemies, did at ſundry times ſo inſolently trouble and aſſaile the camp of the Chriſtians on euery ſide, that they left them almoſt no time of reſt, one company ſtill ſucceeding another; ſo that they were almoſt

So that they in the neither camp were now hardly beſet with their enemies on euery ſide: yet were they wel holpen by the great artillerie from Peſth, which much troubled Valentinus and his horſemen in aſſailing the campe on thar ſide.

Some report that Valentinus, not greatly angry with the Hungarian baniſhed men, but with the Germans, did by the way of priuat courteſie and friendſhip, by a faithfull ſouldier wiſh Perenus ſpeedily to prouide for the ſafety of himſelfe and of the Hungarians with him; for

D that there was a great beaſt comming, which would at one morſell deuoure them all. For Solyman aduertiſed of the doings of the Emperor and king Ferdinand, thinking that they would haue come down to Buda with a puiſſant army, was reſolued to be preſent himſelfe at ſo notable a battell, and was therefore comming thither with his army in all haſt. Wherefore Perenus thus forewarned, ſaid plainly to Regendorff & the other captains, That except they would preſently riſe with the army & depart, he would now whiles he had yet time, make ſhift for himſelfe and his countrymen. Their opinions diuerſly deliuered, at laſt they all agreed, that it was beſt the next night to paſſe ouer the riuer to Peſth: only the Generall vpon a fatall obſtinacie ſaid, He would not without king Ferdinands commandement depart from Buda: and therfore ſent countie Salma with a ſwift pinnace vp the riuer to Vienna to know his pleaſure therin. For it was not ſo eaſie a matter to make a bridge ouer Danubius, as they had at firſt ſuppoſed: for after they had begun it, and almoſt plancked it, there riſe ſuch a wind and tempeſt, & the violent riuer became ſo rough, that the timber wherwith the bridge was faſtened together was broken, the ioynts vnloſed, & many of the boats wherof the bridge was framed, their cables being broken were carried away by the force of the ſtream. Rayschachius for sorrow of his sonne slaine by the Turks, suddenly dieth.

There was amongst the Germane captaines a noble man called Eckius Rayschachius, whose sonne (a valiant young gentleman) being got out of the armie without his fathers knowledge, barg himselfe so gallantly in fight against the enemy in the sight of his father & of the army, that he was highly commended of all men, and especially of his father, who knew him not at all: yet before he could cleare himselfe, hee was compassed in of the enemie, and valiantly fighting, slain. Rayschachius exceedingly moued with the death of so braue a man, ignorant how neere it touched himselfe, turning about to the other captains said, This worthie gentleman, whatsoeuer he be, is worthie of eternall commendation, and to be most honorably buried by K the whole army. As the rest of the captains were with like compassion approuing his speech, the dead bodie of the vnfortunate son rescued, was presented to the most miserable father; which caused all them that were there present to shed teares; but such a sudden & inward griefe surprised the aged father, and struck so to his heart, that after he had stood awhile speechlesse, with his eies set in his head, he suddenly fel down dead. From that time the generall commanded, That no man should vpon pain of death go out of the army to skirmish with the enemy without leaue: wherin he was so seuere, that he hanged vp one or two that presumed to transgresse his commandement: which thing much discouraged his own men, & so incouraged the enemy, that they would sometime braue the Christians vpon the top of their own trenches.

campe was filled with tumult and confusion, and especially at the riuer side, euery man in that great feare striuing to get aboord, without regard of order or shame: for the dead time of the night then couered with darke and thicke clouds, made all things more terrible, euen vnto them which were of best courage: the authority of Rogendorff the Generall (in the darknesse of out of the enemies campe falling in his tent, and striking in sunder a chest which ste re, rest of the Germans flying ouer the bridge into the little Island, were there slain without mer-hundred saile of one sort of ships and other, were so confused and mingled together, that Da-

Christian fleet seeing all lost, cleered themselues so soone as they could of the Turks; and so beating them backe with their great ordnance out of the poups of their ships, got vp the riuer to Gomora. The rest of the land forces endured the same fortune in the campe, of whom the Bohemians died most honorably, slaine by the enemy in fight. Many falling into the hands of them of Buda, were saued or slaine, as was their fortune to fall into the power of a merciful or mercilesse man. But the Sun rising, plainly discouered the slaughter of the Christians, and the L victorie of the Turks, not so well before knowne. There was about 3000 men of one sort and other, who in warlike manner had taken a little hill by Saint Gerrards Church, and there stood vpon their guard, vntill such time as more than two thousand of them were slaine; the rest casting away their weapons yeelded in hope of life, and were reserued for a spectacle more grieuous than death it selfe.

At the same time Caſon with his victorious fleet comming to the shore of Pesth, brought such a feare vpon them that were escaped thither, and might easily haue defended the walls, (only with the crie of his soldiers & the thundring of the artillerie) that the horsmen for hast to get out, were like to ouerrun one another. The Germans had at that time so much forgot their wonted valour, & so trembled at the name of the Turks, that as soone as they saw their M white caps in their ships, they ran away as men dismaied, vnarmed, leauing behind them their plate, their carriages, & whatsoeuer good thing they had el Yet some of the Hungarian horsemen more desirous of the spoile than afraid of death, sta ind rifling the merchants shops; for Pesth was become a very rich mart towne for al kind erchandise, marchants resorting thither

A thither from all other places of the troubled countrey, as to a strong and commodious citie, and of more safety than the rest. But Caſon now entring without resistance, slew some of those Pesth taken by Caſon, Admirall of the Turkes fleet.
greedie Hungarians, and ran thorow the towne with such barbarous crueltie and thirst of the Christian bloud, that he spared neither man, woman, nor child, except some few, which either for their beautie or strength of bodie were reserued for the Turks beastly lust, or slauish labor: so that in this war it is reported, more than 20000 Christians were one way and other by di-uers chances slaine. There was taken at Pesth, in the campe and in the Island, 36 great pieces for batterie, of wonderfull beautie; and of lesser field pieces, 150. As for shot, powder, armor, weapons, and victuall prouided for Winter, such store was found, that the Turks accounted it for the greatest part of their victorie. Rogendorff the vnfortunat Generall, at such time as the B Turks hauing woon the trenches, were fighting in the midst of his campe, desiring rather to be slaine in his tent, than to liue after so great an ouerthrow, was against his will by strong hand Rogendorffe against his will carried away by his physitian & chamberlain, to Comara, there dieth.
carried aboord a little pinnace by his physitian and chamberlaine, which would not leaue him as he lay, and was so conueyed vp the riuer to the Island of Comora; where he shortly after, partly for the painfulnesse of his wound, but more for griefe of minde, died in a little countrey village called Samarium, leauing vnto the Germans a wofull remembrance of his accursed obstinacie and pride. Solyman still doubting the comming of Charles the Emperour and king Ferdinand to Buda, was comming with his armie from Hadrianople in such hast, that he caused the Ianizaries, his best footmen, contrarie to their manner, to march as fast as his horsemen: but vnderstanding by the way, of the late victorie obtained by his captaines, he C tooke more leisure, and came with a great power to Buda in August, and there incamped on the Solyman commeth to Buda.
other side of the citie, to auoid the noisome sauour of the dead bodies, which lay yet vnburied. Where calling vnto him the other armie, and making one huge campe of both, he highly commended all his captaines, but especially the two Mahometes. And vnderstanding that the victorie was especially gotten by the meanes of Mahometes, gouernour of Belgrade, he made him Generall of all his Europeian horsemen, one of the most honourable preferments of the Turkish Empire: the other captaines he rewarded according as they had deserued, and with-all augmented their pay.

After that, he caused the prisoners, in number about eight hundred, to be brought out; who Turkish cruelties.
bound in long ropes, were in derision led all alongst the armie, ranged in order of battell, and D afterward by his commandement slain by his yong soldiers: saying with seuere countenance, that they were worthie of such death, which by Embassadours dissemblingly entreating of peace, had in the meane time craftily waged war. Amongst these prisoners was one souldier of Bauaria of an exceeding high stature; him in despight of the German nation he deli-uered to a little dwarfe (whom his sonnes made great account of) to be slaine, whose head was scarce so high as the knees of the tall captiue; with that cruell spight to aggrauate the indig-nitie of his death: when as that goodly tall man, mangled about the legs a long time by that apish dwarfe with his little scimiter, as if it had bin in disport, fell downe, and was with many feeble blowes hardly at last slaine by that wretch, still heartened on by others, to satisfie the eyes of the Princes, beholding it as their sport.

E This barbarous and cruell execution done, Solyman sent his Embassadors with presents to the yong king, which were three beautifull horses, with their bridles of gold, and their trappings richly set with pretious stones, and three royall robes of cloth of gold; & vnto the chief of the nobilitie he sent rich gowns and chains of gold. The embassadors which brought these presents, in curteous manner requested of the queene, to send the yong king her son, attended Solyman sends for the young king into the campe.
with his nobilitie, into the campe, and without all feare, to hope that all should goe well both with her and her son: for that Solyman, who exceeded all other kings, not in power and fortune only, but in vertue and vpright dealing also, was of such an heroical disposition, that he would not onely defend the childe, whom in the right of his father he had once thought worthie his protection & fauor, victorie confirming the same, but would also augment his estate, with the F largest bounds of his antient kingdome. Wherefore he was desirous to see the yong king, and to behold in him the representation of his father, and with his own hand to deliuer him to be imbraced of his sons; that of his protection renewed, so happily begun, might be grounded a firme & perpetuall friendship with the Othoman kings: and that he would alwayes account of her as of his daughter. But the cause why he came not to see her, which he did in curtesie desire,

fire, was for that by antient custom the Othoman kings were forbidden that point of courtesie, G to visit other mens wiues in their houses. Besides that, Solyman (they said) was not so forgetful of his modestie and honour, as to receiue into his pauilion the daughter of a King his friend and allie, and she the late wife of a King his friend and tributarie, and the faire young mother of a sonne, growing in the hope of like regall dignitie, for feare he should draw into any sus-pition the inuiolate name of her chastitie, which in Queenes was to be guarded with an especiall and wonderfull care. Whereunto the Queene (a manifest feare confounding the tender sences in her motherly affection) answered verie doubtfully: but the Bishop perswading her, and instantly requesting her, not to giue the Turks occasion to suspect, that she had them in distrust, by her little and unprofitable delay; sent her young sonne in princely swathing cloaths, H in a rich chariot, with his nurse and certain great ladies vnto the campe, attended vpon with almost all the Nobilitie to whom Solyman had sent Presents. In his comming to the campe, he was for honours sake met vpon the way by certaine gallant troupes of the Turkish horsemen: and all the way as he passed in the campe, orderly stood the Ianizaries of his guard. As soone as he was brought into the campe, Solyman curteously looked vpon him, and familiarly talked with the nurse, and commanded his sonnes there present to take him in their armes, and to kisse him, in certaine token of the loue they would beare him, whom they were in time to haue their friend and tributarie, when he was growne to mans estate: these were Selymus and Baiazet, begotten of his faire concubine Roxalana, bearing the names, the one of his grandfather, the other of his great grandfather. As for Mustapha his eldest sonne by his I Circassian wife, he then liued in Magnesia a great way off; who though he was a prince of so great hope, as neuer any of the Turkish kings had a sonne of greater, and was therefore exceedingly beloued of the men of warre; yet was he not so well liked of his father, brought out of fauour with him by Roxalana, as if he had traiterously gone about to take the Empire from him, yet liuing, as did Selymus his grandfather from Baiazet: for which cause Solyman secretly purposed to take him away, as afterwards he did, and to appoint Selymus for his successour, as hereafter shall appeare.

The queene sendeth the young king her son to Solyman in the campe, attended with the Nobility.

Solyman curteously receiueth the young king.

Solyman craftily taketh the citie of Buda.

But Solyman at such time as the Noblemen of Hungarie were dining merrily with the Bas-sa's, had commanded certaine companies (to whom he had before giuen instructions what he would haue done) vnder the colour of seeing the citie, to take one of the gates called Sabatina, K and the chiefe streets: which was done so quietly and cunningly, that a warie watchman standing there, and beholding the manner of the Turks comming and going too and fro, could hardly haue perceiued how the gate was taken, vntill it was too late. For many of the Turkes walking faire and softly by great companies into the citie, as if it had beene but for pleasure, to haue seen it; and other some to colour the matter, walking likewise backe againe, as if they had sufficiently viewed the citie; by that meanes they without any tumult or stirre quickely tooke the appointed gate, with the market place and chiefe streets of the citie. Which so finely done, the captaine of the Ianizaries caused proclamation to be made in all parts of the city, That the citizens should without feare keepe themselues within their houses, and forthwith, as they would haue their liues, libertie, and goods saued, to deliuer all their weapons: which L they seeing no remedie, did: and hauing deliuered their armes, and taken the Turks faith for their securitie, they receiued them into their houses as their vnwelcome guests. But such was the quietnes and modestie of the Turks, by reason of the seueritie of their martiall discipline, that no citizen which tooke them into their houses, was by them wronged by word or deed.
Solyman vnderstanding that the citie was thus quietly and without resistance taken, sent the childe backe againe vnto the Queene, although it was now almost night; but the chiefe noblemen he retained still with him: these were George the Bishop and Treasurer, Petrus Vicche the young Kings nigh kinsman and one of his Tutors, Valentinus Turaccus Generall of the queens forces, Stephanus Verbetius Chancellor, and Bacianus Vrbanus Gouernour of the citie of Buda.
This sudden and vnexpected change exceedingly troubled all their mindes, and so much the more, for that the great Bassa's with changed countenance began to picke quarrels with them, and as it were straightly and impudently to examine them, and to call them to account for all M that they had done. The Queene seeing the citie so craftily surprised, and the nobilitie iniu-riously detained in the campe, troubled with feare and griefe, by humble letters requested Solyman not to forget the faith he had long before giuen vnto her, and euen of late confirmed Solyman detaineth the Noblemen of Hungarie in his campe.

A by his Embassadors; but mind full both thereof, and of his woonted clemencie, to send backe vnto her the Noblemen, who for their fidelitie and valiant seruice had well deserued both of him and her: this she did by Rustemes Bassa, whom she had loded with gifts, and amongst other things of great price, had sent him a faire coronet of her owne, and a goodly jewell set with rich stone, to send vnto his wife (Solymans daughter) for a Present.

After that, Solyman consulted with his Bassa's foure dayes, what order to take concerning The great Bassa's of diuers opinions for the disposing of the Kingdome of Hungarie.
the kingdome of Hungarie: in discourse whereof his great Bassa's were of diuers opinions.
Mahometes aduised him to carrie away with him to Constantinople, both the young childe and all the Nobilitie, and to leaue such a gouernour in Buda, as by his wise and moderate go-uernment, rather than by rigour, might put the people out of feare of seruitude and bondage, B by defending them from wrong, and yet by little and little lay vpon them the yoke of the Turkish gouernment. But Rustemes Bassa (before corrupted, and a man in greater fauour than the rest, because he was Solymans sonne in law, and therefore further from all suspition of flatterie; stood altogether vpon tearmes of honour; saying, That nothing could be more dis-honourable vnto so great and mightie a Monarch, who neuer had at any time with any spot or staine blemished the glorie of his name, than after victorie, against all right and reason to breake his faith at once with a weake woman and sillie infant, whom he had before taken vpon him to protect and defend. On the other side, Mahometes Gouernour of Belgrade (an old mortall enemie of the Christians, of all the rest best acquainted with the state of Hungarie, and for his great experience and approued valour, then extraordinarily admitted by Solyman C into counsel among the great Bassa's) disliked of both the former opinions, as too full of lenitie: and being asked his owne, deliuered it in this mischieuous manner as fol-loweth:

The oration of Mahometes of Belgrade, to Solyman, concerning the disposing of the kingdome of Hungarie.

I know (said he) most mightie Solyman, that he which in consultation of matters of so great conse- quence is to deliuer his opinion last, shall if he discent from the rest, be subiect to enuie and reprehension, And therefore it cannot be, but that I being of a quite contrarie opinion to them that haue before spoken, my speech must also be vnto your eares both vnpleasant and tedious. But I refuse not to be counted by my selfe, yea and presumptuous, if you will so haue it, rather than a smoother vp of other mens sayings, as one of no iudgment; whilest I recount those things, which as the present case standeth, may won-D derfully profit your designes and the Imperiall state: for of right I may desire you to yeeld a little to my yeares, and (if I may by your good fauour so say) to that I haue already done: when as I, now growne an old man in wars against these Hungarians, haue by experience learned those things of the state and strength of this Kingdome, and the disposition of the people, which being here laid downe, may much auaile for your better determination of this so weighty a cause, as admitteth no repentance if you shall now be ouerseene therein. You haue now within the space of these twentie yeares come in warres your selfe in person fiue times into this countrie, when I as no obscure captaine or souldier, was in all those warres and battels euer present, of purpose, as I suppose, to reuenge your iniuries, to enlarge your empire, and in briefe to assure you of a good peace, which could neuer be but by force of armes and victorie. And therefore you E valiantly won Belgrade, the infamous dwelling place and receptacle of most outragious threates and rob- bers, and in former time famous for the vnfortunat attempts of your ancestors: when as from thence the Hungarians in time of peace had at their pleasure, whilest your father was then occupied in the Persian warre, spoyled the borders of Seruia and Illyria. The same Hungarians about fiue yeares after, for that they had in cruell manner slaine your Embassadours, you ouerthrew in battell, and slew their King: and possessed of Buda, to manifest and make knowne by a notable demonstration, the magnificence of your he-roicall minde, euen vnto the rewdest enemies of our name, did choose out of the reliques of that vanquished Nation, one whom you might grace with the honour of the regall Crowne, although not borne of Royall blood, or vnto you knowne for any other desert, than that he was a little before both your publique and priuat enemie; and comming against you with a strong power out of Transyluania, he had in the meane time lost his brother, a better man than himselfe, slaine with our sword. After that, rose F vp the Austrian King, a new enemie, to expulse this Hungarian, raigning by your courtesie, and so you tooke in hand the third warre against the Germanes, which you so effectually prosecuted, that hauing forthwith restored the King, you carried the terrour of your selfe not onely to the walls of Vienna, but into the verie heart of Germanie. But two yeares yet scarcely past, the same King (neuer long content with peace or warres) supported by the power of his brother Charles, and in vaine besieging Buda-defended, defended by your garrisons, stirred you vp againe to reuenge the iniurie, slaughter, and spoyle by his sol- G diers done: for that you thought it to stand with your honour, to protect him with your power, whom you had of your rare bountie made a King; and then desired aboue all things, to fight a noble battell with the two brethren for the Empire of the West. But they at such time as you with fire and sword ran thorow their antient kingdomes, endured not the noise of your comming. After that, ensued a peace betweene the Hungarians and the Germane, your Maiestie permitting and approouing it, at such time as you made haste to go against the Persians: but the German king so broke that peace, that had not I in good time re-uenged his treacherie, by the ouerthrow of a great armie of his at Exek, you must of necessitie haue been sent for from Babylon your selfe, as but now you were glad to come in haste, by long and painfull iournies from Constantinople, to aid vs in time, and as I verily hope, to make an end for all; that all things set in firme order in Hungarie [illegible] inconueniences of so many labours and so great charge, fiue times vn- H dertaken for another ma[illegible], might now at length take end: except (as I see some wish) you be in minde neuer to giue ouer the protection of the childe and widow, a matter full of infinite labour and pe-rill, not to be counteruailed with that glorious shew of honour, which by these (in my opini[illegible] no wise men is pretended to your haughtie minde, euer desirous of honour and fame. But I as a blu[illegible] man vnderstand not this high point of wisdome, abounding with glorie, which in the verie course thereof cut-teth in sunder the sinewes of victorie, and is neuer by politique Generals admitted into their campes. In which doing, as I wish you more fortunate than your ancestors, who haue united eighteene kingdomes to this your Empire, so would I not haue you more wise than they: for what can be a more vnwise part, than alwayes to play the vnwise man? that is to say, alwayes to be carefull of other mens affaires, and in mean time oftentimes to indanger his owne estate, his health, his wealth, his honor. You haue satisfied, and that I (in my opinion) plentifully the duties both of charity, fidelity, and if it must needs be so, of honor and glo-ry also; if it be to be gotten rather by courtesie, clemency and lenity, than by the inuincible strength of wise policie, and the constant resolution of a martiall mind: for by those instruments, and none other, hath worthie vertues alwaies promoted and supported the Othoman kings. Wherfore let those vain shews (as seemeth vnto me) of counterfeit honor delight the minds of idle and sloathfull kings: assuredly they ne-uer pleased your armed ancestors, but after the enemie was quite ouerthrown, the triumph made, and the trophies of victorie erected. But let this be as best pleaseth your high wisdom and iudgement, whereun-to the greatest wits gaue place. Truely I (if I well foresee the chances of war, and the assured euents of things) will not follow that manner of counsell which the pleasure of my mind persuadeth me vnto, when K as necessitie, which ruleth all things, presently forceth me and sheweth me a far better course. The Hunga-rians aboue all other things notably warne vs not to trust them, who infamous for their vnconstancie after reuolt and trecherie, are still at variance amongst themselues; and their banished men are conti-nually setting on the Germans to inuade the countrie, and the weake power of the Queene and the child is not such as may withstand so neere and so mightie an enemy: so that another mans kingdome must of necessitie be defended by our helpe, which may not be lesse than a strong armie, without our great perill. To be briefe, euery yeare to take in hand so long an exped[illegible]tion of so great labour and trauell, with an ar-mie furnished with horsemen, footmen, artillerie, and a fleet of ships for defence of another man, as com-monly we doe, seemeth to me meere madnesse: neither doe I thinke it to stand with the maiestie of the Othoman Emperours, thus to be moued euery yeare at the request of a puling woman, crying for help:

except you thinke it more profitable and honourably to maintaine a defensiue than an inuasiue warre: L Wherefore (in my opinion) it is best to turne this kingdome (so often conquered and defended by Law of Armes) after the manner of your ancestors, into the forme of a prouince: the Queene I would haue sent to her father, and the boy her sonne brought vp in your court at Constantinople, and there instru-cted in our religion: the nobilitie of the countrey I wish to be slaine, and their castles rased, and the no-table families which bare the brauest minds, to be caried away out of al parts of the country into Asia: as for the base multitude, I would haue kept vnder with good garrisons, to till the ground, and inhabit the cities. By this onely means (might Solyman) shal both the Hungarians perceiue themselues conquered, and the Germans glad to forbeare comming into Hungarie, vnlesse they will rashly and vnfortunatly hazard both Styria and Austria.

Mischieuous counsell.

Solyman en-treth Buda the 30 of August 1541, & there first sacrificeth after the Maho-metan manner.

M

But Solyman thinking it good to do sacrifice before he would resolutely determine of so great a matter, entred into Buda with his two sonnes, Selymus and Baiazet, the thirtieth of Au-gust in the yeare 1541: and there in the Cathedrall church dedicated to the Virgin Marie (being before by his priests purified after the manner [illegible] their superstition) sacrificed the first Mahome-

A Mahometan sacrifice in Buda. Shortly after, he as it were moderating the opinions of his great counsellors, prouided out of them all both for his owne securitie and honour, and publi-shed a decree, the fatall doome of that flourishing kingdome, where vnder it yet groaneth at this day; that Buda should from that day be kept with a garrison of Turks, and the kingdome conuerted into a Prouince of the Turkish Empire; and the queene with her yong son should presently depart the City, and liue in Lippa, in a fertile and quiet Countrey beyond the riuer of Tibiscus, which something to comfort her, was neere vnto the borders of her father Sigis-mund his Kingdome, to be safely conducted thither with all her wealth and jewels by his Ia-nizaries. Wherefore the Queene and her Son, according to this Decree, with teares and mourning, detesting in her heart the Tyrants perfideous dealing (which necessitie inforced her then to dissemble) departed from Buda, constrained by the Turks to leaue behinde her all the ordnance in the castle and City, with all other the warlike prouision and store of vi-ctuall. The Noblemen went with her also, who although they went sorrowfull for this wo-full and vnexpected change of things, yet were they very glad of their liberty and safe-tie, whereof they had for the space of three dayes dispaired. Only Valentinus was kept in safe custody in the campe, because he was a martiall man of greatest power amongst the Hunga-rians; and besides that, much hated of the Turkes for the hard pursuit of Casons and his horse-men, slaine at Storamberg in Austria. Thus the royall city of Buda fell into the hands of the Turks, whereupon not long after ensued the finall ruine of that Kingdome, sometime the strong Bulwarke of Christendome, but lost to the great weakning of the Christian Common-
C weale; which may iustly be imputed to the pride, ambition, and dissention of the Hungari-ans amongst themselues, and the calling in of the common Enemie: the due consideration of whose onely comming, might well haue sufficed to haue set them agreed.

The doome of Hungary.

The Queene de-parteth out of Buda with her Sonne.

Whilest these things were doing at Buda, king Ferdinand expecting the euent of this war at Vienna, & hearing of the shameful of losse his Army, & that the Generall deadly wounded was fled to Comara, and that Solyman fame increasing the euill newes) was comming towards Vienna; sent Leonardus Velsius (who neuer liked of the siege of Buda) to Comara, to stay the further flight of the souldiers, and to gather together so wel as he could the dispersed reliques of the scattered armie, and to comfort againe the discouraged men with the hope of new sup-plies and of pay. And somewhat to stay Solyman, who as it was thought would suddenly come D to Vienna, he sent Countie Salma and Sigismund Litheste.ine, a noble and graue counsellour, his embassadours, with Presents and new conditions of peace to Solyman. The Presents was a hie standing cup of gold after the German fashion, curiously set with stones: and a wonderfull globe of siluer of most rare & curious deuise, daily expressing the hourely passing of the time, the motion of the planets, the change and full of the Moone, the motion of the superiour orbes, euer moouing by certaine wheeles and weights curiously conueyed within the same, and exactly keeping due time and motion; liuely expressing the wonderfull motions & con-uersions of the cœlestiall frame. A most curious and strange piece of worke, deuised and per-fected by the most cunning Astronomers for Maximilian the Emperor, whose noble mind ne-uer spared for any cost to obtaine things of rare & strange deuise. The embassadours passing E downe the riuer of Danubius, were at their landing first receiued by Casons the Admirall of Solymans fleet, and by him brought into a rich tent, the ground vnder their feet being all coue-red with rich carpets: to whom Rustan Bassa sent such good cheere as the campe affoorded, but especially most excellent wine, no lesse forbidden the Turks by their law, than desired of the Germans. The next day after, the great Bassaes feasted the embassadors, Solyman himselfe dyning not far off in his pauillion: at which feast the Bassaes for the more courtesie dined with the embassadors, not sitting with their legs gathered vnder them flat vpon the ground, as their maner was, but sitting in chaires at a high table, after the maner of the Christians: onely Mahomets Gouernour of Belgrade, for his age and valour an extraordinarie ghest, sat downe vpon a cussion beneath the Bassaes. Their cheere was onely Rice and Mutton, and that so plainly F and sparingly dressed, as if they had therby noted our gourmandise and excesse; who measure not our cheere by that which nature requireth, but that which greedie appetite desireth, as if therein consisted the greatest nobility: and the drinke for the great Bassaes themselues, right easie to be had, was faire water out of the riuer Danubius. After dinner the embassadors were brought in vnto Solyman, each of them led betwixt two Bassaes holding them fast by the armes, enemies, than to make his peace vpon reasonable conditions, and that with as much speed as G were possible: in which doing, besides that he should well prouide for his owne safetie, hee should also saue both his wealth and honour; for Solyman was comming (as he said) with his victorious armie; who would with assured death reuenge his vaine hope of holding out the siege, if he should vpon a stubborne and obstinate mind then refuse to obey his command.

Whereunto Maylat, who foresaw that it was better for him to make a certaine peace, than to endure an vncertaine warre, answered, That he could be content to conclude a peace, so that it were not vpon any bad conditions; and would not greatly refuse Solymans command, which was wont to be both reasonable and just: wherefore vpon sufficient pledges he would come into the campe, in presence to agree vpon the conditions of the peace, and demanded to haue Achomates his son, a valiant yong gentleman, deliuered in hostage. Which thing Achomates de- H nied, for that hee had (as he said) before giuen him to Solyman, as the manner was; and therefore had ouer him no more power: but he promised for him, that was but one, to giue figure of his best captains. Which offer Maylat (misdoubting no deceit) accepted, & with a gl[illegible] and gallant retinue attended vpon, came into the enemies camp, where he was courteously & honourably receiued. But the parly, as it could not be conueniently begun immediatly after the first salutation, so could it by no means be then ended, but was deferred vntill the next day: to the intent, that the trecherous Moldauian might take his well acquainted and wel knowne guest, whom he had against that time inuited to a solemn banquet. By that means, the next day about the midst of dinner, fortune so fauoured the intended trecherie, Maylat (who was of so proud and cholericke a nature, that he could not wel brooke the least indignitie) was by occa- I sion of some insolent speech, of purpose ministred by the Moldauian ghests, put into such a fret, that laying his hand vpon his sword, he in a rage flung from the table: at which time all the other ghests starting vp also laid hands vpon him and tooke him, fuming, & in vaine crying out, that he was shamefully betraid. His followers were all forthwith stript of al their brauerie by the needie Moldauians, and their horses and armor taken from them. Whilest May- lat was yet furiously exclaiming of this treason, in came Achomates, who to seeme guiltlesse of the matter, with deep dissimulation sharply reproued the false Moldauian, that he had in doing so foule a fact shamefully violated the lawes of hospitality, reuerenced of all nations, falsified the faith which he had giuen him for his safety, & betraid the liues of such notable captains as lay in hostage for him. Wherunto the Moldauian (as if it had bin in contempt) scornfully an- K swered, that he had vpon good cause taken Maylat prisoner, & so would in safety keep him for Solyman, vnto whom it onely belonged to iudge, whether he had iustly or vniustly kept him.

Maylat entreth into the Turks campe.

Maylat trecherously taken prisoner by the Moldauian.

Not long after, the strong towne of Fogaris was deliuered, with the hostages, but whether by feare or by corruption of Maylats lieutenant, is vncertaine. So Valentinus Turaccus, and May- lat, two of the greatest noblemen of Hungarie, sufficient of themselues to haue restored the Hungarian kingdome (first rent in sunder with ciuill discord, and afterward with the inuasion of the Turks) fell into the hands of the enemy, not vanquished in battell, but deceiued by treason. The towne being thus surrendred, almost all the countrey of Transyluania, was by Soly- mans consent deliuered to the young king, vnto whom all the people most willingly submitted themselues, and tooke the oath of obedience, remembring that his father had almost for L thirtie yeares space with great iustice and quietnesse gouerned that prouince; and with many presents honoured the young King lying in Lippa, with the Queene his mother, and his two tutors, the Bishop, and Vicche.

Transyluania giuen by Solyman to the young King.

At the same time, Charles the Emperor at the importunat suit of his subiects of Spaine, had prepared a great force both by sea and land for the conquering of Algiers: from whence the Turkish pyrats did so infest all that coast of the countrey, from Gades to the mountains Pyrenei, that the Spaniards (all trade of merchandise being set apart) were glad to keepe a continuall watch and ward all alongst that coast for defence of the countrey. Wherefore although hee well knew of the comming of the Turkes to Buda, and how hardly he was by the Lantgraue and others spoken of, for leauing his brother so hardly bestead, to go against a sort of pirats in M Affricke, yet persisting in his former determination, he departed out of Germanie into Italie, where by the way he met Octauius Farnesius his son in law, Alphonsus Vastius his lieutenant, by the Venetian embassadours, neere to Verona, and so brought to Millaine, where he was with

A Millain, where he was with great solemnitie ioyfully receiued of the citizens, and vnder a canopie of gold brought vnto the pallace: he himselfe going in a plain blacke cloke, & a moniely cap in mourning wise, when as the women and vulgar people, vpon a curious simplicity, expected to haue seene so great an Emperor in his royall robes, glistering with gold and precious stone, and the imperiall crowne vpon his head. His heauie countenance answerable also to his attire was much noted, as presaging the wofull ouerthrow which was the day before re-ceiued at Buda, but not yet knowne in Italie. From Millaine he departed to Genoa, where he was aduertised by letters from his brother king Ferdinand, of the ouerthrow of the Germans, of the victorie of the Turks, and the comming of Solyman. Vpon which newes, Vastius and Auria, his two chiefe commanders, the one at land, the other at sea, would haue perswaded him B to haue deferred his intended expedition for Africa vntill the next Spring: and with such power as he had alreadie raised in Italie, and brought with him out of Germanie, to stay still in Italie, so to make shew vnto the Turks as if he would haue returned and holpen his brother: and in the meane time to assure himselfe of his state in Italie against the French, who (as it was thought) would be readie to take all occasion of aduantage, if any mishap should befall him, either by the force of the enemie, or violence of tempest. But he constant in his former re solution, answered them as they sat in counsell, that they had perswaded him for great reasons to stay in Italie; but that he was for far greater to passe into Africke: for if he should then stay in Italie, it would be thought, that he was for feare of the Turks fled out of Germanie: which C disgrace could no otherwise be preuented, but by the present prosecuting of his former determination for Algiers, and satisfying the expectation of his subiects of Spaine; and so by sea valiantly to proue their better fortune, which had of late not so well fauored them at land, in hope that Algiers might bee woon before the seas should grow rough and dangerous with Winter tempests: which if it should fall out according to his mind, he would not, as he said, greatly care what the French could do. Yet was it thought, that the dissembling friendship betwixt the French king and him, would not long indure: and the rather, for that there was a new grudge risen betwixt them about the death of Antonius Rinuo, who for certaine years had lien embassador for the French king at Constantinople, to Solyman, and was a few months before sent backe again by him into France to the king: but returning backe againe with new instructions from his Master, for the confirmation of a further league betwixt the Turkish D Sultan and him, hee was by certaine Spaniards of the Emperors old soldiers, who had knowledge of his comming, belaied vpon the riuer Padus as he was going downe to Venice, so to haue passed into Epirus, and slaine, together with Cæsar Fregosius: or as the common report went, first taken and tortured, to get from him the secrets of his negotiation, and afterwards slaine. Which report so much touched Vastius in credit, that in purgation of himselfe, he offered the combat to any man of like qualitie to himselfe, that durst charge him with the truth thereof. But many were of opinion, that he was well and worthily taken away, for vndertа-king so odious a charge, as to stirre vp the Turks against the Christians, and to shew vnto them such opportunities as might best serue their purpose, by discouering vnto them the Emperors designes, to the great hurt of the Christian common-weale. But were it well, or were it euill; E as Paulus the third of that name then Bishop of Rome, meeting the Emperour at Luca as hee came from Genoa, could not, or would determine, sure it serued as no small occasion to set those two great Princes again at ods, whereby the wished vnitie of the Christian state was more shaken, and a way opened for the Turke. The Emperor at his comming to Luca, was honorably receiued by the Cardinals and Bishops, and lodged in the court; the great Bishop was before placed in the Bishops pallace, whither the Emperor came thrice to talke with him, and the Bishop to him once. But the Bishop hauing nothing at all preuailed with the Emperor and the French embassador, for the appeasing of the troubles euen then like to arise betwixt him and the French king; did what hee might to perswade him to employ such forces as hee was about to passe ouer with into Africke, against the Turks in defence of his brother Ferdinand, F and of the countrey of Austria, if Solyman should happily pursue his late obtained victorie at Buda. But he still resolute in that fatall determination of inuading of Africke, reiected that the Bishops request also. So the great Bishop hauing moued much, and preuailed little, in the greatest matters which most concerned the common good, taking his leaue of the Emperour, returned by easie iournies to Rome.

The Emperour in the mean time with certain bands of Italians, vnder the leading of Camillus Columna and Augustinus Spinula, and six thousand Germans, came from Luca to the port Lune and there imbarking his souldiers in certain marchants ships prouided for the purpose, and fiue & thirtie gallies, departed thence, commanding the masters of the ships to direct their course to the Ilands of Balcares: but after they had put to sea, they were by force of tempest suddenly arising, brought within sight of Corsica: where after they had been tossed too and fro two daies in the rough seas, and put out of their course, the wind something falling, they put into the hauen of Syracusa, now called Bonifacium. The dispersed fleet once come together into the port of Syracusa, and the rage of the sea well appeased, hee put to sea againe for the Ilands Beleares, now called Maiorca and Minorca: where in his course he met with a tempest from the West, more terrible and dreadfull than the first: wherin diuers of the gallies hauing lost their masts and saile[illegible]re glad with extreame labour and perill in striuing against the wrought sea to get into a harbour of the lesser Island, taking name of Barchinus Ma[illegible] famous Carthaginensian, whose name it retaineth vntil this day. From hence the Empe[illegible]rith all his fleet passed ouer to the greater Island, being wonderfull glad that Ferdinand Gonzaga his Viceroy in Sicilia was in good time come with the Sicilian gallies and ships of Italie, in number a hundred and fifty saile, wherin he had brought such store of bisket and victual, as might haue sufficed for a long war. Mendoza was also expected to haue come thither with his fleete from Spaine; but he by reason of contrarie winds being not able to hold that course, altered his purpose according to the tempest, and so happily cut ouer directly to Algiers. So the Emperour nothing misdoubting the carefull diligence of Mendoza, and thinking that which was indeed already changed, and the wind now seruing faire, by the persuasion of Auria his Admirall hoised saile, and in two daies came before Algiers, and there in goodly order came to anker before the citie in the sight of the enemy. Whilest the fleet thus lay, two of the pyrats which had beene abroad at sea seeking for prize, returning to Algiers, not knowing any thing of the fleet, fell into the bay amongst them before they were aware: the bigger whereof Viscontes Cicada stemmed with his gallie and sunke him, the other with wonderfull celeritie got into the hauen. In the mean time Mendoza with his gallies had passed the promontorie of Apollo now called the cape of Gallineus, and in token of honour saluting the Emperour after the manner at sea, with all his great ordnance, gaue him knowledge that the Spanish fleet was not far behind. In this fleet was aboue a hundred tal ships of Biscay and the low countries, and of other smaller vessels a far greater number. In these ships, besides the footmen, was embarked a great number of braue horsemen out of all parts of Spaine: for many noble Gentlemen had voluntarily of their owne charge gallantly furnished themselues with braue armour and couragious horses, to serue their Prince and countrey against the Infidels. Ouer these choice men commanded Ferdinand of Toledo, Duke of Alba, for his approued valor then accounted a famous captaine. These ships going altogether with sailes, were not yet able to double the cape as did Mendoza with his gallies, for now it was a dead calme: howbeit the billow of the sea went yet high, by reason of the rage of the late tempest, & did so beat against the plain shore, that it was not possible to land the souldiers, but that they must needs be washed vp to the middle: which thing the Emperor thought it not good to put them vnto, and so to oppose them sea sick and thorow wet against the sudden & desperat assaults of their fierce enemies. He also staied for the comming of the Spanish ships for two causes: first, that hee might with his vnited power more strongly assault the citie, and terrifie the enemie: then, to communicat the whole glory of the action with the Spaniards, at whose request and forwardnesse & greatest charge he had vndertaken that war. Which litel delay of two days, although it was grounded vpon good reason, did not only disturbe a[illegible]affured victorie, but to the notable hurt of the whole armie, opened a way to all the calamities which after ward insued.

Delay in great actions hurtful.

In the meane while the Emperor sent a conuenient messenger to Asanagas, otherwise and more truely called Assan-Aga, or Assan the eunuch; who with a little flag of truce in his hand making signe of a parley, and answered by the Moores with like, as their manner is, went on shore, and was of them courteously receiued and brought to Assan. This Assan was an eunuch, borne in Sardinia, brought vp from his youth in the Mahometan superstition by Barbarussa, a man both politicke and valiant, and by him left for the k[illegible]ping of his kingdome of Algiers in his a[illegible]ence with Solyman. This messenger brough[illegible] his presence, & required him forth-

A messenger to Assan Aga gouernour of Algiers for Barbarussa.

A city (first surprised by force & trechery by Horruccius, & afterwards to the destruction of mankind, fortified by Hariadenus Barbarussa his brother) to Charles the mightie emperor, come in person himselfe to be reuenged on those horrible pyrats: which if he would do, it should be lawfull for the Turks to depart whether they would, & for the naturall Moores to abide stil, with their goods and religion wholly reserued vnto them vntouched, as in former time: and for himselfe, he should receiue of the Emperor great rewards both in time of peace & wars, so that he would remember himselfe, that he was borne in Sardinia, & was once a Christian; and accept of the fairest occasion which could possibly be offered for him to returne againe to the worshipping of the true God, and to injoy the fauor and bountie of the most mightie Emperor, and withall to reuenge himselfe of the cruell tyrant Barbarussa, for the vnnaturall villany
B done vnto his person. But if he would needs dally on the time, & make proofe of the strength of so great preparation, he should vndoubtedly, with the rest of his followers, receiue the same reward of his obstinacie, which they had to the example of others, receiued at Tunes. Wherunto the vngracious eunuch answered, That he thought him altogether mad, that would follow his enemies counsel, & with a grinning countenance askt him, Vpon what hope the Emperour trusted to be able to win the citie? the messenger pointing with his finger directly to the fleet told him, That which you see, with his great artillerie, and valour of his souldiers, both horse and foot: whereat the eunuch scornfully laughing, replied, And we with like force and valor will defend this city, & make this place, alreadie famous for your ouerthrows here
C twice, now the third time, of all others most famous by the Emperors discomfiture. It is reported, That there was in Algiers an old witch, famous for her predictions, who had (as it was said) foretold the shipwracks & misery of Didaco Verra and Hugo Moncada to them of Algiers, & also prefixed a time when as the Christian emperor aduenturing to besiege that city, should there receiue great losse both by sea & land. The fame of which blind propheeie seruing fitly to confirm the hope of good successe in the minds of the vulgar multitude, Assan so feed and augmented (although he himselfe being a craftie wise fellow, beleeued no such vanitie) that he did therewith not onely encourage his owne souldiors, but also strucke a terrour into the minds of the weaker sort of his enemies, seeing themselues cast vpon so dangerous a coast vpon the approch of Winter. There was in garrison in the citie but 800 Turks, & most of them
D horsmen, but such, as whose valor & resolution far exceeded their number. For Assan had lost many of his best men, some in fight against Mendoza; & other some at sea, slain or taken by Auria in Corsica; & in other places by the Rhodian, Neapolitan, & Sicilian gallies; but many more were by his leaue gon to aid the Moors against the Portingals: the other multitude did scarce make vp the number of 5000; which were partly naturall Moores born in that country, and partly such as were born in Granado; to whom were ioined many fugitiues out of the Ilands of Maiorca & Minorca, who in former time hauing entred into rebellion, & fearing condigne punishment, were fled to Algiers, and there reuolted to the Mahometan superstition. But the E captains of the wild Numidians made vp a great number both of horse and foot, which lying straggling without the citie in the open fields, should night & day vex and molest the Christians. This brutish people, naturally enemies vnto the Christians, had Assan with rewards and hope of a rich spoile, allured out of the countries thereabout to aid him: neither was it lawful for any man to carrie his wife or children out of the city, into places of more safety farther off, or to shew any small token of feare, pain of death being by the imperious eunuch proposed to whosoeuer should but look heauily for feare of danger, or speake a word sauouring of cowardise. The Emperour by Auria making choice of a most conuenient place for landing his men, layd his gallies so close vnto his tall ships, that his armed souldiers might with ease come out of the high built ships into them, & so out of them into the long boats, to be forthwith set on shore. And such was the speedie diligence of them that had the charge of that matter, and the plentie of boats stil readie to receiue the soldiers as fast as they could come out of the gallies, F that the footmen were in a very short time all landed. The emperor hauing a little rested and refreshed his soldiers, diuided his armie into three equal battailes, which was in number about twentie thousand footmen, besides horsmen, & others, who of their owne voluntarie wil then followed the emperors fortune. Vnto euery battaile he appointed 3 field peeces, to terrifie the Numidian horsemen, which were stil pricking vp & downe about them, readie to charge if they could take them at any aduantage. And so setting forward a few furlongs, encamped in a strong and conuenient place, neere vnto the citie, betweene two deepe ditches, which the water falling from the mountaines had naturally worne so deep, that neither horseman nor footman could well passe ouer, but by bridge: and fast by vpon the left hand was a hill, from the top whereof it seemed the citie might with great ordnance well be battered.

The description of Algiers.

The citie of Algiers, sometime the royall seat of the great King Iuba, called of the Romans Iulia Cæsarea, is in forme of a triangle, scituat fast by the sea towards the North, hauing a hauen, but neither great, neither safe from the North wind. The houses farther off from the sea, stand in seemly order vpon the rising of a steep hill, as it were vpon degrees; in such sort, that the windows of one row stil ouerlooks the tops of the next beneath it, into the sea, most beautifull to behold. The Emperour hauing diuided his campe into three parts, euery nation by themselues, lying on the [illegible] side of the towne, was in great hope to win it; and th[illegible]er, for that whilst he assaulted it on that side, his ships and gallies from the North side, mig[illegible]me of the assault with their great ordnance beat the enemy all alongst the wall: which st[illegible]ing higher and higher according to the rising of the steep hill, could not conueniently be defended with one bulwarke, as we see it may in plaine ground. Neerest vnto the rising of the hils,

The Numidians skirmish with the Spaniards lay the Spaniards: in the midst, the Germans with the Emperor; and in the plaine neerest to the sea, the Italians. In the mean time whilst the great ordnance was landing, & the horses vnshipping, the Numidians with a hideous outcry shew'd themselues vpon the tops of the mountains aboue the Spaniards, and from thence easily gauled them with their darts and shot: for they nimbly running too & fro in the known paths of the rough mountains, would suddenly and fiercely assaile them, but after the manner of their nation skirmishing a far off, rather than neere at hand. In which maner of light skirmishes, all the day was spent vntil night, with small danger but much trouble to the Spaniards. And when night was come, these wild people, one companie still succeeding another in the place they had before taken, neuer left shooting; for whersoeuer they saw any fire in the Spanish camp, thither came arrows, darts, and stones flying as thicke as haile: for remedy whereof, the Spaniards were glad to put out their fires, and with silence to expect the day, that they might come neerer vnto them. Wherefore as soone as the Sun was vp, the Spaniards by the persuasion of Aluares Sandes, master of the camp, valiantly climing vp the high mountaines, repulsed and put to flight the Numidians, and tooke the top of the hils, and there lay as it were incamped in the poore sheepheards cottages. But the same day such a multitude of the wild people was flockt about them, that they were compassed in round, and glad to fight on euery side in a ring. Yet this fiercenes of this barbarous people, was by the valour of the Sicilian companies quickly represt, whose pikemen glistering in their bright armour, made small account of the Numidians arrowes and darts, but orderly stepping forwards with their pikes, & the harquebusiers close by their sides, easily repulsed their naked enemies. The Numidian footmen are for most part youths halfe naked, with long haire not vnlike the Irish, vsing no other weapons but darts: they fight mingled with their horsemen, trusting the one to the other, and are of a wonderfull swiftnesse and agilitie of bodie. Their horsmen vse long speares, armed at both ends, which they with a maruellous dexteritie vse, to the indangering of their enemy pursuing them: they vse also long and light targuets made of leather, wherwith they so cunningly defend themselues & their horses, both in their charge & retrait, that for a small trifle, in respect of the danger, they will giue a man leaue to cast seuen darts at one of them, which they wil all most surely auoid, either with the speare, or receiue them without harm in their targuet. In the mean time, whilst this wild people thus skirmished al the day, at night a sudde mischance ouerthrew al the emperors hope: for as he stood beholding the vnshipping of his great ordnance, his horses, victual, & other necessaries of the army, a storm of wind & rain began about six a clock in the afternoon, holding on all the night without intermission, with such rage, as if heauen & earth should haue gon together: wherwith the whole army at land was wonderfully troubled, & a great part of the fleet at sea by force of tempest driuen aground perished. That night 3 companies of the Italians, by the appointment of their generall, lay without the trenches against the sudden assault of so vncertain an enemy, who when they had all the night endured the vehement rain and extreame cold, were so ouercome with the extremity of the weather, that neither was their minds able to relieue their weake bodies, neither their feeble bodies their daunted minds: for they could neither neither conueniently stand nor lie downe, all the ground being so mirie, that at euery step they sunke vp to the calfe of the legge. Vpon these starued companies, the Turkish horsemen and Moores footmen, who diligently obserued the watch of the Christians, perceiuing their disorder, suddenly sallied out in the dawning of the day, and so fiercely charged them, that their match and pouder being now so wet that they could not vse their pieces, that they all fled except a few pikemen, who made a stand, and were all quickly slaine by the Turks: who so desperatly pursued the rest in chase, that they followed them ouer the trench into the campe. This alarme being heard, Camillus Columna the Italian Generall came presently thither, being sent by the Emperor, who with certaine companies issued out ouer the bridge against the enemie: who now in shew discouraged with the comming out of this new supplie, did indeed, or at least-wise made as if they did disorderly retire for feare. At which time Ferdinand Gonzaga, viceroy of Sicilia, a man of greatest account in the army next vnto the Emperour, comming in also, and angry with them which had before fled; perswading them as valiant men, to recompence their shamefull flight with a fresh charge, by driuing the enemie home to his owne doore: which thing Columna said could not be done without great perill: but Gonzaga being a man of a noble courage, desired to haue the disgrace which the Italians had receiued, salued some way, although it were with neuer so great danger; thinking also that it might happily fal out, that the enemy being put to flight, and hastily pursued, they might together with them enter the city, without danger of the artillerie. So without farther delay, the rest of the Italian companies were led forth of their trenches with great cheerfulnes by Augustine Spinola, who so valiantly charged the enemies, that they put them to flight, and pursued them so hard, that they came with them to the very gates of the city: where many shut out for feare of letting in the Italians together with them, leaped by known waies, some to another gate, & some into the mountains. But then these barbarous people, with darts and shot from the wals, began to ouerwhelm the Italians which were vnaduisedly come within their danger, & with terrible outcries to terrifie them, & they which before were fled without the wals, returned again to fight. They also, which had shut the gate, sallied out again, & hardly charged the Italians, who already galled with shot from the wals, & rent in sunder with the great ordnance, fled most disorderly; for why, they were but raw soldiers taken vp in hast, little or nothing acquainted with the wars. At which time Assan also sallying out, who was easily knowne by his countenance & rich attire, pursued the chase with his troups of Turks & Moores footmen. Only certain knights of the Rhodes fought valiantly, & retired orderly: and Spinola with some other gentlemen making a stand at a little woodden bridge, somewhat staid the enemy & saued the liues of many. So the Italians which first charged most valiantly, being in the flight become hindermost, the enemie striking them downe as they fled, couered the fields with their dead bodies by the space of halfe a mile, especially they which fled towards the sea: for there they were circumuented & slain by the mercilesse Numidians, who beholding the shipwreck, were come down to the sea side for prey. But the formost companies of the Italians which first fled into the campe, fled in so much hast & so great feare, that none of the leaders in so great and sudden a perplexity, remembred either the common safety, or performed the dutie of an aduised captaine; so that all seemed at once lost both by sea and land. Only the Emperor, armed with an inuincible courage against all the chances of fortune, & not to be dismaid with any mishap, was both vnto himselfe & others that day the greatest captaine; for when all was almost lost, he in good time staied the matter by comming on with the squadron of Germans, whereof he sent before three ensigns to stay the flight, & with them as a sure & fresh supply to guard his campe beyond the bridge which was ouer the ditch, seruing his armie for a trench as we haue before said. But such a feare had possessed the minds of the flying Italians, and such was the fierce pursuit of the enemy, that those Germans (not before wont to turne their backs) as if they had bin afraid of the Turkes white caps, or not able to abide their sight, or to hold vp weapon against them, by and by turned their backs, and shamefully fled for companie with the Italians. Then the Emperor galloping forth with his horse, and his sword in his hand drawn, reprouing them of cowardise that fled, set forward with the German squadron, and with a stout & manly courage spake to them these few words in their owne language: When will you (fellow souldiers) shew your faces to your proud enemies; if now when you should fight for the honor of the Christian name, for the glory of the German nation, for the safegard of your owne liues, in the presence of your Emperor, you feare feare a few disordred and naked Barbarians? Immediatly when he had thus said, the Germanes touched with shame, and disdaining that it should be thought they acceded any exhortation to performe the parts of valiant souldiers, issued out against the enemy: who moued with their comming, and seeing the Italian battell againe restored by the valor and trauell of certain valiant and expert captains, stood still a while and began to retyre; whether it were because they feared the great Artillery and assault of the Germanes, or that they thought they had done enough for that sally: when as for the full accomplishment of the victory they saw the Christian fleet ouercome with a most horrible tempest, miserably to perish before their faces; & many of their men, especially the Moores, hasted to the sea side in hope of a more certaine prey, whereas was no enemy to be feared. For the blustring windes blowing from diuers quarters, as if they had conspired to raise a most horrible tempest, had made such a wrought sea, & the billows went so high, that the ships by the violence of the weather, and rage of the sea, put from their anchors, fel foule one of another, & were so lost; or els driuen vpon [illegible] were there beaten in pieces in the sight of the army: so that all the sea coast Westward [illegible] giers to Cercello, lay full of dead men & horses, and the ribs of broken ships. The Numidians beholding this miserable wrecke, came down by great companies fro the mountaines, & without mercy slew all that came aliue to land. In the space of a few houres was lost about 140 ships, and all the smal boats & caruels, which were in number many. Some of the gallies, when they had from midnight to the next day at noone, by the painfull labour of the mariners, and skilfulnes of the masters, rid it out; being no longer able to endure the rage of the tempest, & fearing to be caten vp with the sea, with sailes and oares ran a ground: but the souldiers and mariners swimming to land in hope to saue their liues, & thinking that the greatest danger had bin now past, were by the Numidian horsmen which ran vp and downe the sea side, slaine. There might a man haue seene free-men of all sorts, with teares commending their liues and liberty to their own gally-slaues, that by the speech & intreaty of them, which by the sudden change of fortune had but euen now shaken off their yrons, & with merry hearts swam out to their liberty, they might be saued from the cruelty of the fierce Numidians. It was a most grieuous and wofull sight for diuers hard extremities, when as euery man according to the disposition of his mind and skill in swimming, standing doubtfull in most assured death, which to receiue or refuse, was by fatall destiny drawne to his end, and either drowned in the sea, or thrust thorow with the enemies lance: yet most made choice to abide the danger of the sea, & to expect the euent of the tempest, rather than to hasten their end by the enemies merciless hand. By that means it came to passe, that that barbarous cruelty of the enemy (as a thing most feared of the mariners & souldiers) saued many gallies, which by the appointment of the fearefull mariners and passengers should otherwise haue bin run on ground. But after that, a notable gally wherein Iannettin Auria went, was seene to come neere vnto the shore, and to be driuen vpon the sands by force of weather and the beating of other gallies. The Emperor not enduring to see so valiant a yong gentleman, captaine of many gallies, slaine without helpe by the Moores in the sight of Auria his vnkle; sent by and by one of his captaines called Antonius of Aragon, with three bands of Italians to the sea side: by whose comming the Moores were put to flight, and he with the rest in the gally saued; but so, that the sauing of him was the losse of diuers other gallies. For many deliuered of the feare of the Numidians, and trusting to the rescue of the souldiers came downe to the sea side, desiring to saue themselues from the rage of the sea, ran their gallies on ground; and had not some bold captains (grieued to see so great a losse) ran vp and downe the banks with their drawne swords in their hands, and by threatening death vnto the gally-slaues and mariners staied their rowing, most part of the gallies had by the example of the others perished. Auria, not so angry at himselfe as at the Emperor (who, contrarie to the obseruation of skilfull seamen, could not be dissuaded from taking in hand that great expedition in so suspitious a time of the yere) with an inuincible courage striue against the violence of the tempest, and rage of the sea: insomuch, that being requested by some of his friends to saue himselfe, whatsoeuer became of the gallie; he was so angry thereat, that he commanded them to be bestowed vnder hatches. Foure Gallies also of Virginius Vrsinus Earle of Anguillaria, and as many of the Rhodians, after his example rid it out, the reputation of their honour exceeding the feare of death. Certaine gallies also of Sicilia, Naples, and Spaine, happily endured all the rage of the tempest: yet was there fifteene great gallies cast away; with the

the losse wherof, besides the losse of so many ships, the tempest still enduring, so great sorrow and desperation in the wofull expectation of the wrecke of all, possessed the whole army, that not only the yong souldiers regarding only their owne liues, but euen the most valiant captains carefull of the common estate, were vtterly discouraged: for neuer was army in any memorie ouerwhelmed with a greater concourse of calamities, when as all their victuals being lost in three daies, nothing was left to relieue them withall, and they wanted tents wherin to shroud and rest the souldiers spent with labor, hunger, cold, and wounds, in such perpetuall raine and so dirty a country. In which so great miseries a wonderfull care heauier than the former fear exceedingly troubled the minds of all men, to think vpon that horrid wreck; when as hauing lost so many ships, and they p[illegible] men landed in Affrick, were in doubt how euer to returne againe into their native countr[illegible] the notable courage of the Emperor still kept the distressed men in hope, which neuer[illegible] neither forsaketh wretched men in the midst of their calamities: for he with a couragious heart and cheerfull countenance performed all the parts of a prouident and curteous Generall. For when he had againe made sure his campe against the assaults of the Barbarians, he commanded the wearied captaines, especially the duke of Alba (wonderfully wearied in the late skirmish, and dung wet) to spare themselues and take their rest: he comforted the wounded men, & caused thē to be caried & cherished in the tents which by chance yet stood (for the tempestuous wind had almost ouerthrowne them all) and so not sparing himself for any pains, being in his armor & thorow wet, won the hearts of all his soldiers the more. In this conflict he lost about 3000 men, amongst whom was fiue of his forward captains, & three Knights of the Rhodes: but many moe were hurt. The greatest losse was thought to be in losse of the ships and of the mariners, which was also increased by the losse of a wonderfull deale of great ordnance, reckoned so much the greater, for that it would come into the hands of the Moores, to the common harme of the Christians, so soone as the sea would giue them leaue to diue for it. Shortly after, Auria (as he was to foresee a tempest, a wonderfull obseruer of the sea, of the heauens, & of the clouds) mistrusting that place, departed with the remainder of the fleet to the cape called Metafusium, because it was a place of safer riding for his gallies, and better for the taking in of the souldiers: aduising the Emperor to march thither by land. Which his counsell the Emperor liking well of, to relieue the hunger of his souldiers, commanded first all the draught horses which were first vnshipped for the drawing of the great ordnance, and after them the horses for seruice, to be killed, and diuided for meat among the souldiers. As for wood to make fire of, they had plentie of the planks and ribs of the broken ships, fortune as it were with that one poore benefit recompensing so many calamities. The next day the emperor departed from Algiers, with his army diuided into three battels, the sicke & wounded men being receiued into the middle: and when he had marched seuen miles (the enemies horsmen still houering about him) he came to a heady brooke which the Moores call Alcaraz: which was growne so high with the abundant raine and the checke of the winde and of the sea, that being but a shallow thing before, it was not now to be passed ouer by a good horseman. Wherefore the Emperour of necessity there incamped, in such sort, that lying with his armie in forme of a triangle, two sides of his army was defended with the sea and the brooke, and the other with a strong guard of armed men, for he thought it not good to depart from the sea, a sure defence for his army on the left hand, to seeke a foord farther of. Many aduenturing to swim ouer, were by the violence of the streame carried away and drowned. Wherefore the Emperour caused a bridge to be made ouer it, of the masts & saile yards of the brokē ships, which were by chance there taken vp, and so passed ouer the Italians and Germans. The Spaniards marching higher vp the brooke, found a foord whereby they passed ouer. After which time the Turks pursued them no further, being called backe again by Assan their gouernor: as for the Moores and Numidians which still followed at hand alwaies ready to skirmish, they were easily repulsed by the harquebusiers and field pieces appointed to euery nation: but vpon such sicke & wounded men as were not able to keepe way with the army, they exercised all manner of cruelty: for there was none which in that small hope, possessed with feare of their own safetie, was greatly moued with the compassion of their fellows miserie. The next day passing ouer another little riuer, which the souldiers waded ouer vp to the brests, they came in three daies march to the rode where the fleet lay, and incamped in the ruines of the old city Tipasa neere vnto the sea side, which serued them in stead of a fortresse against the Barbarians. The sea was now calme, the oy the Spaniards, and bitterly enueied againſt the ambition of the Emperor, who as he ſaid aſpired to the whole monarchy of Italy, not by true vertue and valor, but by meere craft & deceit, incroching ſtill vpon the liberties of the free States, and by little & little impoſing vpon them the yoke of bondage: In confirmation wherof he produced many examples, to them well known, requeſting them as antient friends and confederats of the French, to ioine their Forces with the Kings; in which doing, they ſhould aſſure themſelues of ſuch reward of the vndoubted victory, as they could not deſire greater. Wheras if they ſhould refuſe ſo to do, and would rather ſit ſtil & look on as neuters, they ſhould vndoubtedly, fortune hauing decided the quarrell, grieuouſly offend both, and might worthily expect of the vanquiſhed, hatred; and of the conqueror, iniurie. Beſides that, in taking vp of armes they ſhould highly gratifie Solyman, who prouoked with late iniuries, had determined with a puiſſant army to inuade Hungary, and at the ſame time to ſend Barbaruſſa with a great fleet againſt the Spaniards their common enemies: for the imparting of which his deſignes he would ſhortly ſend vnto them Iunusbeius his Embaſſadour: As for the euent of the war they needed not to doubt, when as they of themſelues were ſtrong enough quickely to thruſt the Emperor out of the duchy of Millan, being generally hated of the people, feeding his ſoldiers with the ſpoile of the country, and on euerie ſide beſet both by ſea and land by two of the greateſt Monarchs of the world. Whereunto the Senat delaying the time for certain daies, that Iunusbeius might in the mean time come thither, gravely anſwered, That the amitie they held with king Francis, ought to be vnto them an ornament, but no burthen: the like alſo they held with the Emperor, whom they would in no caſe ſeeme to caſt off, although they had bin by him ouerraught: Wherefore the Senators and all the citiſens in generall were of opinion, to preſerue their peace, as they which in the hard times of warre had endured great extremities, which would hardly be recouered with long peace: But if they did once ſee the enſignes diſplaied, and the wars begun, they would then take further aduice, Whether it were good for them to thruſt themſelues into thoſe warres or not, when as they were in league and friendſhip with three of the greateſt princes of the world. In the meane time Iunusbeius arriued at Venice, and was there honorably receiued. He requeſted, That the league before made at Conſtantinople by Badoerius their Embaſſador, might by the authority of the Senat be confirmed: and ſo commended the French kings cauſe to the Senat, that he requeſted no more, but that vnto that amity which they already held with the French, they would ioine further curteſies, the rather for that Solyman had accounted him for his brother, and had vndertaken to aid him againſt Charles king of Spain: but as to ioin in league with him, or in his quarrell to take vp armes, he requeſted nothing. Which was quite beſide the expectation of Polinus and Pellicerius, who by vrging of the matter, and by telling of al, had thought eaſily to haue perſuaded the Senat to haue granted what they requeſted, and therfore thought the Turk (who had ſo coldly ſpoken in the cauſe) to be ſome way corrupted. But as it afterward appeared, there was ſuch equitie & modeſtie in Solymans letters (who was otherwiſe of a proud and inſolent nature) that he would not as then exact any thing of them, which ſhould not ſtand with the good of their eſtate. Wherefore Polinus hauing in vaine ſtaied certaine dayes at Venice; was in one of their publique gall( than euer he dreamed of. For the great Baſſaes ſaid, There could no fleet be ſet out that yeare, by reaſon that he was come too late to ſue for ſuch a matter, the Spring of the yeare being now paſt, of all other times moſt fit for to take in hand ſo long a voyage, So that Polinus was aboue meaſure vexed with care and griefe, that he had ſo euill ſped, and was come ſo out of ſeaſon both to Venice & Conſtantinople. Dixius alſo, one of the maſters of the Rhodian gallies, was come to Conſtantinople, to carrie newes into France of the comming of the Turks fleet: who told Polinus, That the kings ſons were with ſtrong power far entred into the Low-countries, and had already inuaded Spaine, expecting nothing more than the comming of the Turks gallies. Wherefore Polinus (as it eaſily chanceth to men deceiued by truſt repoſed in any other mens promiſes, and bewailing the euill ſucceſſe of their vaine trauel) wonderfully tormented himſelfe, curſed the froward and vnconſtant manners of the Baſſaes, called vpon the faith of Solyman; and beſought the great Baſſaes one by one, that they would not contrarie to their promiſe forſake the King, who vpon the hope of the comming of the Turks fleet, had now inuaded both the Low-countries & the kingdome of Spaine: foraſmuch as by that delay, which was vnto them neither honourable nor profitable, was (as he ſaid) betraied the maieſtie of his King, and a moſt aſſured victorie now as good ( gotten, quite marred. In which his obteſtations, he was ſo importunat and tedious, that he became vnto thoſe proud Baſſaes rather loth ſome than gracious; inſomuch that to end his ſute, they thought it beſt ſharply to take him vp, & for that time to ſhake him off. And therefore ſending for him and the other French gentlemen which followed him, to the court, the great Baſſaes then ſitting in counſell, & Barbaruſſa with them for the honour of his place; as ſoone as they were come into the counſell chamber, Solyman Baſſa the Eunuch, turning himſelfe about, ſpake vnto them in this ſort.

The ſharpe oration of Solyman the eunuch Baſſa to Polinus the French embaſſadour.

Frenchmen (ſaid he) this place for diſpatch of moſt waighties affaires, appointed by the graue iudgement of our moſt mightie Emperour to vs his faithfull ſeruants, doth (as it beſt beſeemeth) receiue vs daily comming vnto it, void of loue and hatred: and withall doth notably put vs in remembrance, to ſpeake our minds freely. Neither would I, that this frankneſſe of ſpeech (the meſſenger of truth, and therefore the faithfull keeper of frienaſhip) ſhould be vnto your eares vnpleaſing or troubleſome: for ſithence your king hath been called the friend and fellow of the Othoman name, we may not now either forget the duties of loue, or loath your friendſhip: ſeeing that our Emperour doth marueilouſly affect you, and is not a little deſirous to ſtrengthen you with his power, and by ouercomming your enemies to increaſe your power and honour. But in your demaunds is no equitie, no modeſtie, ſo that we tearme you vnmodeſteſt and importunat: and others which fauour you not ſo well, call you plainely by your right names, vnreaſonable and ſhameleſſe men; who as too too forgetfull of your duties, doe moſt fondly trouble the lawes of amitie and friendſhip. For leagues are confirmed by like profit, by making euen the charge and mutuall dangers: but if neglecting your friends kindneſſe and courteſie, you will make no requitall, they will quickely grow wearie of you. So happeneth it vnto you Frenchmen, who euer forgetfull and negligent in our dangers, but in your owne alwayes mindfull and diligent, haue ſhewed your ſelues friends vnto vs when need was, not in deeds and certaine aid, but onely in bare letters, and embaſſages. Tell mee I pray you where euer you ſhewed any ſigne or token of your good will or aid? whereby the minds of our enemies might at the leaſt wiſe haue but beene kept in ſuſpence of ſome doubtfull feare, when as Charles with all the power of the Weſt came into Hungarie: And Corone and Patras were in the meane time ſhaken in Græce with the enemies fleet; and laſt of all Turnes taken with ſo great a fleet? But all this we pardon you: yet this it is which is hardly to be endured, that you did not ſo much as once grieue at our ſo great iniuries, as you ought to haue done; but ſent your gratulatorie Embaſſadours vnto the bloudie common enemie; who had but euen then ſlaine ſo many of our people. At length our Emperour came to Aulona to your great profit, about to paſſe ouer into Italie: but neither then in the arrinall of our fleet appeared the good wills of the Apulians towards you, which were of you ſo vainely promiſed, neither did you ſo much as once mooue to inuade the vpper part of Italie; ſo neither ſeruing our turne, nor well fitting your owne, you haue alwaies loſt the occaſion of the good ſucceſſe of your affaires. But neither then, neither at any time afterwards, needed wee your counſell or vnited forces: for the Venetians to their paine felt both our forces and our faith: as for the reſt, warre, the notable reuenger of our wrongs, moſt happily brought to paſſe, at ſuch time as you of your owne voluntaris made peace with the common enemie, to inuade vs; and did as vnkindly as impudently as it were blow wind in his ſailes. But we, without your helpe, haue notably repreſſed preſſed ſo great aſſaults of our enemies: when as this ſame Hariaden Barbaruſſa put to flight the fleet at Ambracia, and happily ſlew the Spaniſh pirats of Caſtrum, and hauing again recouered our cities, tooke alſo from them ſome of theirs: wherefore we are bound vnto you for no deſert, but we hither farget theſe vnkindneſſes, than to faile you whom we haue once receiued into our friendſhip wee performe our fidelitie in deeds: but it is his part to regard the time, to way the danger, to watch occaſion; which will not raſhly commit his actions to the hazard of Fortune. You are come later than you ſhould haue done for the ſetting forth of our fleet: for Sommer now well ſpent followeth the peſtilent time of Autumne, ſo that mariners cannot in conuenient time bee taken to ſafely thruſt into the gallies: for in long ſayling, who would not thinke, but that ſuch a companie of ſailers vſually ſtay at the change of an vnacquainted ayre, would be in danger of their liues? We ſhould not feare ſhipwracke in their returne, when as this ſame Hariaden ſo great a Maſter at ſea, driuen vpon the Acroceraunian rockes in the moneth of Auguſt, loſt ſo many gallies? A fleet would be rigged in Winter, furniſhed and ſet forward in the Spring, in Sommer is ſafe ſailing and making warre. Which if it be ſo done, we will for the common wealth's ſake perſuade the Emperour: for the nauie once loſt, cannot by the ſudden be againe reſtored for much gold, whereof the Othoman Emperour wanteth no ſtore, heaped vp by many ages. If thou be wiſe take theſe things in good part as friendly ſpoken: but whether the Emperour will pardon thy boldneſſe or not, let himſelfe conſider; truly we haue ſatisfied both him and our ſelues in ſpeaking to thee ſo plainly.

Theſe things ſeuerely ſpoken by the Eunuch Baſſa, did ſo much the more trouble Polinus, for that they ſeemed to haue bin ſent from the mouth of Solyman himſelfe, who was thought to haue heard all that was ſaid. For behind the Baſſaes as they ſat in Counſell, was a window with a braſen grate, and a curten drawne before it, that the Emperour when he pleaſed, might vnperceiued heare the complaints and ſutes of all nations, and note the manners of his great counſellors; whoſe care for the adminiſtration of juſtice was ſo much the greater, for feare of his preſence. Yet did not Polinius for his repulſe, deteſting the double dealing of the Baſſaes, ſo giue ouer his ſute; but winning by gifts the fauour of the Capiaga or chiefe porter, a man euer of great authoritie in the Turks court, laboured by him to be brought to the ſpeech of Solyman himſelfe: who faithfully performed what he had vndertaken. So the French Embaſſadour brought by him into the ſecreteſt place of the court, which few Chriſtians had euer bin, and ſo vnto the preſence of Solyman, recounted vnto him how all matters had before paſſed, and moſt earneſtly beſought him not to faile the kings expectation of the fleet he had before promiſed, who at that preſent was inuading his enemies in three places. Whereunto Solyman courteouſly and expreſſely anſwered, That the opportunitie of ſending out of his fleet was paſt; not by his will, which was alwaies immutable and firme, but by his late comming, & the time of the yeare halfe ſpent: but promiſed the next Spring without doubt to ſend vnto the king his friend and brother, twiſe ſo great a fleet as he had deſired againſt Charles their enemy. With which anſwer, the embaſſadour diſpatched away Dixius into France, vpon whoſe arriuall, king Francis called backe againe Henrie his eldeſt ſonne with his army, from the ſiege of Perpenna in Spaine.

Solymans anſwer to Polinus

The Princes and States of Germanie, at the requeſt of king Ferdinand and the nobilitie of Hungarie, about this time decreed with one conſent, to take vp arms againſt the Turks, for the recouering againe of Buda, and other the loſt parts of Hungary. For beſides the diſhonor done to their nation at Exek vnder the leading of Cazzianer, and againe at Buda vnder the leading of the Lo. Rogendorff; they wel ſaw, that if they did not ſpeedily relieue the Hungarians ouerwhelmed with the calamities of the Turkes forces, they ſhould in ſhort time be enforced to fight for their religion, children, wiues, and liues, againſt the ſame mighty enemy, at their own doores. For preuenting whereof, the Princes and free cities of Germanie, ſet out 30000 footmen, and 7000 horſemen: amongſt whom was Mauritius, afterwards duke of Saxonie, then a young gentleman about twentie yeares old. But the Generall of theſe German forces, was Ioachimus Marqueſſe of Brandenburg, a man more for the honour of his houſe than the valour of himſelfe preferred to that place: yet ſo, that vnto him was ioyned eight others, men of great yeares and experience, by whoſe counſell he was to be directed. When they were come to Vienna, king Ferdinands power met them: where, beſide ſixteene were taken vp in Auſtria, Huganot Gouernour of Stiria came in with ten thouſand horſemen. Vnto theſe then oble men of Hun-

Hungary, Gaſper Seredius, Andreas Bathor, & Petrus Perenus; a man of the greateſt authoritie, power and experience, amongſt the Hungarians, ioyned themſelues, with fifteene thouſand horſemen; whither alſo Paulus the third of that name then Biſhop of Rome, ſent three thouſand choſen footmen out of Italie, conducted to Vienna by Alexander Vitellius, a moſt famous captain. The Marqueſſe with this great armie marched from Vienna alongſt the riuer Danubius, but ſo ſoftly, that the Hungarian and Italian captaines ſaid plainely, That the beſt part of the Sommer and fitteſt time for warre, was paſſed ouer in loitering & dallying out the time to no purpoſe: eſpecially Iacobus Medices, who had long before perſuaded the king, to be ready to ſet forward his forces with the firſt of the Spring, before the Turks could either augment their garriſons, or put in any new forces; for that by ſuch reſolute and ſpeedie inuaſion, it was like enough he might recouer both Peſth and Buda. Which politique and wholeſome counſell ſo well giuen, king Ferdinand too much crediting the great men of his court (liking nothing but [illegible] proceeded of themſelues) reiected, expecting the full aſſembly of all his forces, before ſetting forth of his armie. At length the Marqueſſe was by ſoft marches come to Strigonium (king Ferdinand himſelfe ſtaying behind at Vienna) where it was commonly reported, That Solyman fearing to loſe Buda, was either in perſon himſelfe comming into Hungarie, or elſe ſending downe the Generall of his European horſemen, who might neuer ſet foot forward to war, without 60000 horſemen. Which newes ſo troubled the Germans, that they made no great haſt forward; doubting how they ſhould returne againe if they chanced not to get the victorie: beſide that, it was thought that the Marqueſſe neuer purpoſed to fight a battell, or indanger himſelfe or his armie for the king ſome of Hungarie, but onely to defend the bounds of Auſtria, and by ſhewing the ſtrength of Germanie, to terrifie if hee could the Turks, if they not contented with Hungarie, ſhould alſo prouoke the Germans. But after it was by certaine eſpialls from Samandria, knowne that all that report of the comming of the Turks great army was but vaine, and that there was ſcarce a thouſand Ianizaries and twice ſo many horſemen come to Buda, and that the Turks fleet was both for number and ſtrength far infe-riour to the Kings, they ſet forward again with more cheerefulneſſe, much incouraged by the forwardneſſe of the Hungarians, eſpecially of Perenus; aſſuring them, that if they would without delay march on, and ſpend no more time in vaine, they ſhould not finde at Buda any ſuch number of Turks as was worth the name of an armie: for that Solyman vſing but euery ſecond yeare to make war, did that yeare take his reſt, and was not like to vndertake any great expedition. For theſe reaſons all men being readie cheerefully to ſet forward, the Marqueſſe appointed to paſſe ouer Danubius: which this Perenus, Huganot, and Medices, all expert captains liked not of; wiſhing him rather to hold on his way directly ſtill on that ſide the riuer to Buda, the chiefe citie of the kingdome. But it was the mind of the Generall and all his counſellors, firſt to beſiege Peſth, which might be done with leſſe labour and danger, and there hauing made proofe of the enemies ſtrength and purpoſe, to come to the ſiege of Buda: for then would the ſouldiers with much more courage and cheerefulneſſe endure the ſiege of Buda, if they had by good fortune firſt beaten them out of Peſth: Which counſell was both beſt liked and followed, and the armie by two bridges with great and painefull labour made ouer Danubius (which was in that place diuided into two parts) tranſported. At the ſame time Medices an Italian captaine, Admirall of the kings fleet, came downe the riuer, and in deſpight of the Turkes tooke the Iſland of Saint Margaret, lying in the riuer a little aboue Buda, and by force repulſed the Turks fleet vnto the ſuburbs of the citie. The Marqueſſe to auoid the danger of the great ſhot from Buda, after he was paſſed the riuer, fetcht a great compaſſe about, and ſo came to the North ſide of Peſth; for on the South it was defended with the riuer Dunubius, running betwixt it and Buda; and on the Eaſt and Weſt the great ordnance on the one ſide from the Caſtle of Buda, and on the other from mount Saint Gerrard, did ſo ſcoure all alongſt the wals that no man could without moſt manifeſt danger there abide. For Buda ſtanding vpon the hill, and diuided from Peſth onely with the riuer, ſo ouerlooketh and commandeth all the plaine countrey about Peſth, that without perill no man can ſtirre on any ſide of the citie, but Northward towards Agria, couered by the Citie from the ſhot out of Buda. As the Marqueſſe was comming thither, hee was told by certaine fugitiues, That Balis Gouernour of Buda (who in that place ſucceeded Solyman the Hungarian renegate, lately before dead of the Plague) had in garriſon in Buda two thouſand horſemen: and that Phimes the Perſian Gouernour uernor of Bosna, was come vnto him with three thousand more: whereunto Amurathes had also ioyned another thousand which he brought out of Dalmatia: and that Segemenes was sent thither also with 1000 Ianizaries from Constantinople: as for the rest of the footmen, they were but wild country people, fitter for labor than for seruice in warres. They told also, that the enemies fleet consisted of 60 small pinnaces, ten gallies, and a few other boats: and that Solyman had commanded his captains in any case to defend Buda and Pesth to the last man, without regard of any other place. And had proposed vnto them valiant rewards; and to the cowardly, extreame punishment: charging them further, that if occasion they should in time send for Achomates the Generall of his Europeian horsemen, to Sophia to aid them. The Turks vpon the approch of the Christians, issued out at one of the gates of the citie, and skirmished with the Hungarians: but after they had sufficiently proued one anothers strength, and some few were on both sides slaine, they retired into the citie, and the Turkes to the campe. The next day after, Vitellius going out of the campe neere the companies, to chuse a place for planting the batterie, the Turkes at one instant sallying out at two gates of the city, gaue him a hot skirmish, where at the first, the fight was begun with like courage and force: but the Turks still sending forth new supplies both of horse and foot, first the Christian footmen, and after that the horsemen, not able longer to indure the force of the Ianizaries, were constrained disorderly to retire, hauing lost in that retreit foure of their captains and two ensignes; and had not Vitellius with one companie of horsemen serred together, valiantly repulsed the insolent Ianizaries, the losse had bin much greater. Vitellius exceedingly grieued with this losse, and perceiuing the manner of the enemies fight, encouraged his souldiers, purposing if he could to be fully reuenged: and aboue all others, requested Perenus to be readie to ioin with him as occasion should require. Vitellius lay incamped in the kings orchards, walled about as it were a mile, equally distant both from the great camp & from the city; out of these orchards he went with 12 companies vnder their ensignes, commanding the rest to stand still within the wals, in readinesse at all assaies: and so fetching a great compasse about, marched alongst the riuer side towards the city: neither did the proud enemie (brag of the former daies victorie) make any delay, but brauely sallied out at the East side of the city, & couragiously charged them. But Vitellius warned of his former harme, & seeing his enemies come on as he desired, couered his shot with his pikes, & standing close, receiued the enemies charge: his shot still playing vnder the pikes, oftentimes vpon their knees: many of the Turks were there laid on ground, whilest they desperately fought to haue broken the order of the Christians. In the mean time, when many of the Turks horsemen and Ianizaries comming out of the gates, & diuers others beholding the fight were come ouer the riuer from Buda, to be partakers of the victory, had filled the hithermost banke; Vitellius in good time, of purpose by little & litle retired, as if he had bin ouercharged: then began the enemy to giue a great shout, and more fiercely to assaile the Christians: their horsmen also clapt behind them, to haue there charged them. Which thing Perenus diligently noting, and that the Turks in following of Vitellius were drawne a great way from the gates; he suddenly with his light horsemen clapt in betwixt the city & the Turks at their backs, after whom followed also Mauritius (afterwards duke of Saxonie) with a strong troup of German horsmen, of purpose to haue shut them in for retiring backe again into the city. But then the Turks perceiuing the danger, & finding themselues shut in, stood as men more than halfe dismaied, bethinking themselues which way to take, & so began to retire. When Vitellius comming on couragiously with his pikemen and his harquebusiers diuided into two wings, charged them fiercely; and the Hungarian & German horsmen breaking in amongst them on the other side, made great slaughter of them, & stucke such a feare amongst the flying Turks, that many of them in running to the gate, thrust one another thorow with their pikes: diuers other were also by the horsemen driuen into the riuer and there drowned. That day Segemenes lost aboue an hundred of his Ianizaries, and foure hundred others. The chiefest commendation for this piece of seruice was giuen to Vitellius, who had so well and so quickly reuenged himselfe of the Turkes: and next him to Perenus; who as a skilfull captaine had so well awaited the time to entrap the enemie: Neither is Adamritius the young Saxon Prince vnworthie his due praise, who valiantly charging the Turks; and hauing his horse slaine vnder him, was in danger to haue beene there lost himselfe, had not Nicolas Ribische one of his followers, couered him with his owne bodie, vntill such such time as that he was rescued by others; Ribische himselfe presently dying of his wounds. This little victorie so encouraged the Germans, that the Marquesse commanded the great ordinance to be presently brought forth, & the batterie planted, which was at the first placed so far off, that it did little harme, although the wall were both old and thin, not aboue fiue foot thicke: and the ordinance laid either a little too low, or mounted too high, either shot short, or quite ouer the citie into Buda: which fault once perceiued, the batterie was remoued neerer, and a faire breach soone made in the wal, with the continuall beating of 40 great pieces of artillerie. Vitellius was the first that offered to assault the breach, so that the Germans would presently second him; which thing they all by holding vp of their hands promised couragiously, but cowardly about by and by to breake that promise: for oftentimes it chanceth, That they which before the danger are readiest to promise their helpe, are in the very danger it selfe of all others most slacke. The Hungarians also for their parts promised not to be behind. The silence of the enemie at the breach and in the citie, was wonderfull, so that many thought hee had bin fled backe ouer the riuer to Buda: for Segemenes captaine of the Ianizaries, an old beaten souldier, ordered all things with as little stir as was possible: he had receiued new supplies from Vlamas, and had cast a deepe countermure within the wall against the breach, & on the inner side of the same had made a strong barricado, with gabions and wine vessels filled with sand and earth: behind which stood the Ianizaries, & next vnto them the Turkish archers, and last of all the horsemen who had left their horses to serue on foot. The signall for the assault once giuen, foure Italian captaines ran desperatly with their companies by the ruines of the wall to the breach: but whilest they there set vp their ensignes, and wondring at the enemies fortification, were ready betwixt hope and feare to leape downe, they were suddenly ouerwhelmed with a shoure of arrowes and bullets. Yet Vitellius still incouraging them, brought them still on, who did what they might to haue entred: but the Germane footmen with their Generall stood still vnder the wals, looking on, as men nothing moued either with the hope of victorie or danger of their friends: and the Hungarians not so much as once looking vpon the enemy retired: two of the Italian captains, Rufus & Fiolla were there slain, and Carolus Vitellius his nephew, shot in the shoulder. The Turks with shot and stones still repulsed & beat downe the Italians, whereof the Germans also standing still, felt part, & were more gauled than a man would haue thought men could haue bin, that did nothing: for there they still stood for shame, lest if they should haue also first retired, they should haue incurred a second infamy as bad as the first: which thing Vitellius perceiuing, would in no case depart from the breach, but wished rather to lose his men by whole companies, than to leaue the least colour of excuse to the Germans, or that they should say they staied longest, of whom he with greater anger than griefe complained, that he was forsaken & cowardly betraid. In time of this assault one of the Turks was heard to speake aloud in the Italian tongue, Why do not you valiant Italians spare your selues, and giue place to those lasie Germans. We all wish to spare you, and to beat the drunkennesse out of their most cowardly heads, that they should no more hereafter prouoke vs. At length the Germans weary of their hot standing & nought doing, got them farther off, after whom the Italians forthwith retired: but so disorderly, to be quickly out of the danger of the enemies shot, that if the Turks had at the same time sallied out at all the gates, it was thought that the whole camp had bin greatly indangered. In this attempt rather than assault, seuen hundred Christians were slain outright, and many moe hurt, who died afterwards of their wounds.

All this while the Marquesse and Hugonot the great commaunders of the army, kept themselues so far from gunshot, that they were no where to be seene, vntill that Torniellus and Fortiscu, two valiant captains, finding them out, wished them for shame to shew themselues for the comforting of the army. A little before night they consulted with the other captains, whither they should forsake the siege, or continue it still: wherof most of the Germans best liked to be gone, as the safest way: though Vitellius and some others spake earnestly to the contrary. At which time a spie comming in, brought news that Achomates, Solymans lieutenant of the Europeian horsmen, had passed ouer the riuer Sauus at Belgrade, & was cõming to Dranus: whose comming either cunningly fained, or vainly beleeued, caused the Germanes to make a short conclusion, & to resolue flatly to return to Vienna, fearing that if they should longer continue the siege, they should be stayed against their wils by Achomates. Which thing made many of the old Germane souldiers to hang their heads for shame, & the Hungarians to curse both the Ger-enemie but him whom euery one had singled out for himselfe, as if it [illegible]n in a trium for exercise hand to hand. It hapned, that a notable captaine of the Turkes, [illegible]ed to see Vi- tellius, who being shewed vnto him (for he was easie to be knowne by his armor) the [illegible] man vnto him to embrace him for his honor, and so departed. About fiue hundred he[illegible] countered one another hand to hand that day, of whom many were slaine or hur[illegible] following the batterie was remoued, & the army marched towards the riuer to the [illegible]. The Turkes perceiuing the Christians to be departed, sallied out of the citie on all hands, & with a great crie vpbraiding them of cowardise, hardly pursued the rereward of the army. Vlama was come ouer himselfe from Buda, and so eagerly followed the army, that it could hardly haue escaped without great danger, had not Vitellius with his Italians made a stand, and requested the Hungarian and German horsemen to turne backe vpon the enemie; which they at his request did, and not onely repulsed the enemie, but also put him to flight, and in the chase slew many. After which time the army passed on quietly; yet 700 Germans which were sicke and straggled behind the army, were by the Turkes horsemen miserably slaine in the sight of their fellows. The Germans thrice foiled by the Turkes, first at Exek, then at Buda, & now at Pesth, returned full of heauinesse & griefe, as they which were now to forget the subduing of Hungarie, and to become carefull of Germanie it selfe. The army comming to Vienna, was there broken vp, and the Italians sent home into their countrey, who for most part died by the way, of infection taken in the campe in strange aire, and a most quæsie time of the yeare.

But to couer the shame of this vnfortunat expedition, and to turne mens talke another way by some notable accident: Petrus Perenus the noble Hungarian was the man pickt out for the purpose to fill mens mouthes. He, belayed with the enuie of the court, was for suspition of aspiring to the kingdome of Hungarie, by the commandement of king Ferdinand apprehended by Liscanus, a Spanish captaine, in the castle of Strigonium, as a traitor, and presently deliuered to Medices the Admirall, to be conueied vp the riuer to Vienna. Liscanus at the time of his apprehension most couetously and vncourteously tooke from him his chaine, and a rich cloke lined with Sables: which indignitie done to so noble a gentleman, so much offended the minds of the rest of the Hungarians, that aboue 12000 of them thereupon presently returned home to their owne dwellings, cursing the Germans to the diuell. This Perenus was one of the greatest Peeres of Hungarie, but of a most hautie & magnificent mind, so that he would sometime haue almost 100 goodly spare horses fit for seruice led before him without their riders; and would sometime speake too liberally against the bareneſſe of king Ferdinands court, who polled by his courtiers, hardly maintained his state: which his surpassing magnificence & princely port was cause enough for the other great courtiers to enuie at his estate, and to seeke his ouerthrow; who as men ouercharged with the burthen of another mans vertue, whereof they neuer bore the least part, and alwaies gaining by the depraying of other mens perfection, conspired together his ouerthrow, and oftentimes pointing at him with their fingers, would say, That he fauoured of a crown. This notable man, as he had many worthy vertues, so was he not without cause noted of ambition and vnconstancie: for after that king Lewis was lost, he disdai-ning the preferment of Iohn the Vayuod to the kingdome of Hungarie, tooke part with King Ferdinand against him, in hope as it was thought to be next in honour vnto himselfe: but after he saw king Iohn againe restored, and his state strongly supported by Solyman, & that all things stood doubtfull and tickle with Ferdinand, he with like leuitie sought meanes by Abraham the great Bassa to be reconciled to king Iohn; which was hardly obtained of him by the intercession of Solyman himselfe (as is before declared) to whom he gaue his sonne as pledge of his fidelitie. After which time he liued in great honour and loyaltie all the raigne of king Iohn:

A notable skirmish betwixt the Turkes and the Hungarians

The Christians remouing from Pesth, are assailed by the turkes.

The Christian army broken vp at Vienna.

Perenus the noble Hungarian apprehended vpon suspition of treason.

The vncourteous dealing of Liscanus the Spaniard in the apprehension of Perenus

A but after he was dead, and saw George the Bishop the Kings tutor doing what he list, to raigne like a King, he disdained his gouernment, and solicited by King Ferdinand, reuolted again vnto him, and furthered him in what he could for the obtaining of the kingdome. But now falling into the enuie of the court, malice found out matter enough to worke his confusion. First it was giuen out, That his sonne who had many yeares beene detained in Solymans Court as a pledge of his fathers faith, was euen then vnder the colour of a feigned escape come into Tranſyluania; when as he had secretly agreed with Solyman, that his father being a man much fauoured of the people, should by promising them all possible freedome, allure them to the Turkish subiection: in reward of which good seruice he should be made gouernour of the Kingdome of Hungary, and put in hope also to be made the tributarie King thereof, if it should fortune B the young King to die. Besides that, it was accounted a thing verie suspicious, that he had the Winter before vsed great kindenesse and friendship toward the Turkish Captaines, by sending them great Presents, and receiuing the like againe. And last of all, his letters directed to certaine Hungarian Captaines were produced, wherein he seemed to promise them as his friends and followers, greater entertainment than agreed with his present estate. All which things King Ferdinand (of his owne disposition not easily to be perswaded to conceiue euill of the Germanes his countrey-men, were it neuer so apparent or true, but of strangers any thing) quickely beleeued, and therefore caused him (as is before said) to be apprehended. But Pere- nus as he was brought by Medices the Admirall to Vienna, when he was come neere vnto the C gate of the city, and heard that Philippus Torniellus with certaine other braue Captaines of his acquaintance, were come to meet the Admirall; he requested that the close Coach wherein he rid might be opened, and that he might haue leaue to speake to those noble and valiant Gentlemen. Which thing was easily granted, for that the nobilitie and approoued valour of the man seemed vnto them which had the charge of him, vnworthie of such restraint of liber-tie or imprisonment, yea or of the least suspicion thereof. So he turning himselfe towards them, spake vnto them in this sort:

Matters surmised against Perenus.

The lamentable speech of Perenus to Torniellus and the other Captaines, concerning his apprehension.

Wretched I, noble Gentlemen (said he) whom despightfull enuie hath circumuented guiltlesse: but much more miserable King Ferdinand, whom domest call theeues bereaues of substance, of friends, and honour all at once. For so it commeth to passe, that by this inconsiderat wrong done vnto me, he shall vt-
D terly lose the loue and fidelitie of the Hungarian Nation, and may therefore for euer not without cause di- spaire for the obtaining of the Kingdome of Hungarie, sithence that it is not lawfull for mee (inferiour to none of my Nation in birth, and hauing for my good and faithfull seruice wel deserued reward of a suit King) so much as to reioice for the deliuerance of my sonne from the captiuitie of the Turkes, but that by my sinister fortune, dreadfull death in stead of incomparable ioy must be presented to mine eyes. For will these malicious Picke-thanks, guiltie of their owne cowardise, the wicked contriuers and witnesses of my wrongfull accusation, spare me being laid fast and in durance, which neuer spared the Kings honor? For euery man of what nobilitie soeuer, be he neuer so guiltlesse, when he is once in hold, must be content to endure, not what he hath deserued, but what his hard fortune assigneth. Yet my vpright minde and cleere conscience, which thing only God the most iust Iudge leaueth as a comfort to men in miserie wrongfully E accused, deliuereth me of this care: and so will the Marquisse our Generall, to whom I before vpon a mis- trust foretold, that such a danger would shortly befall me, and that I had rather be slaine guiltlesse, than to withdraw my selfe from triall: which thing I told him at such time as I was so guarded with mine owne strength, that I feared no mans force. I beseech you do me this honorable fauor, as to request King Ferdinand in my behalfe quickely and honorably to proceed to the triall of my cause, and according to his owne princely disposition, and the will of others, to discerne betwixt his faithfull friends and feigned flatterers. Truly we are too too vnfortunate Captains, if for a little euill successe we shall be so adiudged as men that had ouerthrowne their fortune. Cazzianer peraduenture receiued the iust punishment hee had deserued, for the shamefull forsaking and losing of the Armie at Exek, when as he possessed with F an vncouth feare, forgot the dutie of a Generall, more affraid of death than dishonour: for when he had voluntarily committed himselfe to safe custodie, he was so generally condemned of cowardise, that dispai-ring to defend his cause, he brake prison, and as wickedly as vnfortunately reuolted to the Turkes: But neither was I of late the Generall, neither were we vanquished, although we preuailed not, but honourably retiring, valiantly represted the insolencie of the pursuing enemy. As for the Kingdome of Hungary, I might then well haue affected the same, and easily haue deserued it at Solymans hands, when as King

Perenus his request of the Admirall and the rest of the Captaines.

King Ferdinand after the death of king Iohn was making his preparation for that war: at which time my friends and followers at my deuotion, with the loue of the Hungarians towards me, seeming of small importance for the obtaining of the victorie, might haue ministred no reasonable or vnsensible hope to haue drawne a man into courses not altogether beseeming a Christian: wherefore I will so long as I liue fight against the Turks, if King Ferdinand shall shew himself an indifferent iudge in this accusation, falsly surmised against me by the malice of mine enemies.

When he had made an end of speaking, the Admirall courteously persuaded him good hope in the clemency of the most iust King; and shortly after preferred his request: for he and Torniellus taking the King as he was hunting, entreated him to be fauorably vnto Perenus. For all that, Perenus could not obtaine that his cause might be heard, but was committed to safe keeping, there to remaine in perpetuall prison: but whether for the misprision of new treason, or for reuenge of his old vnconstancie, is vncertaine. Perenus, Valentinus, & Maylat, three of the greatest nobility in Hungary, kept in perpetuall prison.

the only great Princes left of the Hungarian bloud, equally worthie of the Kingdome, Valentine, Maylat, and Perenus, snarled almost in like snares of enuie, cut off all hope of raising a King to their seditious and therefore miserable countrymen: when as Perenus lay too late bewailing his vnconstancie in perpetuall prison; and the other two fast in chaines neere vnto the Euxine sea, expected death the end of their miseries. This end had the wars taken in hand against the Turks by the generall consent of the Germanes in the yeare 1542; which many thought might worthily be compared with the greatest losses of those times: when as King Ferdinand hauing in vaine spent a great masse of treasure (the fittest stay for the imminent war) and lost the opinion before conceiued of the strength of Germany; had now as a weake Prince, and subiect to iniurie, prouoked him against the Turks, bold enough otherwise, but as then insolent for their late victories.

1543 Polinus the French Kings Embassadour still following the Turkes Court, ceased not by all meanes to solicite Solyman, with his gallies to aid the King his Master in the inuasion of the Dominions of Charles the Emperour, in Italie, Sicilie, and Spaine. In which suite he was so crossed by Solyman the Eunuch Bassa, then Visier, that he was almost in dispaire of speed: for the Malicious Eunuch being himselfe a great sea-man, and enuying the honour of Barbarussa (who was to be employed in that seruice) sought by keeping him out of all honourable actions, to diminish his former glory; and concerning the present, protested openly as he sate in Councell, That he saw no other cause why the Turkish Emperour should to his great charge and the common danger, send out such a Fleet, but to serue Barbarussa his owne turne. But Solyman hauing diligently heard, and deepely considered of that the Bassa's had said, rejected their opinions who would not he should haue giuen the French King any aid; and honourably decreed according to his promise, whatsoeuer should ensue thereof, to send his Fleet vnto the King by Barbarussa. Two dayes after, the French Embassadour before in dispaire, but now reuiued with that Decree, was solemnly feasted by Rustan Bassa (Solymans sonne in law) and by Solyman the Eunuch Bassa: for so it was their great Masters pleasure, both of them ioying of him for the friendship confirmed betwixt the two Princes by sending this Fleet. After which, diuers gifts were bestowed vpon the Embassador and his chiefe followers; and at such time as he was to take his leaue, Solyman gaue him great charge of his Nauie, that it might be safely kept, and so after the seruice done, againe returned: and withall deliuered him letters vnto King Francis, wherein after the glorious rehearsall of his proud titles, he writ vnto him as followeth.

Solyman granteth to send his fleet by Barbarussa to aid the French king against the Emperour.

Solymans letters to the French king.

We haue vpon a brotherly bountie granted vnto Polinus your Embassadour, such and so great a fleet as you haue desired, throughly furnished for all assaies: whose direction we haue commanded Hariaden our Admirall to follow, and by your appointment to proceed against the Enemie. But you shall do well and friendly, the warres once happily ended, to send backe againe my fleet to Constantinople. All things shall vndoubtedly fall out according to your owne desire and mine, if you shall carefully take heed that Charles the Spanish king your perpetuall enemy, do not againe deceiue you with the motion of a deceitfull peace. For then shall you bring him to a most indifferent peace, when you haue brought vpon his Countries all the calamities of Warre.

Polinus

Polinus taking his leaue of Solyman then lying at Hadrianople, returned to Constantinople, where he found Barbarussa with an hundred and ten gallies and fortie gallions, readie to put to sea, which hee had with incredible celeritie rigged vp and furnished. And so setting forward the eight and twentieth of Aprill in the yeare 1543, and passing the straits of Helespontus, arriued first at Carystius in Eubœa; and from thence to Malea, where he was by contrarie winds cast into the bay of Lacedemon, and there staied nine daies before he could double the cape of Metapanium, called in antient time Tenarus: After that he came to Methon, and thence crossing the Ionian, came to the strait of Messana: where the Turkish pirats being ioyned with their galliots within the sight of Rhegium, began to land their men. They of Rhegium seeing so great a fleet, and the Turks alreadie landing, fled out of the Citie for feare; but the Castle was still kept by Didacus Gaietanus a Spaniard, who refused to haue any parle with Polinus the French Embassador, and with shot out of the Castle slew certaine of the Turkes: whereat the rest being inraged, brake into the citie, and finding it desolate, set it on fire, sore against the will of Polinus and Barbarussa, who sought to haue found out the authors thereof, and to haue punished them accordingly.

After that, certaine pieces of great Ordnance were landed and planted against the Castle, which with a few shot so terrified the Captaine, alreadie troubled with the crying out of his wife, that he without any more ado yeelded himselfe and the Castle with all therein, into the hands of the Enemie: vnto whom with his wife and children, Barbarussa at the request of the French Embassador granted both life and libertie: the rest he shut vp in a Church, and gaue the spoile of the Castle to his souldiers. There was in the garrison of the Castle about seuentie Spaniards, but many mo Citisens, which were all carried away prisoners. One of the Captaines daughters, a young gentlewoman of exceeding beautie, had with her good grace so warmed the withered affection of the old Pirat Barbarussa, that he (now fitter for the graue than for marriage) became amorous of her person: so that taking her from her father, and entring her into the Mahometan Superstition, he made of her as of his wife: insomuch that certaine moneths after he welcommed and bountifully entertained the Captaine as his father in law, comming to see his daughter at the Port called Portus Herculis in Tuscanie, where the Turks fleet then lay. Barbarussa sailing alongst the coast of Italy, came to Ostia, in the mouth of the riuer Tibur, and brought such a feare vpon the citie of Rome, that the Citisens were readie generally to haue forsaken the city; had not Polinus by his letters to Rodolphus the cardinall, then the great Bishop Paulus his Legat in the Citie, in part staied the sudden tumult. The Bishop himselfe was then at Buxetum, a towne betwixt Cremona and Placentia, trauelling (in shew) with the Emperor, to haue made a peace betwixt him and the French King; but laboured in secret to haue bought of him the Dukedome of Millan, for Octauius his kinseman the Emperors sonne in law. Polinus his letters written to the Cardinall at Rome, and sent by the Gouernor to Tarracina, were to this effect:

Barbarussa amorous of the Captaine of Rhegium his daughter.

The French embassadors letters to comfort Rodolph the Cardinall the Popes Legat in Rome.

This Fleet which is by Solyman sent for the defence of France by Barbarussa his Admirall, is by his appointment at my command: so that it is not to hurt any but our enemies. Wherefore make it knowne to the Romans and others dwelling alongst the coast of the Popes territorie, That they feare of vs no hostility; for the Turks wil neuer violat the faith of their Emperor solemnly giuen vnto me: and you know most assuredly, that the French King desireth nothing more, than that the estate of Rome might not only be kept in safetie, but also flourish most gloriously, and he therefore preserued from all iniury. Farewell.

In like manner he also comforted vp them of Neptunianum and Ostia, so that they brought vnto the Turks all manner of victuall; and sometimes for foure sheepe or a couple of oxen redeemed a good prisoner taken in some place of the kingdome of Naples. Yet for all this, the Romans did not so much credit the Embassadors promise in the behalfe of the Turkes good dealing, but that many of the weaker sort fled out of the citie into the countrey by night, although the chiefe Magistrates did what they might to haue staied them. When Barbarussa had thus lien three dayes in the mouth of the riuer Tibur, and there watered, he passed alongst the coast of Etruria and Liguria, without doing any harme; and so sailed directly to Marseilles. Where leauing him with his fleet for a while, expecting the French Kings further pleasure, we will againe returne vnto Solyman, who at the same time that Barbarussa was spoiling the frontiers in detestation of their treacherie, or for the spoile of them, were all put to the sword [and cut] vsed. The Bishop and chiefe men of Quinque Ecclesiæ (a famous Citie not far off on the other side of Dranus) hearing of the losse of Walpo, and terrified with the greatnesse of the Turks armie, fled for feare, leauing none but the meaner sort of the people in the City, who willingly yeelded the same vnto the Turks. The next towne of any strength was Soclosia, belonging also to Perenus, which for a while held out against the Turks, for that diuers Gentlemen of the countrey which were fled into the Citie, encouraged the Citisens to stand vp- I on their defence. But after much harme done on both sides, when they were no longer able to hold out, they retired into the castle, in hope to haue so saued their liues and libertie by yeelding: but Amurathes was so offended with them, that he would come to no reasonable composition, or promise them any thing more, than that they should at their pleasure come forth: and so as they came out at the gate, slew them euery mothers sonne, thereby to terri-fie others from making like resistance.

The castle of Walpo trecherously yeelded, and the Traitors iustly rewarded.

Solyman commeth with his army to Strigonium.

Solyman vnderstanding of all these things, gaue those towns which were taken to Amurathes the Generall: and hauing put all things in readinesse, departed from Buda with all his armie to besiege Strigonium; which was then kept by Liscanus and Salamanca, two proud couetous Spaniards, with a garrison of 1300 soldiers, whereof some few were Spaniards and Italians, & the K rest Germanes. Paulus Bishop of Strigonium got himselfe out of the city betimes, dispairing of all mercy if he should haue fallen into the power of Solyman, by whose intermission he had bin once before reconciled to King Iohn, and had again reuolted from him to King Ferdinand. The castle of Strigonium was scituat vpon a high hill ouerlooking Danubius running vnderneath it, the walls were built euen without any flankers, after the old manner of building before the inuention of guns: for which cause Vitellius and Tornicllus two expert captaines (the yeare before sent from the king to view the place, and the manner of the fortification) were of opinion, that the city could hardly be defended, if it were besieged by any strong Enemy; being subiect also vnto a hill not far from the gates of the city. Against which incoueniences the old garrison soldiers which wintred in Strigonium, cast vp new bulwarks and fortificati- L ons, and after the manner of windie headed men, making great boast before the danger, what they would do, seemed to wish for the comming of Solyman. But after that the barbarous enemie had with his tents couered the fields and mountaines round about the city, and withall brought a gallant fleet vp the riuer, all those brags were laid in the dust, & euery man began to grow doubtfull of his owne safety: for that they being but few (although men of good worth) were to withstand the infinite number of such enemies, as oftentimes vsed most desperatly to expose their liues to all maner of dangers. This their feare was also increased by the comming of certain messengers from Solyman, who vnderstanding of what nations the garison consisted, sent vnto the city three of his owne gard, one a Spaniard, another an Italian, and the third a German, all renegat Christians; that euery one of them might without an Interpreter speake M vnto their countrymen in their own language: These men admitted into the city, offered great rewards and large entertainment in the name of Solyman, to such as would in time yeeld: denouncing all torture and extremities vnto them which [would] endure the summons of the [city]. Whereunto it was answered by the Captaines, That those faithfull and valiant souldiers

The stout answere of the captaines.

A diers, who had reposed their last hopes in their armes, were neither to be woon by gifts, nor terrified with threats. With which answere the messenger returned, and the same day the Turks great ordonnce was planted vpon the hill before the gate of the city, and the weakest parts of the walls round about the citie, so well pickt out by the Turkes to be assaulted, as they could not more skilfully or commodiously haue bin chosen out of them which had within most diligently viewed euery thing: so that it is to be thought that the Christians vainly boasted. Achomates Generall of the European horsemen, laid siege to that part of the B wall which was next to the Bishops gardens: Vlamas the Persian besieged the tower neere vnto the gate towards Buda: The Asapi or common soldiers were by their captains brought on to dig trenches, and cast vp mounts, as was thought most conuenient. It is incredible to be spoken, with what furie the great ordnance was discharged without ceasing; insomuch that the towers with a great part of the wall neere vnto it, shaken with continuall battery, fell downe with such violence, as if all had been shaken with a most terrible earthquake: neither was any man able to stand vpon the walls, but that the Ianizaries with their harquebusiers out of their trenches, and from their mounts, would most certainly fetch him off: and many which stood within farther off, were with the Turks arrowes falling from high as if it had been out of the C aire, grieuously wounded. But that which most troubled the defendants, and did them greatest harme, was the stones, which beaten insunder with the great shot, and not to be auoided, did with their pieces kill or maime the soldiers neere hand. With which dangers they were enforced to forsake the vttermost wall, and to cast vp new fortifications within, that they might with lesse danger defend the place. Neither in the enemy wanted courage to assaile the breach: thrice they desperatly attempted to haue entred, and were alwaies with losse repulsed. In which assaults, amongst others, Bultaces Sanzacke of Selymbria, a man of great account a-D mong the Turks, was lost. Whilest the defendants were thus busied, many of the soldiers and mariners which came vp the riuer with all things necessary for the army, from Buda, went on shore, and lay in the suburbs of the city in such security, as if there had beene no enemy nigh: which thing they in the city perceiuing, suddenly sallied out vpon them fearing no such matter, and slew many of them before they could arme themselues, & draue the rest to their fleet: so that betwixt fighting and flying there was about two hundred of them slaine. Zimar a Persian, Admirall of the Fleet, in rescuing of them which to saue their liues fled vnto the riuer, was shot thorow with a small shot and slaine. Whilest these things were in doing, and the Turks hauing in many places sore shaken the wall, did with greater force daily assaile the Citie, and the defendants with their continuall losse, and out of all hope of relieue, were more and more discouraged; an old Calabrian enginer which had long time serued king Ferdinand, fled out of the city to the Turks; who being curteously entertained by Solyman, and examined by the Bassa's of many things concerning the strength and state of the city, satisfied them in all
E that they desired; and further, directed them in planting their batteries in places most conuenient for the speedy taking of the towne. In the mean time whilest the Turks were with restlesse labor battering the walls, and working in their mines, it fortuned that a gilt brazen Crosse which stood vpon the top of the steeple of the Cathedrall Church, was by the continual shooting of the Turks thereat, at length beaten downe: at the sight whereof, it is reported that Solyman after the superstitious manner of that nation taking the chance as a token of good lucke, cried out presently, Strigonium is won.

The terrible battery of the Turks at Strigonium.

The Turkes repulsed thrice at the assault of the breach.

A Christian fugitiue discouereth the weakest and state of the citie vnto the Turkes.

Liscanus and Salamanca fearfully consulting of the euent of the siege, and secretly conferring together, resolued to saue themselues, and to giue vp the towne. Liscanus was no great soldier; and yet by continuall spoile growne exceeding rich, and therefore thought it but folly to buy the name of a resolute captain at too deare a price, with the losse of his life and wealth. The F like feeling was also in Salamanca, who preferred the safety of himself & of that which he had got in long seruice, before al credit & honor were it neuer so great. This their purpose was not kept so secret, but that it was noised abroad amongst the common soldiers, of whome almost the third part was now either slain, or with wounds or sicknes grown weake: yet were they all of opinion generally, that they were still strong enough to defend the towne. But the vnder Captaines and Antients vsing to flatter their Generals, liked well of the motion, to yeeld vnto Solyman

So the Spaniard stood, himselfe writ to Liscanus, how he had sped, willing him forthwith, if he ... safety, to yeeld the city, without standing vpon further termes. Liscanus vpon receit of ... letters comming forth to the souldiers, declared vnto them the necessity of yeelding vp ... the town, and what hope there was to escape with life and liberty. But whilest the souldiers filled with indignation, stood as men in doubt what to do, Halis commander of the Ianizaries came vnto the gate, and with cheerful rather than sterne countenance required to haue it opened vnto him, according to the agreement made by Salamanca in the campe: which was forthwith opened by Liscanus, and the keies deliuered vnto him. The Ianizaries entring peaceably into the city, possessed themselues of the walls & fortresses round about, commanding the Christian soldiers to giue place, out of whom they chose all the beardles youths, & commanded the rest to cast downe their harquebusies & other weapons in a place appointed, which they all for feare did, expecting nothing but some cruel execution to be done vpon them by the barbarous enemy. Which their feare was the more increased by a strange accident then vnluckily chancing: for whilest the soldiers did as they were commanded, with their harquebusies cast their flaskes full of pouder also, one of them suddenly tooke fire of a match which was by chance cast in amongst them with fire in it, which firing the rest, blew about all that heape of weapons among the Turks, which so filled them with anger & feare of some sudden trechery, that they fell vpon the Christians and slew diuers of them: vntill such time as Halis (perswaded that it was a thing hapned rather by chance than malice) commanded his Ianizaries to stay their fury. This tumult appeased, Halis caused proclamation to be made, That all such Christian souldiers as would serue Solyman in his wars, should haue such place in his army as their quality required, with bountifull entertainment: yet of all the Christian soldiers were found only seuentie, which carefull of their liues, accepted the offer, fearing that the Turks would vpon such as refused, exercise their wonted cruelty. Halis entertaining them curteously, sent them away with the other youths whom he had before culled out, down the riuer to Buda: the other souldiers he tooke into his protection, and vsed their labor to helpe the Turks to make cleane the castle. But Liscanus, who to saue his gold had made shipwracke of his honor & reputation, was glad to giue vnto Halis the faire chaine of gold which he had most couetously & insolently before taken from Perenus; when as Halis (who would otherwise haue taken it from him by force) by way of militarie curtesie now craued it of him, as a strange kind of ornament among the Turks: with which gift he was in hope to haue saued the rest of his coine. But fortune fauored not so much the couetous coward: for when he was about to depart away with his horses of seruice, which he kept very good, & had cunningly stuffed the saddles ful of gold, thinking so slily to haue conueied it; the Turke laughing at him, tooke from him his horses furnished as they were, saying, that he which was to go by water needed no horses. So was the couetous wretch at once quit of the great wealth which he had in long time euill got. The captains with the rest of the soldiers dispoiled of their armes, were conueied ouer the riuer of Danubius, & so trauelled on foot to Possonium, where the County Salme by the commandement of the king apprehended Liscanus, Salamanca, and some other of the captains for suspirion of treason, & committed them to safe custodie, there to answer for their cowardly yeelding vp of the city.

Solyman entred into Strigonium the tenth of August in the yeare 1543, and there conuerting Christian Churches into Temples for the Mahometan superstition, first sacrificed for his victorie (as he had before done in Buda) and after with all speed so strongly fortified the citie, Salamanca goes out of Strigonium, & parly with the Turks about the yeelding vp of the town.

Strigonium yeelded to the Turks by Liscanus the Spaniard.

Liscanus the couetous Spaniard merrily stript of all his wealth by Halis captaine of the Ianizaries.

Solyman entreth into Strigonium, and there setteth vp the Mahometan superstition.

A as if hee would thereby for euer haue taken from the Christians all hope of recouering the same againe, deriding the slouthfull negligence of the Germans, who possessed of it foureteen yeares, had neglected all that time to fortifie it. Not long after, Solyman leauing Ossainus a valiant captaine Gouernor of Strigonium, and sending his Tartarian horsemen to spoile the countrey on the left hand, as far as Alba Regalis; went himselfe to besiege the castle of Tatta, called in antient time Theodota. The garrison souldiers terrified with the losse of Strigonium, and the sight of the Turks army, vpon the first summons yeelded the castle without resistance, and were so suffered quietly to depart. That castle after the manner of the Turkish discipline,

A cowardly captaine worthily rewarded.

Solyman goeth to Alba Regalis.

Tatta thus laid in the dust, Solyman marched with his army towards Alba, surnamed Regalis, for that the kings of Hungarie by an antient custome vsed there to be crowned, and also buried. Buda, Strigonium, and Alba Regalis, three principall cities of the kingdome of Hungarie stand in maner of a triangle, almost equally distant one from another, about a hundred miles in compasse. Buda and Strigonium are scituate vpon the riuer of Danubius: but Alba standeth more into the land, strongly seated in the middest of a great lake, but not so wholesomely, es-

C pecially in the Summer time, the Winter waters then decreasing, and grosse vapours arising with the heat of the Sunne. From the citie thorow the marrish or lake, vnto the firme land, lie three broad and high causeys (in manner of the strakes of a cart wheele) well built with faire houses and gardens on either side, and a broad way in the middle, whereby men passe in & out of the citie. At the end of euery causey toward the land were cast vp strong bulwarkes, which the citizens vsed not to watch but in dangerous times of war: so that by these bulwarkes, the houses of the suburbes standing vpon these causies, were safe from the danger of the enemie, the lake filling vp all the spaces betwixt the causies: which, what for the depth, what for mud; flags, and bulrushes, growing in it, was not by horse or man to be passed thorow. And the citie it selfe standing in the midst of the lake, compassed round about with a strong wall, and a deepe

D ditch alwaies full of water, was hardly to be besieged: for which causes a great number of the countrie people vpon the comming of Solyman, fled into it with their cattell, as vnto a most sure hold. In the citie lay in garrison two companies of Germans, and 200 horsemen, vnto whom were ioyned 500 Hungarian horsemen, such as in time of peace liued by robbing, and are by an infamous name called Vsarous: vnto these, the Italian countie Torniellus, who with his Italians was come as far as Iauarinum, or Rab, sent foure captaines with their companies, such as were most forward in that seruice: after whome followed Barcotius, captaine of the Kings guard, with a companie of horsemen, appointed by the king for Generall. Who was no sooner come into the citie, but newes was brought of Solymans approch. Whereupon he in hast called together the other captaines, with Birrous then maior of the citie, and other the chiefe citizens

E to consult with them, What was best to be done for the defence of the citie, but especially, Whether the suburbs of the citie, standing vpon those three broad causies, were to be destroyed or not? that so the citie standing in the middest of the great marish, might both with lesse labour and danger be defended. This question was seriously debated, and great reasons alledged: at last the citizens cried out with one voice against the matter, and said, That they would neuer suffer those goodly suburbes, wherein were so many churches and faire buildings as might compare with the citie it selfe, to be so shamefully destroyed, to the vtter vndoing of so many rich citizens: for what could be (said they) more dishonourable or lamentable, than to the encouraging of the barbarous enemy, to shew such a token of extreame feare; and with their owne hands to burne and destroy those stately buildings, which might by strong hand

The citizens of Alba will not suffer the citie to be destroyed.

F bee well enough defended against the enemie, if they did not play the shamefull cowards. Of which opinion with the citizens was also Octauianus Serosactus an Italian captain; alledging that both the citie and the suburbes might both with like danger be defended: forasmuch as they were equally fortified with the benefit of the marish, and if the worst should happen, the defendants might yet safely enough retire into the citie. At last standing vp as one thrust forward ward, both with the publicke hard fortune and his owne, said, Valiant gentlemen, what shem speech they all arise, the wiser sort and of greatest experience giuing p[lace] to the im[pa]tity of the ignorant & simple. Barcotius himselfe full of care, and ouercome w[ith] the vaine of the greater parr, yeelded also vnto that fatal resolution of saiuing the [suburbs]. For it ofte teth out, that they who wisely weighing dangers in the ballance of reason, and doe th[erefore] fearefu out with Barcotius the G[enerall] who setting a good countenance on the matter [and] nothing liked him, went out to the souldiers, declaring vnto them the reasons why the suburbs were to be defended: exhorting them with like valour on their parts to answer that honourable resolution, promising to prouide whatsoeuer should be necessary for the obtaining of the victory; assuring them of great rewards and preferment, which should by their good seruice deserue the same. Hereupon the suburbs were by the common labour of the souldiers and the citizens quickly fortified, the great ordnance in places conuenient orderly planted, and watch and ward kept by the captains and their companies by their turns day and night. But the Turks drawing I neere to the citie, bent their forces only against the suburbs of the gate leading towards Buda: for that they perceiued the marish was in that place drier than the other, and the sandie ground more vnfit for the making of bulwarks & other fortifications for the safety of the defendants, than in the other places where the ground yeelded better turfe. Barcotius perceiuing the enemies purpose, drew all the Italians and Germanes from the other gates into the suburbs of the gate of Buda, leauing the country people which were fled into the citie, & the citizens, in their places. At the first comming of the Turks, the Hungarian and German horsmen, with the Italian footmen, sallied out of the suburbs, and after certain light skirmishes retired. Which maner of fight was continued by the space of three daies without any great harme done on either side: for the captains had warily commanded, That the souldiers should not aduenture out too K far. But after that Solyman himselfe was come, and had with the multitude of his tents beset the citie far and neere, to the terror of the beholders; the Christians shut vp all the gates, and sallied out no more. Which thing caused the wild Hungarian Vsarous (vsed to open skirmishes) to prouide for themselues in time, and not to suffer themselues to be coupt vp (as they termed) within the wals of the citie: so for fashion sake, asking leaue to be gone (who were not against their wils to be staied) they by night departed, beeing not to be entreated by the Generall or citizens to stay, and by knowne waies escaped thorow the woods from the enemy. In the mean time the Turkes were come with their winding trenches within shot, and with their arrowes and small shot so scoured the top of the bulwarke, that no man could there possibly appeare but hee was straight wounded: and such was the fury of the great artillerie, that it had in L short time battered in sunder the plankes and timber which kept in the sandie mould, whereof the fortresse was made, more for shew than for strength; in such sort, that the great shot flying quite thorow all, slew and wounded many that were a far off: in which distresse of the defendants, the Turks Asapi with small danger filled vp the ditches of the bulwarke, and diuers places of the marrish with earth and wood, which they brought continually from a wood therby with six hundred waggons, so that in the space of twelue daies they had made a firme way for them to passe ouer vpon, both to the bulwarke and the suburbs; a worke before thought impossible to haue beene performed. The ditches thus filled vp, the Turkes valiantly came on, seeking by plaine force to enter the bulwarke. First came on the Asapi, whom as men of least worth the Turks captains vse to thrust to the first danger: after whom followed the horsmen, now on foot, with swords and targuets, or else their horsemens staues, couering the Ianizaries, M who vpon their knees with their harquebusiers sore gauled the defendants. This hot fight endured aboue three houres with equall hope and courage: but the Turkes still relieued with fresh souldiers, repulsed the Christians, and gained the vt[ter]most bulwarke: neuertheless the Italian fort was that day valiantly defended, the very wo[men] and religious helping to defend

it:

The Turks with incredible labor fill vp the ditches & take, and by plaine force assault the bulwark of the suburbs toward Buda.

A ils in which assault a tall Hungarian woman, whose courage far exceeded the weakenesse of her sex, thrusting in amo[ng] the souldiers vpon the top of the fort; with a great sythe in her hand at one blow strucke [off] two of the Turks heads, as they were climing vp the rampier. This as- A notable act of an Hungarian woman.
fault was giuen the nine and twentieth of August, on which day the Turks had before taken Belgrade, and also slaine king Lewis at the battell of Mohacz; and were therefore after their superstitious manner in obseruation of their fortunate and vnfortunate daies, in good hope to haue then taken the citie: wherein they were much deceiued, being not able at that time fur-
B rage prosecuted the victorie, but cowardly (as he thought) giuen it ouer, being in a manner al- ther to enter, but enforced againe to retire. Wherewith Solyman offended, sent for Abraham, Achomates, and Hali (the chiefe captains in that assault) into his tent, and reproued them sharp- ly; for that the bulwarke being so valiantly and fortunatly woon, they had not with more cou- readie woon: and therefore with sterne countenance commanded them to prepare all things readie within three daies for a fresh assault, and neuer to return vnto him, except they did win the citie. Whereunto the captaines answered no more (for were they neuer so guiltlesse, they might not before him stand to excuse themselues) but that they would in short time accom- plish his desire. Wherefore hauing made all readie, and encouraged the souldiers to this last assault, they terribly assailed the rampiers, and brought a great feare vpon the defendants: for taking the benefit of a thick mist (as it oftentimes chanceth in marrish grounds) they were with great silence (contrarie to their manner) got vp to the top of the rampiers, and come to handie blowes, before they were well discouered. The fight was for the time fierce and terrible: but
C the Ianizaries preuailing, at length put the Germans to flight, and after them the Italians also, so that now well was he that could run fastest towards the citie. But that their hastie flight lit- tle auailed, when as they were to passe out by a little narrow gate in maner of a wicket: & they in the citie, without regard of them that fled, had plucked vp the draw bridge ouer the ditch. For naturally it commeth oftentimes to passe, that the feare of the present danger, without blu- shing excuseth our foule dealing. So the barbarous and fierce enemy pursuing the flying Chri- stians at the heeles all the length of those suburbs with most cruell execution, many notable men, some fighting, some flying, were there slaine: amongst whom was Octauianus Serosactus, author of the euil counsel wherof insued that calamitie. Barcotius the Generall flying on hors- backe to the little gate, which was not to be passed thorow, and crying in vaine to them that D fled, to haue the great gate opened, was by the comming of the Ianizaries slaine: whose head and right hand full of rich rings, was by the barbarous enemy carried about in derision vpon a launce. The rest of the flying multitude finding the little gate shut vp with the bodies of the dead, & the bridge maliciously drawne vp, desperatly threw themselues into the deepe ditch; where some of them labouring to swim out, were caught by the legs and armes by other that could not swim, and both together drowned. Some hardly crauling ouer, were shot in the head or backe with the Turks arrowes: other some sticking fast in the mud, were as if it had been in sport shot to death by the Turks: some few there was which got ouer, and were saued. The miserable slaughter of the flying Christians

There was yet left in the citie the Generall of the German horsemen, and Vscasades of Cremona, an Italian captaine; these two gathering the remainder of the souldiers which were left, E placed them vpon the wals: but the citizens were stricke with such a feare, that they could not tell which way to turne themselues. For now Birrous the maior, with the aldermen and other chiefe citizens, seeing the slaughter of the Italians and Germanes, were so ouercome with de- spaire, that they thought no hope of their well doing was to bee reposed in making of any far- ther resistance, but only in the mercie of Solyman. Wherfore Birrous spake vnto the Turks from the wall, That he might safely send embassadors to Solyman, to intreat with him vpon reasona- ble conditions, for the yeelding vp of the citie: which thing Achomates easily granted. With these embassadours for the citizens, went also the Generals of the German horsmen, & Caro- lus Rufus an Italian captaine (who of all others had borne himselfe most valiantly in all the as- saults, to the great admiration of the Turks) to intreat for the safety & liberty of the souldiers.
F The embassadors being brought before the great Bassaes, requested, That yeelding the citie, the citizens might inioy their liues & liberty: whereunto they were so answered, as that it see- med they should not all be pardoned; yet was the generall feare wel diminished, for that the pu- nishment respected but some few. Rufus was courteously entertained; & easily obtained, that the Italians might in safety depart with bag & bagagge to Vienna: the like grace also had the Gene-red the citizens of a great feare. Shortly after the citie being yeelded, Homares by proclamation in the market place, commanded the Italians and Germans to make themſel- rea-the Turks greatly deſired, delighted with the noueltie of the inuention, to ſee them with a firelocke without a match. But after the departure of Homares, they were in the rear ſet vpon by the Hungarians, with whom they had many hot skirmiſhes, and had hardly eſcaped vnſpoiled, had they not beene reſcued by the kings ſouldiers lying in garriſon in the Ca-ſtles as they paſſed alongſt the countrey. The few which remained, after many troubles came at laſt to Vienna, more like ghoſts than men.

Solyman entreth into Alba Regalis.

Solyman cauſeth the chiefe citiſens of Alba Regalis to be ſlain.

Solyman entering quietly into the citie, firſt viſited the Sepulchers of the Hungarian kings, I and gaue out proclamation, That the Hungarians ſhould feare of him no harme; for that he was not come to conquer them, but to deliuer them from the bondage of the Germans, and ſo to reſtore againe that entire kingdome vnto Stephen the right heire of King Iohn. But within three or foure daies after, he called out the chiefe citiſens into a field not far off, wherein the bodies of condemned men were woont to be buried, as if he would haue there taken an oath of them for their fidelitie: whether, after they were all aſſembled in the beſt manner they could, as to ſome ſolemne feaſt, the cruell tyrant (without regard of his faith or promiſe) cauſed them all to be ſlaine. Howbeit ſome report, that he cauſed them onely to be put to death which bare office in the citie, at ſuch time as they reuolted from the obedience of the Queene and the infant king, vnto Ferdinand, and had then brought in German ſouldiers; and that he ſent the reſt into exile to Buda and Belgrade. So Solyman leauing Balibeius Gouernour of Alba Regalis; K

Solyman returneth to Conſtantinople.

and Mahometes ſometime Gouernour of Belgrade, his Lieutenant Generall for the whole gouernement of that kingdome, returned againe toward Conſtantinople (Winter now beginning to approch) after he had that Sommer woon Strigonium and Alba Regalis, two of the chie-feſt cities of Hungarie. All this while king Ferdinand had raiſed no power worth the ſpeaking of, to withſtand ſo mightie an enemie; onely at Vienna lay ſeuen thouſand Germans and foure thouſand Italians, at ſuch time as Solyman departed from Alba Regalis, which were ſhortly after diſcharged.

Whiles Solyman thus lay at the ſiege of Alba Regalis, he ſent his Tartarian horſemen which ſerued him to ſmall purpoſe in the ſiege, to ſpoile the country round about: theſe ſauage people doing much harme, were in diuers places circumuented by the Hungarians, & about three thouſand of them ſlaine: one of them being taken priſoner, had found in his knapſacke halfe a L childe, of about two yeres old, the loathſome remainder of his barbarous feeding.

Barbaruſſa all this while lying with his fleet (as we haue before ſaid) at Marſeilles, fretted exceedingly, that he had to his diſhonour vndertaken ſo long a voyage by ſea, to pleaſure him which was not able (as he ſaid) to direct his own deſignes to any certain reſolution, but ſhamefully ſuffered the beſt time of the yeare for ſeruice, negligently to paſſe away without any thing doing; the blame whereof would (as he ſaid) be imputed to him at Conſtantinople: and that Solyman, who deſired to aid the king his friend and confederat, and by all means to annoy his enemies, would take in euill part to haue it reported, that hee had with ſo great charge ſet out ſo great a fleet, and ſo far off, to helpe his friend hardly beſet with his enemies, & to haue done nothing: beſides that, he tooke on like a Turke, that he who in time of ſeruice neuer vſed negligently to let ſlip the leaſt opportunitie, ſhould now blemiſh his former credit & eſtimati- M on, by lying ſtill all that Sommer in the harbour of Marſeilles, where his ſouldiers grew lazie with doing nothing. Wherefore Polinus going to the king, told him of the proud Turkes great diſcontentment for lacke of employment: and returning to Barbaruſſa, brought order from the

A the king, that he ſhould lay ſiege to Nice a citie of Prouince, then holden by the duke of Sa-uoy. This city ſtanding vpon the ſea, was by one of the French kings for a great ſum of mony pawned vnto the duke: which mony, king Francis had many times offered to haue repaied, but could neuer get the citie out of the dukes hands. Vnto which ſeruice, the French king ſent alſo his fleet of two and twentie gallies and eighteen ſhips, wherein were imbarked eight thouſand ſouldiers, and victuall for many daies. This fleet departing from Marceilles, keeping cloſe by the ſhore, came to the port called Monoc; whither two daies after came Barbaruſſa alſo with an hundred and fiftie gallies. From thence Polinus by commandement from the king went vnto the State of Genoa, That they ſhould not feare of that great fleet any hoſtilitie, which was not to hurt any but them of Nice, and not them neither if they would yeeld them-B ſelues. For more aſſurance whereof, he obtained of the Turks diuers Genoa captiues, which had long time lien chained in their gallies, and courteouſly ſet them at libertie, & ſent them home without ranſome. After that, he friendly exhorted the citiſens of Nice, to yeeld themſelues againe vnto their antient and lawfull Prince, renowned for his bountie and power; rather than to aduenture their State to all extremities for that poore and diſtreſſed Duke, who betweene the Emperour and the French king, diſpoiled of the greateſt part of his dominions, ſaw no other end of his miſeries, but to leaue that little which yet remained, as a prey to the one or to the other, that ſhould firſt lay hand thereon. Whereunto the magiſtrats of the town anſwered, That they knew no other Prince or ſoueraigne, but Charles their duke: wherefore he ſhould deſiſt farther to ſolicite them by letters or meſſengers, whom they would make no C other account of but as of their enemies. Wherefore the Frenchmen and Turks landing their forces, laid ſiege to the towne in three places. The citiſens had but a little before newly fortified their wals, by the direction of Paulus Simeon, captaine of the caſtle, and one of the knights of the Rhodes, a man of great experience, who long before taken at ſea by pyrats, had ſome-time ſerued Barbaruſſa, and therefore perſuaded the citiſens as reſolute men to withſtand the Turks. Which, that they ſhould more conſtantly performe, he tooke their wiues and children and weaker ſort of the people into the caſtle; and from thence furniſhed the citiſens with all things neceſſarie for their defence. The citie was at once in diuers places battered by the Turkes & French, both by ſea and land: ſo that at laſt the Turks had beaten downe one of the new built bulwarks, and made ſo faire a breach, that with their enſignes diſplaid, they attemp-D ted to haue entred: whoſe forwardnes Leo Strozza (then ſeruing the French king with a band of Italians) imitating, fought to haue entred alſo: but the citiſens ſtanding valiantly vpon their defence, manfully repulſed both the Turks and Italians, and cauſed them with loſſe to retire.
In this aſſault were ſlaine about 100 Turks; and of Strozza his ſouldiers 22. Preſently after,
Nice in Prouince beſieged by the French and the Turk.

Barbaruſſa with all his force began a freſh batterie, in ſuch terrible maner, that the citiſens ſee-ing their wals in diuers places opened, and the few ſouldiers they had ſore wounded, and no hope to be in conuenient time relieued, began to parley with the French Generall from the wall, concerning the yeelding vp of the citie; vpon condition, that they might in all reſpects liue vnder the French king as they had done vnder the duke: for performance whereof, the General gaue them his faith. But Polinus fearing leſt the Turks ſhould violate this compoſition, E and for griefe of the loſſe of their fellowes, or for hope of the ſpoile brake into the citie, entreated Barbaruſſa to recall his ſouldiers, and to cauſe them to goe aboord his gallies. For which cauſe not long after, the Ianizaries, as men deceiued of their hoped prey, were about to haue ſlaine both Polinus and Strozza, as they came from talking with Barbaruſſa.
The citiſens crane parley, & after yeeld the citie.

The city thus yeelded, they began to conſult for the taking of the caſtle: the performance wherof conſiſted firſt in the aſſailing of the caſtle it ſelfe, & then in defending of the city from the ſudden ſallies of them in the caſtle; & likewiſe in defending of them which beſieged the caſtle, ſo that no enemy ſhould come to raiſe the ſiege: of which two things, Barbaruſſa put the French to choice which they would take, ſhewing himſelfe ready either to beſiege the caſtle, or to keepe the field. The French ſtanding in doubt of which to make choice, the proud old F Turk ſcorning their ſlow reſolution, & them alſo, as men vnfit for the ready accompliſhment of any martiall exploit; cauſed 7 pieces of batterie, whereof 2 were of wonderful greatnes, to be placed in a trice in a place moſt conuenient, & the ſame quickly intrenched and fortified, to the great admiratiō of the French: with which pieces he had quickly beaten down the battlements of the wals, & contincl houſes, ſo that no man was able to ſhew himſelf vpon the wals.
The caſtle beſieged.

The

The Frenchmen likewise on the other side did with their great ordnance continually b… the castle: but with long shooting they came to such want of shot and pouder, that Polinus glad to request, that he might either borrow or buy some of Barbarussa: whereat the T… fretted and fumed exceedingly, That they should in their owne countrey stand in need … prouision, who at Marceilles had better fraughted their ships with wine, than with nec… for the wars. Yet for all that, when he had chafed … by the faire intreatance and large promises of the French Generall & Polinus together, the wayward old man was perswaded to change his minde, and to continue the siege. But he was yet scarcely well pacified, and his mind set againe vpon the siege, but letters were intercepted from the great captaine Alphonsius Vastius, to Paulus captaine of the castle, wherein he requested him to hold out a while against the enemy, till that he, who had alreadie sent before his light horsmen, might come also himselfe with his men at arms, who were vpon the way alongst the Alps by the sea side, and would in two daies with the slaughter of the Turks put him and his castle out of all feare and danger. Which thing once bruted in the camp, such a great and sudden feare came vpon the Turkes and Frenchmen (the night following the more to terrifie them prouing by chance very rainy and tempestuous) that they all forsooke their trenches and great ordnance, and laying down their weapons, by narrow pathes climing ouer the top of the high mountaine, came downe headlong to the sea side to the fleet. But the day appearing, and no enemie to be seene, they were ashamed of that they had done, and came againe to the siege.

Barbarussa in his rage threatneth to lay hands on Polinus, and to return forthwith to Constantinople.

The Turks and French giue ouer the castle of Nice, and set fire on the city.

Not long after, when as the castle in all mens iudgement was hardly to be battered, and standing vpon a firme rocke, was not but in long time with hard labour and doubtfull successe to be vndermined, it was generally thought good to raise the siege. The Turks vpon their departure brake into the citie, and when they had taken the spoile thereof, set it on fire.

Barbarussa retiring with his fleet to Antipolis, came to anker at the Island Lerina, called of the mariners Margarita; at which time Vastius and the duke of Sauoy, with Auria his fleet arriued at Villa Franca: in the entrance of which hauen, the gallie wherein Vastius went, was like to haue bin lost. Foure other gallies by force of sudden tempest were driuen vpon the rockes, and so suddenly beaten in pieces with the surge of the sea, that the gallie slaues had not leisure to strike off their yrons, but were there all drowned, and all the ordnance lost. Polinus vnderstanding this distresse of the enemie, sent one Petrus Angelus to Barbarussa, to shew him the occasion offered, and to persuade him with al speed to hast thither with his fleet, as to a most assured victorie. Barbarussa seemed to like well of the motion, and promised to goe, yet he moued not, letted as it was thought with the contrary wind, which then blew hard at East, & with the roughnesse of the sea. But the wind being fallen, and the sea become calme, and he contrary to his wonted manner making no hast, set slowly forward, & being a little on his way, came againe to anker, and went no further; the Sanzackes and other captaines first maruelling, and afterward laughing thereat, scoffingly said, That Barbarussa did but reason to deale kindely with Auria, as his brother and friend of his owne profession, for that he had some yeares before receiued the like friendship at his hands, in letting him escape at Hippona, which he now honestly paied him againe. Whereunto Barbarussa both then and afterwards at Constantinople answered no otherwise, but, that he being an old commander, and halfe blind, saw more in the matter than all those greene captaines with their sharpe sight. Not long after, hee returned againe to Marceilles, and put into the hauen of Tolon, called in antient time Taurenta. Vastius and the Duke comming to Nice, commended the Captaine of the Castle, and wondering at the cunning manner of the Turkes fortifications, preferred them in that point before the Christians. Barbarussa lying with his fleet at Tolon, and by the Kings officers entertained with all possible courtesie, deliuered fiue and twentie gallies to Salec the famous pyrat, and Assanes Barbarussa deuided by the Turks captains.

Muleasses fearing the comming of Barbarussa, departeth from Tunes into Italy, to craue aid of Charles the emperour.

This Mahometan King, once before thrust out of his kingdome by Barbarussa, and restored againe by Charles the Emperor (as is before declared) hearing of his comming with this great fleet, and imagining nothing lesse than that he should come to the aid of the most Christian king, doubted (not without cause) lest it was prepared against himself. Besides that, diuers great cities of his kingdome, namely Constantina, Mahemedia, and Mahomera (called in antient time Cyrtha) Leptis, & Adrumentum, were then holden by the Turks Barbarussa's fauorits. Wherefore fearing the worst, about the same time that Barbarussa was sailing alongst the coast of Italie, he passed ouer into Sicilie to haue met the Emperor at Genoa, and to haue obtained of him greater aid against the Turks. At his departure out of Affricke, he committed the tuition of his kingdome to such valiant men as he supposed would haue bin vnto him most faithfull: First, he he appointed Mahometes (then Maniphæt) to gouerne the city, and Corsus (otherwise called Fares) his old seruant to keepe the castle; leauing Mahometes his brother, and Fares his sonne, with Touarres a Spaniard (captaine of the castle of Guletta) as pledges, the one of his brothers, the other of his fathers faith: but vnto Amida his sonne he committed the leading of his men of war for the defence of his kingdome against the Turks and Numidians. As he was passing out of Sicilia to haue met the Emperour at Genoa, he was by contrary windes driuen first to Caieta, and afterward to Naples, where he was by the Viceroy honorably entertained, & a house appointed for him richly furnished: the Neopolitans wondering at the strange attire of the people, with the manner of their feeding, and curious plentie of all manner of sweet perfumes; for into euery dish they put in odors of exceeding price, so that it was well known, that a peacocke and to pheasants dressed after the maner of the kings kitchen, cost aboue an hundred duckats: so that not only the dining chamber, when they were carued vp, but all the house was so filled with the strange and fragrant smell, that all they that dwelt neere thereabouts were partakers of that vnusuall and delicate perfume. From Naples he was about to haue trauelled by land vnto the Emperor, being then in conference with the Pope at Buxetum (fearing to aduenture the sea, possessed by the enemies fleet) had not the Emperor by his letters willed him to stay still where he was. But whilest he made his abode at Naples, and carefully attended what course Barbarussa would take, (who furnished with so great a fleet, was departed from Nice disappointed of his purpose) he was by certaine messengers aduertised out of Affrica, That Amida his sonne was risen vp against him, and possessing himselfe of the kingdome, had slaine his captaines, polluted his wiues, and taken the castle of Tunes. With which newes he being exceedingly troubled, determined without delay to passe ouer into Affricke, & though late, yet as he might to remedie his domesticall troubles, in hope to oppresse that rebellion in the beginning, and his sonne also, before he could gather any strength to rest vpon. Wherfore he with all the haste he could opened his coffers and entertained soldiers, the Viceroy giuing leaue to all such banished men as would, to come and giue their names to passe ouer as souldiers into Affricke: vpon report whereof, such a number of malefactors and condemned persons came flocking to Naples, that it was thought a sufficient army might haue beene made of such kinde of men; euery one of them chusing rather to enter into pay, and blot out the infamie of banishment, and proue the fortune of wars, than to liue wandring vp & down the woods and in danger euery houre to be hanged. Of these infamous men, one Ioannes Baptista Lofredius (a man well borne, but of a fierce and couetous disposition) vndertooke the leading: he co-

Amida riseth against Muleasses his father, & vsurps the kingdome of Tunes.

Muleasses returneth into Affricke to Guletta.

Mahometes surnamed Adulzes, whom Muleasses was wont commonly to call his worst seruant.
These two with a few others conspiring together, gaue it out, that Muleasses was dead at Naples, and before his death had most irreligiously (as they accounted it) reuolted to the Christian religion. With which report they perceiuing Amida mooued, came vnto him and persuaded him quickely to enter into his fathers seat, left Mahometes his yonger brother (then lying in hostage with the Christians at Guletta) should by the fauour and helpe of Touarres, whose garrison was euer readie, be preferred before him. For Mahometes was eighteene yeres old, I resembling his grandfather in name, fauor, and disposition, and therefore of the citisens of Tunes best beloued. Wherefore Amida came in post hast out of the campe to Tunes, to lay first hand vpon his fathers kingdome. The people which as yet had heard nothing of the Kings death, receiued him with doubtfull countenance: and as many stood maruelling that hee was so rashly come into the city without his fathers commandement, Mahometes (appointed by Muleasses to gouerne the city) came out and sharpely reproued him as guiltie of high treason, Amida thrust out of Tunes. persuading him to returne againe into the campe: and seeing him stay, by force of multitude thrust him out of the city. Amida deceiued of his expectation, got him out of the way into the pleasant country of Martia betweene Vtica and the ruines of old Carthage. But Mahometes gouernor of the city, after he had repulsed Amida, got him with all speed by water to Touarres K at Guletta, to know of him more assuredly, if any such euill newes were brought from Sicilie of the death of the King; and to complaine of the rashnesse and intollerable presumption of Amida. Where staying somewhat long in discoursing with the Captaine, and afterwards returning to the citie, he was suspected to haue practised with the captaine, to make Mahometes (the pledge in Guletta) King in his fathers stead; for so the common voice went. The Moores are by nature a faithlesse people, hastie, suspicious, desirous of newes, which true or false, they for the time interpret as serueth best their factions, whereunto they are exceedingly giuen. So at the first there rose in the city a doubtfull rumor of the making of a new king; the suspicion whereof more and more increasing, set all the city on an vprore. By occasion whereof, certaine of the citisens to whom the very name of Muleasses was odious, speedily certified Ami- L da (then in the gardens of Martia, sighing and grieuing at his hard fortune) how all stood, and that now was the time to do himselfe good. He reuiued with that vnexpected newes, and en-hold vpon that good offer of fortune, which would not alwaies frown, and to follow his good hap. So in hast returning to Tunes, and entring in at the gate, which he then found open, ran presently to the gouernors house, and finding him not at home, cruelly slew all his houshold, and with his bloudie company went presently to the castle: where Fares the Captaine seeking to haue kept him out, and boldly laid hands vpon his horses bridle to haue thrust him backe, was by a desperat Æthyopian one of Amida his followers, thrust thorow with a sword and slaine: ouer whose bodie yet sprawling, Amida forcing his horse, brake into the castle with his friends, and finding Mahometes gouernor of the City, presently slew him also. And so by this M meanes Amida in the space of an houre (a little before, a man in dispaire) obtained the city, the castle, and the kingdome togither. After that, he murthered his yonger brethren, and embrued

A by Touarres the Spaniard, not to aduenture with such a handfull of men to go to Tunes, before he were well assured of the good disposition of the Citisens towards him: and was the more earnest with Lofredius not to go, because the Viceroy had expresly written, That he should in no case go any further than Guletta, except the King according to his promise had a good strength of the Numidians to ioyne with him. But certaine of the Noblemen amongst the Moores, which vnder the colour of friendship were fled out of the Citie, and had after the solemne manner of their nation put their swords vnto their throats, and sworne to be faithful vnto him; wonderfully prickt forward both the King and Lofredius (too hastie of themselues to their owne destinie) bearing them in hand, That Amida vpon the first sight of his father would B forsake the city, and betake himselfe to flight. So without more staying, Muleasses with Ensigne displaied set forward towards Tunes, Lofredius cheerefully following him; Touarres requesting them in vaine to beware of the Moores trecherie. Muleasses marching still forward, Mu'easses going to Tunes, by the way ouerthrowne.
was come so nigh the citie, that they might from the walls descrie him; when suddenly a strong troupe of Moores sallied out of the gate with a terrible crie, and fiercely assailed him: whom the Kings horsemen valiantly receiued, many falling on both sides. Muleasses in this hot skirmish fighting couragiously against his enemies, was wounded in the face, and bled exdingly; which so discouraged them about him, that they doubting of his life, turned their backes and fled: when presently a wonderfull number of horse and foot suddenly issuing out of the oliue gardens, had beset Lofredius and his souldiers round: vpon whom the Italians discharged certaine field pieces: but after they had once discharged them, they had no leisure to C charge them againe; for the barbarous enemy came on so thicke and so fast, that the Italians seeing themselues too weake, and compassed in round, let fall their weapons as men discouraged, and cast themselues into the lake, so by swimming and taking hold of the little boats, to saue themselues from the enemies sword: which boats stood those distressed men in great stead; for being furnished with small pieces, they did beat backe the Moores, who eagerly pursued them euen into the lake with their horses. Lofredius as a man amased with the sud- Lofredius slaine den comming of the enemy, tooke the lake with his horse, and was there vnhorsed by the ene-mie and slaine, as were diuers with him. Some few there were that fought couragiously, chu-sing rather honorably to die in the midst of their enemies, than shamefully to be strangled in the stinking lake. Muleasses soiled with his owne bloud and with the dust, flying amongst the Muleasses taken.
D rest, was knowne and taken: nothing more bewraying him than his odoriferous perfumes. In this conflict 1300 Italians were lost; the rest which escaped Touarres relieued, and shortly after shipped them ouer into Sicilie, from whence they trauelled home to Naples, but so poore, as well shewed the miserie of their fortune. Amida hauing thus obtained the victory, was more carefull of nothing than to make his father vnfit for gouernment, which he did by cutting the Amida put out his fathers and brethrens eies.
sight of both his eyes with a hot penknife: the like crueltie he vsed vpon Nahazar and Ab- dallas his brethren, then taken with his father. After that, he certified Touarres Captaine of Guletta, That he had taken a few youths prisoners, which hee would deliuer vnto him; and that he had bereft his father of his sight, who had deserued a worse punishment, as he that had long before done the like to his brethren; but had yet left him his life, as an example to other E tyrants, and to shew that he dealt not altogether vnmercifully with so perfideous a father: Last of all, he confirmed (vpon certaine conditions) the same league which his father had with him: which he well saw was to great purpose, especially in the newnesse of his kingdome.
Neither did Touarres refuse the same, as standing with his present profit: for vpon this agreement, Amida was to giue him certaine money to pay his souldiers, and to deliuer him the prisoners he had taken, with the ensignes and bodie of Lofredius. For more assurance whereof he gaue Sebites his son then nine yeres old, in hostage, yet vpon condition, that if an assured peace could not be agreed vpon, but that they must needs enter into war, then Touarres should forthwith restore him his sonne Sebites in safetie. These capitulations, although they seemed not vnreasonable, and were of them well liked; yet Touarres thought it not altogether agreeing F with the honour of the Emperor, that he should enioy the kingdome, who by most horrible treason and detestable villanie had thrust himselfe thereinto without the Emperours leaue.
Wherfore he entred into a new deuice to call in the rightfull heire, who might at the Empetors pleasure (offended with the iniurie done by Amida) raigne in Tunes.

There was an exile amongst the Numidians one Abdamaleeh, euer since the time that Rof- cetes fled to Barbarussa. Him, becauſe he was Muleaſſes naturall brother, Touarres ſent for, [illegible] ting him in hope of the kingdome, ſupported by Anemſeha a great Prince a[illegible] the Numidians, who had all that long time curteouſly entertained him. Neither wa[illegible]melech ſlow to accept the occaſion preſented, eſpecially incouraged thereunto by the [illegible]ian prince his good friend, and the predictions of the Aſtrologers, who had foretold hi[illegible] he ſhould d- king of Tunes. Which vain kinde of diuination hauing in it no manner of aſſu[illegible]ce, yet great mindes oftentimes to vndertake great attempts beyond reaſon, which falling [illegible] more hap than they were with reaſon foretold, giueth ſome credit to that vanitie, and cau[illegible]h thoſe cold prophets to be of ſome accounted as great wiſards. And to wor[illegible] this feat, ſi- time was offered, as a better could not be wiſhed: for Amida hauing ſet all [illegible] he pleaſed in the city, and caſting no perill, was gone to Biſerta, to take [illegible] ſtomes, which was there great vpon fiſhing. Wherefore Touarres to keepe h[illegible] backe Sehites, Amida's ſon, in a boat to Tunes, and receiued Abdamelech: who t[illegible]acilling a part by night, was ſecretly come to Guletta, and there reſting himſelf & his horſes a few how- ers, to preuent the fame of his comming, poſted in haſt with a troupe of his Numidian follow- ers to Tunes, and paſſing thorow the city, went directly to the caſtle, which he entred without reſiſtance of the warders, ſuppoſing him to haue bin Amida come from Biſerta: for Abdamelech had after the manner of the Moores couered his face with a skarfe, as if it had bin to haue kept him from the Sun & the duſt, and by that happy ſlight got into the caſtle before it was known who he was. The warders perceiuing their errour, began as men amaſed now too late to be- take themſelues to their weapons, for in making reſiſtance they were quickly ſlain by the Nu- midians which came in with Abdamelech; who thus poſſeſſed of the caſtle (the chiefe ſtrength of that kingdome) let in his friends, which were many in the city, by whome he was preſently ſalute d king: the reſt of the Cuiſens either well liking of the matter, or at leaſt not daring for feare to ſtir. But as in theſe worldly things, for which men ſo vainly toile, is no aſſurance, ſo this new king ſhortly after fell ſicke and died, when he had raigned but 26 daies, and was afterwards roially interred. After whoſe death, his mightie friends, with the chiefe of the citiſens (per- ſuaded & incouraged by Touarres the Spaniard) choſe Mahometes his ſon (a child ſcarce twelue yeres old) to raigne in his fathers place; appointing Abdalages Maniphæt (brother to him who Amida ſlew) Abdelchirinus Meſuar, Schyriffus (a great man in their Mahometan ſuperſtition) and Perellus a Chriſtian knight, to be his directers and gouernours: which toure ſwaied all at their pleaſure. But Abdelchirinus tendring the welfare of his country, and deuiſing out of ſeaſon how to ſet vp one of the roiall bloud that were of himſelfe able to gouerne the kingdome (ſaying, That it was not for the common good to be ruled by a child) was for his labour by his other three fellows ſuddenly ſlain, with all his kindred and knowne friends. After whoſe death the other three erected a manner of Triumvirat gouernment, euery one of them laying hand vpon one part of the ſtate or other, as liked him beſt. Amida thus ſhut out of Tunes, and hauing loſt his kingdome, wandred vp and down to Leptis, Cyrapolis, and many other places, craning aid of euery man to recouer his kingdome, miſerably rent in ſunder (as he ſaid) by moſt wicked men who inſolently triumphed ouer the boy king. Which they of Tunes knew wel to be true, and daily complained of the death of Abdelchirinus, whom they called the faithfull Counſel- lor and father of his country. Whileſt Amida is thus trudging vp and downe, craning helpe of this and that prince, prouing his friends, and ſounding his ſubiects affection towards him; Mu- leaſſes grown miſerable with his long impriſonment & the calamity of his diſaſter fortune, ob- tained of the yong king his nephew ſo much fauour, as that he might ſometime go out of the caſtle to the church: vnder colour wherof he tooke ſanctuarie, a place in Tunes holden in ſuch reuerence amongſt the Moores, as that it was a moſt inuiolable refuge to all ſuch as fled there- unto. Not long after, at ſuch time as Bernardinus Mendoza the Admirall of Spain came to Gu- letta with the Spaniſh fleet, Muleaſſes at the requeſt of Touarres was conueyed out of the San- ctuarie to the Lake, and ſo by water to Guletta, there to be preſent at the conſultation there holden for the vtter ſubuerſion of Amida and the driuing out of the Turks out of ſuch cities as they yet held alongſt the ſea coaſt in Affrica. Muleaſſes had hardly before eſcaped the hand[illegible]traine of his enemies in Tunes, who ſough[illegible]after his life; preſerued by an old wo- ma[illegible]mooued with pitty, hid him from their fu[illegible]nder a great heape of garlike: and he[illegible]ow in good time eſcaped to Guletta, [illegible] againe fallen into the hands of his merci-

A mercileſſe ſonne Amida, who ſhortly after recouered againe his kingdome, and would not as he ſaid himſelfe, haue ſpared him for the reuerence of any Sanctuarie. For the citiſens of Tu- nes wearie of the euill gouernment of ſuch as were in authority about the yong king, and not a little offended with the King himſelfe, for eſpouſing Meluca his couſin one of Muleaſſes his daughters, ſecretly encouraged Amida by letters, to repaire to the city, promiſing to aid him in recouering his kingdome. Whereupon he came in ſuch haſte, that the yong king had ſcarce time to get out of the citie: and Amida entring without reſiſtance, and holpen by his friends, eaſily obtained againe the kingdome, and exerciſed moſt exquiſit cruelty vpon his enemies: of whom he cauſed ſome to be torne in pieces and deuoured of fierce maſtiues kept hungrie for that purpoſe: Perellus he cauſed to be tortured, his ſecrets to be cut off, and himſelfe after- B wards burnt to aſhes in the market place.

Amida recouereth the Kingdome of Tunes, and taketh sharp reuenge vpon his enemies.

But Muleaſſes ſtaied not long at Guletta, offended with the couetouſneſſe of Touarres, who (as he ſaid) had not faithfully reſtored ſuch things as he had before put him in truſt withall, but had fraudulently in his miſerie deceiued him of part of his rich houſhold ſtuffe, with certaine notable precious ſtones, and ſome of his treaſure: whereof the blinde king ſo grieuouſly com- plained to Charles the Emperor, that for deciding the matter, they were both commanded to repaire vnto him into Germany: where in concluſion to end the ſtrife, Touarres was diſcharged of his gouernment, and Muleaſſes ſent into Sicilie, there to be kept of the common charge of that rich Iſland. Muleaſſes by the way comming to Rome, was honourably feaſted by Cardi- nall Farneſius: at which time he ſhewed himſelfe both in his apparell and behauiour not for- C getfull of his better fortune: and being brought vnto the preſence of Paulus the great Biſhop, would do him no greater honor but to kiſſe his knee, accounting it too great an indignitie to haue kiſſed his foot. He was of ſtature tall, and of a princely diſpoſition, vnworthie of ſo hard a fortune, had he not in the like manner before vnmercifully dealt with his owne brethren.

Barbaroſſa wearie of his long lying to ſo ſmall purpoſe in Prouince, requeſted the French king either thorowly to imploy him, or elſe to giue him leaue to depart: offering if he ſo plea- ſed, to ſpoile all alongſt the coaſt of Spaine, from the mountaine Pyrænei to Cadiz. But he not ignorant what hard ſpeeches ran of him alreadie in all parts of Chriſtendome, for bringing in the Turks, was loath to leaue vnto the memorie of all poſterity the foule remembrance of ſo wofull a ſlaughter: beſides that, he was adaiſed to diſburden his country of ſuch trouble ſome D gueſts, who rouing about, did much harme in the prouince where they lay, and as it was re- ported, now and then ſnatcht vp one country peaſant or other, and chained them for ſlaues in their gallies. Wherefore in ſupply of the Turks that were dead, the king gaue vnto Barbaroſſa all the Mahometan ſlaues in his gallies, to the number of about foure hundred, and furniſhing him with all kinde of prouiſion, and beſtowing great gifts vpon him and his captaines, ſent him away; and with him Strozza with certaine gallies, his Embaſſador to Solyman. So the Turkes departing out of Prouince, kept alongſt the coaſt vntill they came neere vnto Sauona, whither the Germans ſent diuers preſents and freſh victuals to Barbaroſſa; which he tooke ſo thankful- ly, that he proteſted not to hurt any of their territorie. From thence he kept a right courſe to the Iſland of Elba belonging to the duke of Florence, ouer againſt Populona; where vnder- E ſtanding that one of the ſonnes of Sinan his old friend was there kept priſoner, hee writ vnto Appianus gouernor of the Iſland, for his deliuerance, to this effect:

Barbaroſſa his letters to Appianus Gouernor of Elba.

I know that a young man a Turke ſerueth thee, the ſonne of Sinan ſirnamed the Iew (a famous Cap- taine) taken of late at Tunes: him I would haue thee friendly to reſtore: which gift I will make thee to vnderſtand to be vnto me moſt acceptable: for this our great fleet in paſſing by you ſhall faithfully for- beare to vſe any hoſtilitie. But if thou ſhalt in this ſo ſmall a matter refuſe to gratifie me, expect vpon the coaſt of thy country all the harmes that an angrie enemie can do.

Whereunto Appianus (ſhewing his men vpon the wals, in token that he was not affraid) an- F ſwered, That the yong man was become a Chriſtian, and therfore might not in any caſe be de- liuered to the Turks: but that he would in any other thing gratifie him in what he could, and for his ſake vſe the yong man as his ſon. And to mollifie the vnkindeneſſe of his anſwer, he ſent him freſh victuall with other preſents. But Barbaroſſa offended with the anſwer, landed his men round about the Iſland, and commanded them to make what ſpoile they could: which they performed accordingly, hunting the Iſland people vp and downe the rockes and mountaines like hares; vntill that Appianus not without cauſe doubting the vtter ſpoile of the Iſland, redeemed his peace by deliuering the young man to Salec the pyrat, who brought him to Barbaruſſa gallantly attired after the Italian manner; of whome he was ioyfully receiued as the ſonne of a moſt valiant Captaine his old friend: and thereupon Barbaruſſa ſtaied his ſouldiers from doing any further harme vpon the Iſland, and gaue Appianus great thanks for him. This young man Barbaruſſa honored with the command of ſeuen gallies, and afterwards ſent him to his father then lying at Suetia a port of the red ſea, Admirall againſt the Portingals, who greatly troubled thoſe ſeas. But the old Iew ouerioyed with the ſudden and vnexpected returne of his ſonne, whom he had for many yeares before giuen as loſt, in embracing him ſo preſently for ioy died.

Appianus glad to redeeme the captiue whom Barbaruſſa required.

Sinan the Iew dieth for ioy.

This man for valour was accounted little inferiour to Barbaruſſa, but for diſcretion and dealing far beyond him, nothing of ſo furious and waiward a diſpoſition as was he. Barbaruſſa departing from Elba, came into the bay of Telamon in Tuſcany, and in ſhort time tooke the city, which he ſpoiled and burnt, but eſpecially the houſe of Bartholomeus Telamonius; whoſe dead bodie but a little before buried, he cauſed to be pluckt out of the graue, and his bones to be ſcattered abroad, becauſe he being Admiral of the Biſhop of Rome's gallies, had in the Iſle of Lesbos waſted Barbaruſſa's fathers poore poſſeſſion: and marching by night eight miles farther into the land, ſurpriſed Montenum, and carried almoſt all the inhabitants away with him into captiuitie. The like miſchiefe he did at the port called Portus Herculis, but purpoſing to haue taken Orhatello, and there to haue fortified, he was by Luna & Vitellius (two valiant captaines before ſent thither, the one by the State of Siena, & the other by the duke of Florence) repulſed. So though diſappointed of his purpoſe, yet hauing done great harme, and put the whole country of Tuſcany in exceeding feare, he departed from thence and landed againe at Igilium, now called Gigio, an Iſland about twelue miles diſtant from Portus Herculis, where he quickly battered the towne, and carried a wonderfull number of all ſorts into miſerable captiuitie: keeping on his courſe, he paſſing the cape Linar, and comming ouer againſt Cantumcelle, had burnt that city for the ſame reaſon he did Telamon, had he not been otherwiſe perſuaded by Strozza the French Embaſſador, fearing to draw the French king into further obliquie. From thence he came with a direct courſe to the Iſland of Ischia; where landing in the night, he intercepted moſt part of the Inhabitants of the Iſland, as they were flying into the mountaines: and in reuenge of the hatred he had conceiued againſt Vaſtius at the ſiege of Nice, he burnt Forino, Panſa, and Varranium, three chiefe townes of that Iſland; but Pithacuſa the dwelling place of Vaſtius, ſtanding vpon a broken rocke ſomwhat diſtant from the ſea, he durſt not aduenture vpon. Then ſcraping along the Iſland Prochita with leſſe hurt, becauſe moſt part of the inhabitants were before fled to Pithacuſa, he put into the bay of Puteoli, and ſent Salec the pirat with part of his fleet, to make proofe if the citie of Puteoli might from ſea be battered. Salec drawing neere the citie, ſhot into it with his great ordnance, and by chance ſlew one Saauedra a valiant Spaniard, vpon the walls, and put the Citiſens in a great feare leſt the whole fleet ſhould haue landed, they themſelues as then vnprouided: but the Viceroy came preſently with a power both of horſe and foot from Naples: which Barbaruſſa diſcouering from ſea as they came downe the mountaines, called backe Salec; and leauing the Iſland of Capri, and paſſing by the promontorie Atheneum, was about to haue ſeiſed vpon Salernum, when a tempeſt ſuddenly ariſing diſperſed his Fleet, and draue him beyond the promontorie Palinurus vpon the coaſt of Calabria, where he did exceeding much harme, eſpecially at Carreato. From thence he departed to the Iſland of Lipari, betwixt Italie and Sicilie, which Iſland he miſerably ſpoiled, and with fortie great pieces ſo battered the Citie, that the citiſens were conſtarined for feare to yeeld, whom he carried away all priſoners about the number of ſeuen thouſand, of one ſort of people and other, and burnt the Citie. So loaded with the rich ſpoile of Italie and the Iſlands vpon the coaſt, he returned towards Conſtantinople with ſuch a multitude of poore Chriſtian captiues, ſhut vp ſo cloſe vnder hatches amongſt the excrements of Nature, that all the way as he went almoſt euery houre ſome of them were caſt dead ouer boord: euerie man deteſting the endleſſe hatred betwixt the Emperor and the French King, the verie ground of all that and many thouſand other moſt wofull [illegible] deſerued calamities of the poore ſubiects. With this rich prey and an infi-

Solyman triumphing at Conſtantinople of the good ſucceſſe he had in Hungarie; in the mideſt of all his glorie, was aduertiſed of the death of Mahomet his eldeſt ſonne, whom of all his children hee held deereſt: whoſe dead bodie was ſhortly after brought from Magneſia, and with wonderfull ſolemnitie, and no leſſe mourning, buried at Conſtantinople. How entirely Solyman loued this his ſonne, well appeared by the great ſorrow hee conceiued of his death; and not contented to haue built him a ſtately tombe, erected alſo in memorial of him a Mahometan Church, called the Church of Mahomet the Leſſer: for the difference of Mahomet the B the Great who woon Conſtantinople. Where unto hee alſo annexed a monaſteric and a colledge, with many things moe after the groſſe maner of their ſuperſtition, for the health of his ſoule, as he vainely ſuppoſed. After that, Solyman according to his wonted manner, which was but euery ſecond or third yere to take in hand ſome notable expedition, ceaſed from wars by the ſpace of two yeres: in which time many of the great princes and worthie men of that age died; amongſt whom was Francis the French king. Hariadenus Barbaruſſa that famous Turke of whom we haue ſo often ſpoken, who being of great yeares and no leſſe fame, left this life in the yeare 1547, and was buried at a houſe of his owne called Beſictas, neere vnto Boſphorus Thracius on Europe ſide, not farre from the mouth of Euxinum, about foure miles from Pera, where he had but few yeares before at one time ſold about ſixteene thouſand Chriſtian C tiues, taken out of Corcyra: and to make famous that place appointed for his buriall, he of his owne coſt built there a Mahometan Temple, there yet with his ſepulchre to be ſeene: That place was in antient time called Iaſonium. About which time alſo, died of conceit that famous captaine Alphonſus Daualus Vaſtius, taken away by vntimely death when he had liued but fortie fiue yeares. At which time, Charles the Emperour by his embaſſadour Gerardus Veltunich, concluded a peace with Solyman for fiue yeares, wherein King Ferdinand was alſo included: which peace was afterwards before the expiration thereof, by Solyman (at the requeſt of Henry the French king) broken.

Solyman had now almoſt three yeares taken his reſt, when it fortuned that Ercaſes Imirza, king of Siruan, moued with the often iniuries of Tamas his brother the great Perſian king, fled D to Solyman at Conſtantinople, to craue aid of him againſt his brother. Solyman glad of ſuch an occaſion to worke vpon, entertained him with all courteſie, and promiſed to take vpon him his quarrell, & to protect him againſt his vnnaturall brother. And when he had made al things readie for ſo great an expedition, paſſed ouer into Aſia, and after long and painfull trauell entred at laſt with a puiſſant armie into Armenia, & there in the borders of the Perſian kingdom, firſt beſieged the citie of Van, which after ten daies ſiege was yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, that the Perſian ſouldiers there in garriſon, might with life and libertie depart with their armes as ſouldiers: which was at the firſt by Solyman granted, and ſo the citie ſurrendred. From thence Solyman ſent his chiefe commanders with a great part of his army, to burne and ſpoile the the enemies countrey, which they for a time cheerfully performed; and running far E into the countrey, ſtriue as it were amongſt themſelues who ſhould doe moſt harme: where Imirza among the reſt, for whoſe ſake Solyman had vndertaken this war, was as forward as the beſt to waſt & ſpoile his brothers kingdome, ſparing nothing that came to hand; the beſt and richeſt things he got, he preſented to Solyman, to draw him on ſtill in that war. But that ſerued not his turne to recouer again his kingdome of Siruan: for Tamas, without ſhewing any power to withſtand the Turks, had after his wonted maner, cauſed his people to withdraw themſelues far into the mountain country, leauing nothing behind them in that waſt country to relieue thē but the bare ground: ſo that the farther the Turks went, the more they wanted, without hope of better ſucceſſe than ſuch as they had before to their loſſe made proofe of, in their former expeditions into that great kingdome. The conceit whereof ſo much pierced not the F common ſouldiers onely, but euen the captains themſelues; that to make an end of that long and vnprofitable warre, taken in hand for another mans good, they conſpired amongſt themſelues either to kill Imirza, or elſe to diſgrace him with Solyman: Which they ſo cunningly wrought; ſome ſuggeſting falſe ſuſpitions of his trecherous dealing in the proceeding of that war; and others with like craft, vnder colour of friendſhip giuing him warning in ſecret of the danger he was in: the one filling Solymans head with distrust, and the other Imirza with feare; bribde to shut the matter vp in the howne termes. They perswaded the hare to flie, & the hounds to follow. Imirza doubting some sudden mischiefe, fled for succour to an old acquaintance of his one of the princes of Chaldea, who most treacherously sent him in bonds to his brother his most cruell enemy, who glad to haue the author of all his troubles with the Turks, deliuered into his hands, caused him in prison, and that Solyman nor any other should in his behalfe turther prosecute the warre, by his meanes hope for victory, caused him to be in prison murthered. In this expedition against the Persian king, Solyman was occupied a yere and nine month all which time the Turkes endured great troubles, and were oftentimes hardly distressed by the Persians: vntill at last Solyman himselfe wearie of that tedious warre, where neither honour nor profit was sought it best so to make an end, and thereupon concluded a truce with the Persian king, and returned to Constantinople in the yeare 1549.

1550 In the meane time it fortuned, that one Dragut Raises a notable pyrat of the Turks, had priuily surprised the citie of Affrica in the kingdome of Tunes (called in antient time Aphrodisium) and also Leptis Parua (and now of the Moores called Mahamedia) and there setling himselfe, as in a place both commodious and of good assurance, exceedingly troubled the Christians both by sea and land, especially such as traded in the Mediterranean. So that the Emperor, moued as wel with the manifold iniuries don by that arch-pyrat vpon the frontiers of his dominions, as by the daily complaint of his poore subiects, commanded the Viceroy of Sicilie, and Auria his Admirall, to leuie a sufficient power in time to represse that pyrat, before he grew to farther strength. Whereupon, they with a strong fleet well manned and thorowly appointed for that purpose, and aided by the knights of Malta, passed ouer into Affricke, and landing their forces, by the space of three moneths besieged the citie before possessed by the pyrat, which with continual batterie they had at length made saultable. And hearing that Dragut was comming with a new supply to relieue it, they with all celeritie assailed it both by sea and land, & in the space of a few hours took it by force the 10 day of September in the yere 1550 in which assault many of the enemies were slaine, and the rest taken. Auria hauing thus dispossessed the pyrat, and aduisedly considering that the citie was not without an infinite charge to be holden by the Christians, among so many of the Infidels, rased it down to the ground, carrying away with him 7000 captiues, and all the spoile of the citie. And not so contented, did all the harme he could with fire and sword all alongst the coast of Affrica, to the intent that the Turks should there find no relefe; and tooke 22 prisoners out of Monasterium, a town not far from the citie of Affrica: and so hauing done what he came for, returned againe into Sicilie. Dragut thus at once thrust out of all he had, with a few of his friends fled to Solyman to Constantinople, and so incensed him with the grieuous complaint of the wrong done vnto him by the Christians; that in reuenge thereof, he resolued to make war both vpon the Emperor and king Ferdinand, notwithstanding that the fiue yeares league hee had before taken with him at his going into Persia, was not yet expired. So with cheerfull words and courteous entertainment comforting vp the desperat pyrat, the Spring following (which was in the yeare 1551 1551.) he furnished him with a great fleet in most warlike manner appointed, to reuenge the iniurie done to him by Auria in Affricke. With this fleet in number 140 saile, Sinan one of the Turks great Bassaes, accompanied with Dragut the pyrat, by the appointment of Solyman, departed from Constantinople: and cutting thorow the seas, arriued at length in Sicilie, where they suddenly surprised the towne and castle of Augusta, which they presently sacked. Departing thence, they came to the Island of Malta, and there landed their men in the port of Marza, otherwise called Moxet, neere vnto the castle, which they battered with certain pieces of great ordnance, but so as was to no great purpose. At which time diuers companies of the Turks running further into the Island, made bauocke of whatsoeuer came in their way. After they had thus few daies in vaine battered the castle, and saw themselues both there valiantly repulsed, and in other places by ambushes and such like meanes cut off by the souldiers and inhabitants of the Island, they remoued thence to the road of S. Paul, where they landed their ordnance with purpose to haue besieged the citie: but perceiuing by a little, what small hope there was to preuaile, and seeing diuers of their men dying thorow the extremitie of the heat, they forsooke the Island and went to Gaules now called Gozo, a little Island about 30 miles in compasse, fiue miles distant from Malta Westward, subiect vnto the knights of the Religion at and there landing their men, miserably spoiled the Island; and whatsoeuer they light vpon, and carried away with them of one sort of people and other six thousand and three hundred captiues into most wofull bondage. With which bootie they put againe to sea, and framed directly to Tripolis in Barbarie, called of old Lepris Magna: which citie Charles the Emperour had before giuen to the knights of Malta, and was at that time by them kept. This citie was the marke whereat the Bassa and the pyrat shot; for taking whereof they landed their forces, and by long and winding trenches approched as neere the same as they could: Which they did not without great losse of their people; for they of the castle hauing good store of great ordnance, and most expert canoniers, did with continuall shot so annoy the Turks, that they were oftentimes inforced to retire; yet with much troublesome labour and no lesse perill, they came at last within eight hundred paces of the wals: where the Bassa caused his gabions made of thicke plankes, to be placed in the night; and his batterie planted. And the next day (which was the eighth of August) the cannon began to play, which was againe answered from the castle with like, and euery houre some of the Turkes slaine, the great shot still flying into their trenches, so as that day foure of the best canoniers in the armie were slaine, with certaine other men of good account also: and the clerke generall of the armie, a man of great estimation and wel beloued of the Bassa, had his hand shot off, and many other of the Ianizaries and common souldiers either slaine or hurt: moreouer they brake one of their best pieces, and dismounted foure others, which for that day made them to leaue the batterie. The next night the Turkes approched yet neerer vnto the castle, vpon whom the Christians in the breake of the day sallied out euen vnto their very trenches, and afterwards retired. With the rising of the Sun (which the Turks haue in great reuerence) they renued their batterie with greater force than before; yet with such euill successe, that the Bassa was almost mad for anger: for about the euening the fire by mischance got into their pouder, wherewith thirty of the Turks were burnt, many hurt, and one piece broken. At length the Turkes were come so neere, that they had planted their batterie within 150 paces of the wall; which they continued with such furie, that they had made a faire breach euen with the ditch: but what was beaten downe in the day time, the defendants repaired againe by night, in such sort, as that it was not to be assaulted. Yet in conclusion, a traiterous souldier of Prouince, before corrupted by the Turkes, found means to flie out of the castle into the campe, where he declared vnto the Bassa the weakest places of the castle, by which it might be most conueniently battered and soonest taken: and especially one place aboue the rest which was against the Gouernors lodgings; which standing towards the ditch, and hauing vnderneath it sellars to retire the munition into, could not if it were once batred, well be repaired againe or fortified. Which the Bassa vnderstanding, caused the batterie there to be planted, laying the pieces so low, that they did easily beat the sellars and vaults in such sort, that in short time the wals were so shaken, that the rampiers aboue thorow the continuall batterie, began greatly to sinke: which so amazed the souldiers, seeing no conuenient meanes to repaire the same, that setting all honour aside, they requested the Gouernor, That sithence the matter began now to grow desperat, and that the place was not longer to be holden, hee would in time take some good order with the enemie for their safetie, before the walls were further endamaged. With which motion, Vallier the Gouernor (an antient knight of Daulphinie, and one of the Order) was exceedingly troubled: which Peisieu another of the knights, perceiuing, he as a man of great courage, & of all others there present most antient, in the name of the other knights declared vnto them, That the breach was neither so great, nor so profitable for the enemy, but that it was defensible enough, if they would as men of courage repaire the same; saying, That it was more honourable for worthy Knights and lustie souldiers, to die valiantly with their weapons in their hands, fighting against the Infidels for the maintenance of their law and Christian religion, than so cowardly to yeeld themselues to the mercie of those, at whose hands nothing was to be looked for but most miserable seruitude, with all kind of cruëltie: and therefore perswaded the Couernour to hold it out to the last. For all that, he ouercome with the importunitie of such as would needs yeeld, who with all vehemencie vrged the imminent danger wherwith they were all like to be ouerwhelmed, and finding himselfe bereft both of heart and fortune, and forsaken of his souldiers, without farther consideration, consented that a white ensigne should bee displayed vpon the Walls, in token that they desired parley: When a Turke presenting himselfe, they requested him to vnderstand of the the Bassa, if he could be contented that some of them might come to intreat with him of some good order to be taken for the yeelding vp of the castle. Whereunto the Bass[illegible] ingly consenting, two of the knights were forthwith sent out, to offer vnto him the caste[illegible] th the artillerie and munition, so as he would furnish them with ships to bring them wit[illegible] & baggage safely to Malta. Whereunto the Bassa briefely answered, That (forasmuch as [illegible] y had as yet deserued no grace, presuming to keepe so small a place against the army of the greatest prince on earth) if they would pay the whole charges of the armie, he would condiscend to their request; or if they would not thereunto consent, that for recompence, all they within the castle should continue his slaues & prisoners: notwithstanding if they incontinently and without delay did surrender the pla[illegible]e would exempt out of them 200. Wherupon the me[illegible] turning in despaire, were [illegible] by Dragut and Salla Rais, with flatting words a[illegible] that they would so much [illegible]y in them, persuade the Bassa to condiscend to [illegible]ratious composition; fearing indeed that the besieged through despaire would resolue (as their extreme refuge) to defend the place euen to the last man. Wherefore they went presently to the Bassa, to declare vnto him his ouersight in refusing them who voluntarily would haue put themselues into his hands, whom reason would he should with all courtesie haue receiued: for that after he had the castle and the men in his power, he might dispose of them as he should thinke good. The Bassa liking well of his counsel, caused the messengers to be called again, & with fained & dissembling words told them, That at the instance of Dragut & Salla Rais there present, he did discharge them of all the costs & charges of the army, swearing vnto them (the better to deceiue them) by the head of his lord & his own, inuiolably to obserue all that he had promised vnto them: which they too easily beleeued, & forthwith went to declare the same to the Gouernor, & others within the castle. The Bassa, the better to come to the effect of his desire, after these messengers sent a craftie Turke, whom he charged expresly to persuade the gouernor to come with him into the camp, for the ful conclusion of the giuing vp of the castle, and for the appointing of such vessels as should be needful for their safe conduct to Malta; and that if he made any doubt to come, he should make shew as if he would there remaine in hostage for him; but aboue all things, to consider of the strength & assurance of the besieged, and of the disposition of all things there. Which the subtile Turke so finely handled, that the Gouernor by the counsell of those who had persuaded him to yeeld (notwithstanding the reasons of wars & duty of his office forbad him in such maner to abandon the place of his charge) resolued vpon so small an assurance of the Bassa, & gaue eare to the miserable end of his fortune. So taking with him a knight of his houshold (to send backe vnto those of the castle, to declare vnto them how he sped in the campe) vnder the conduct of the Turke that was come to fetch him, he went straight to the tent of the Bassa: who by the Turke that went first in, was aduertised of the small courage of the defendants, which hee assured him to be no better, but that if he thought it good, he might bring them to such order & agreement as he would himselfe. Vpon whose persuasion calling in the Gouernor Vallier, after he had rigorously reproued his rashnes, said vnto him, That forasmuch as he had once giuen his word, if he would pay the charges of the army, he was content to let them go with bag & baggage, otherwise he would discharge but two hundred. Whereat the Gouernor greatly moued, answered, That that was not according to his last promise vnto the knights before sent. But when he saw it would bee no better, he requested him that he might again returne to the castle to know the minds of the rest: which the false Bassa would by no means grant, but only permitted him to send back the knight that he had brought with him, to make report of these hard news to the besieged: as for the Gouernor, he was sent to the gallies with yrons on his heeles. When they of the castle vnderstood what had passed betwixt the Bassa & the Gouernor, they began exceedingly to feare the mischiefe then at hand: yet took no other resolution, but to return the said knight to the Bassa, to know whether they should expect from him no better answer. Who as soone as he was come before him, the captain of the castle was brought in, of whom the Bassa asked, Which of the two he would chuse, either to pay the expences of the army, or els both he & all the rest to remain his prisoners? Wherunto the Gouernor answered, That a slaue had no other authority than that which by his master was giuen him; & that hauing lost (besides his libertie) the power to command, if any thing were yet reserued in hi[illegible]id not counsel him to command others to agree vnto any thing, but that which was conclud[illegible] with them which were before sent. Which thing the Bassa hearing, for feare that such a resolute answer should come to the knowledge of the besieged, & cause them to become desperat; hauing taken counsell with his other captains, he tooke the Gouernour by the hand, and with a smiling and dissembling countenance told him, That he would without any doubt let them depart as he had promised; and that therfore without fearing any thing, he should cause them all to come out of the castle. But the Gouernour, because he had bin before deceiued, would not trust to his word, but said vnto him, That he might command him that was come from the castle, for that he knew they would now doe neuer a whit the more for him. So the Bassa turning towards the other knight, commanded him forthwith to goe vnto them in the castle, and to cause them to come forth, swearing againe as before, by the head of his great lord, and his owne, That they should all be deliuered and set at libertie, according to the conuentions first agreed vpon. Which the knight beleeuing, went to report to them this good newes: which they receiued with such ioy, that without further care or consideration of their mishap so neere, they ran in preasse with their wiues, children, and best mooueables, striuing who should first get out. But they were no sooner issued, but they were by the enemies spoiled of all they had, and taken prisoners; part of the knights were sent to the gallies, and the rest to the Bassa. Who being by the Gouernour put in remembrance of his faith twise giuen, answered, That there was no faith to be kept with dogs, and that they had first violated their oath with his great lord, vnto whom at the giuing ouer of the Rhodes, they had (as he said) sworne neuer more to beare armes against the Turks. The castle was forthwith taken and spoiled, and about two hundred Moores of that countrey that had serued the knights, cut in pieces, and thereupon, a great peale of ordnance discharged, with great cries and shouts in signe of their victorie. Thus the strong castle and antient citie of Tripolis in Barbarie was deliuered vnto the Turkes the fifteenth day of August, in the yeare 1551. Whilest the Bassa lay at this siege, the Lord of Arramont, who had many yeares lien embassadour from Francis the French king at Constantinople, and was now sent again by Henry the second, came to the Turkes campe, being requested so to doe by the great Master of the Rhodes, to haue dissuaded the Bassa from that siege: wherein he nothing preuailed. Yet now grieued to see how the faithlesse Turk, contrary to his oath, most villanously intreated the Gouernor and the other Knights, lying at his feet as men halfe desperat; was so bold as to put him in mind of his promise, confirmed by his oath; which if hee would not keepe, that yet at the least according to his owne voluntarie offer, he would release two hundred of them: but hee excused himself as before, saying, That no faith was to be kept with dogs, which had first broken their owne faith. Yet afterwards he condiscended, that two hundred of the eldest and such as were most vnfit for seruice (amongst whom was comprehended the Gouernour and certain other old knights) should be set at libertie; who were forthwith sent aboord the French Embassadours gallies, and by him transported to Malta: where they were but hardly welcome, for that they had so cowardly surrendred a place, which they might much longer haue defended. The next day after the castle was deliuered, which was the 16 of August, the proud Bassa for ioy of this victorie made a solemne dinner, whereunto he inuited the French embassadour, and Vallier the late Gouernor: which they refused not to come vnto, in hope to recouer some moe prisoners. This great feast for the more magnificence was kept in the castle ditch against the breach, where were set vp two stately pauillions, the one for the Bassa, and the other for the embassadour and his companie, where he was honourably feasted with wonderfull plentie both of flesh and fish and good wines, which they had found in the castle; which seruice was done with musicke of diuers sorts, and officers in number aboue a hundred, apparelled for most part in long gowns of fine cloth of gold, tuffed or fringed; and the other of veluet or damaske. The Bassa was no sooner set downe, but all the ordnance of the fleet was discharged with such a noise and thundering, that it seemed the heauens and skies did shake. The table being taken vp, the embassador and the late Gouernour Vallier, entred into the pauillion of the Bassa, and beside the two hundred men which he had promised, obtained twentie moe, vpon the embassadours promise, That he should for them cause to be released 30 Turks taken at Malta, at the landing of the armie there. The Turkes hauing in their hands an antient gunner of the castle, called Iohn de Chabas borne in Daulphine (to the end that this triumphant feast should not be vnfurnished of some cruell sacrifice of the Christian bloud) for that hee had in time of the siege shot off the hand of the clerke generall of the armie, brought him into the towne,

The Baſſa ſhortly after departing out of Barbari[a] left Dragut the pyrat Gouernor of Tripolis, honouring him with the title of the Sanzacke of [that] place, from whence hee many yeares after grieuouſly moleſted the Moores neere vnto him by land, and the Chriſtians by ſea. The ſame yeare 1551, Solyman notwithſtanding the fiue yeares peace before taken with king Ferdinand at his going into Perſia, ſent Achomates his lieutenant in Europe with a great power into Hungarie, who with Haly the Baſſa of Buda inuaded the vpper part of Hungarie, and firſt tooke the city of Temeſware, and contrary to their faith giuen the garriſon ſouldiers [ſlay]ter that, they tooke alſo the caſtle of Zolnok, forſaken by the Chriſtians, and certaine other ſmall caſtles. But laying ſiege to Erſam, they were partly by the va- II liantneſſe of the defendants, and partly by the comming on of Winter inforced to [for]ſake the ſiege, and to get themſelues into their Wintering places.

Queene Iſabel, king Iohn his widdow, ſeeing the Turkes dayly encroching vpon that little they had left her, and that ſhe was not able by any means to defend Tranſiluania againſt them, by the aduice of George Biſhop of Veradium her old counſellor, agreed with king Ferdinand to deliuer vnto him the gouernment of the countrey, with all the royall dignity of Hungarie, for which ſhe was to haue of him Caſſouia, and a yerely penſion of an hundred thouſand ducats. Which agreement made and thorowly concluded by Baptiſta Caſtalius an Italian) whom Charles the Emperor had but a little before ſent to aid king Ferdinand) the Queene returned into Polonia, her natiue countrey: and ſo king Ferdinand by that means obtained almoſt al the I prouince of Tranſyluania, and what elſe the queene had in Hungarie. But the Biſhop a little before made a Cardinall, being ſuſpected by Baptiſta the Italian, that he fauoured the Turkes faction more than king Ferdinand, and by that meanes ſought to get the gouernment to himſelfe, was by the Italians deuice ſuddenly murthered in his owne houſe at Veradium: an end good enough for ſo troubleſome a Prelat.

Haly the Baſſa of Buda proud of the good ſucceſſe he had the yeare before, vnderſtanding 1552 that diuers of the chiefe Hungarians had withdrawn themſelues into the caſtle of Agria, purpoſed in himſelfe with all his power to beſiege it, and there to take them. So aided by Achomates, Chaſan, and other of the Turks Sanzackes and captaines by Solymans appointment readie at his call, he came with an army of 35000 Turks, and the 10 of September in the yere 1552, K encamped round about the caſtle: where after he had placed his artillerie, he began a moſt furious batterie. But doubting to preuaile that way, he attempted alſo to vndermine the caſtle, omitting nothing that could be deuiſed for the taking thereof: but all in vaine, for the Hungarians by the good direction of Stephanus Dobo their captaine, couragiouſly endured the ſiege, and very manfully repulſed the enemie. At length, the 29 of September the enemie with 28 enſignes of ſelect ſouldiers gaue a freſh aſſault to the caſtle, and were by the defendants enforced ſhamefully to retire: at which time foure and twentie barrels of gunpouder by miſchance caught fire, and beſides that it blew vp diuers captaines and ſouldiers, did much harme in the caſtle, to the great diſmaying of the defendants. After that, the Turks with incredible pertinacie the twelfth of October fiercely aſſaulted the caſtle from morning vntill night, and for deL ſire of reuenge and hope of ſpoile left nothing vnattempted for the gaining of the place; but were by the greater valour of the Hungarians beaten backe, and with great loſſe enforced at laſt to giue ouer the aſſault. Thus the Baſſa nothing preuailing by force, attempted by great promiſes and large offers to haue brought them out: which he vnderſtanding to bee nothing regarded, and his letters ſcornfully burnt, brought on his ſouldiers again, & gaue vnto them in the caſtle a moſt furious aſſault, but with no better ſucceſſe than before: for hauing loſt many of his beſt ſouldiers, he was inforced to retire. So after he had in vaine ſix weekes beſieged the caſtle, he was glad to raiſe his ſiege, and to retire to Peſtum. After whoſe departure there was found twelue thouſand great ſhot, wherewith he had battered the wall. In this ſiege ſix thouſand Turks were ſlaine, and of the Hungarians but three hundred. King Ferdinand glad of this M victorie made Stephanus the worthie captaine, Vayuod of Tranſyluania, and bountifully rewarded [the] other captaines and ſouldiers as they had well deſerued.

A Lord of Aramont ſo wrought the matter with Solyman, that the more to trouble the Emperor, he ſent a great fleet into the Tyrrhenum or Tuſcan ſea, which in the yeare 1553, and the yere following, did great harme vpon the coaſts of Calabria, Sicilia, Sardinia, as alſo in the Iſlands of Elba, Corſica, Cerbe, and Maiorca, and ſuch like places on the frontiers of the Emperours dominions: yet were the Turks in moſt places notably againe repulſed by the people of thoſe Countries. The ſame yeare Solyman, ſeduced by Roxolana (ſomtime his faire Concubine, but then his imperious wife) and Ruſtan Baſſa his ſonne in law, moſt vnnaturally murthered his eldeſt ſonne Muſtapha, the mirrour of the Othoman Familie: Which tragicall fact (the like B dible Writers of that time reported.

Solyman after the manner of the Othoman Kings (who to auoid the participation of their ſouereaigntie, vſe not oftentimes to marrie, but otherwiſe to ſatisfie their pleaſure with ſuch beautifull Concubines as it pleaſeth them to make choice of out the faireſt captiues of all Nations, moſt daintily brought vp for that purpoſe in the Court) had by a Circaſſian bondwoman a ſonne called Muſtapha, who for his wonderfull towardlineſſe and rare perfection, was amongſt the Turks had in ſuch expectation and admiration, as that they in nothing accounted themſelues more happie, than in the hope laid vp in him: whoſe noble carriage was ſuch, as thereby he ſo poſſeſſed the mindes of all men in generall, (but eſpecially of the men of war) that he was reputed the glorie of the Court, the floure of chiualrie, the hope of the ſouldiers, C and ioy of the people. Whileſt he thus grew, increaſing both in yeares and fauour, it fortuned with Solyman as it doth with men delighted in change, that he became amorous of Roxolana, of ſome called Roſa (but more truly Hazathya) by condition a captiue, but ſo graced with beauty and courtly behauiour, that in ſhort time ſhe became miſtreſſe of his thoughts, and commandreſſe of him that all commanded: and that which more eſtabliſhed her in poſſeſſion of his loue, ſhe had in time made him father of foure faire ſonnes, Mahomet, Selymus, Baiazet, and Tzihanger, and one daughter called Chameria married to Ruſtan or Ruſtemes the great Baſſa. In this height of worldly bliſſe nothing troubled her more than the exceeding credit of *Muſta*pha Solymans eldeſt ſonne by the Circaſſian woman; who honoured of the greateſt, and beloD ued of the reſt, ſtood only in her light, imbarring her and hers (as ſhe thought) of the hope of the Empire, which ſhe now aboue all things ſought to bring to one of her owne ſonnes: which the better to compaſſe, ſhe vnder the colour of great good will and loue, procured that Muſtapha the young Prince and his mother ſhould as it were for their greater honour and ſtate, with a princely allowance be ſent into Caramania to gouerne that great countrey, farre from E the Court. Which was no great matter for her to bring to paſſe: for that the Turkiſh Emperours vſually ſend their ſonnes after they come to any yeares of diſcretion, vnto ſuch prouinces as are far from the Court, attended vpon with one great Baſſa and ſome graue Doctor of their Law, ſo to acquaint them with the manner of gouernment; the Baſſa inſtructing them in matters of ciuile policie, and the Doctor in matters concerning their ſuperſtition: and yet by ſending them a far off, to keepe them from aſpiring to the Empire by the fauor of the Court: (a thing of the Turkiſh Emperors not vnworthily feared euen in their owne and beloued children. Roxolana hauing at once thus cunningly rid the Court of the great competitors both of her loue and of the Empire (things of all others enduring no partners) reſted not ſo, but began ſtraitway to plot in her malicious head the vtter deſtruction of him, to whom all others wiſhed all happineſſe. This ſhe ſaw was not to be brought to paſſe without ſome complices: wherefore after ſhe had in her ſecret conceit diſcarded many, of whom at firſt ſhe had reaſonable good liking; at laſt ſhe made choice of Ruſtan Baſſa her ſonne in law; vpon whome ſhee would ſet vp her reſt. This Ruſtan was a man baſely borne in Epirus, altogether compoſed of diſſimulation and flatterie, euer ſeruing his owne turne, were it neuer ſo much to the hurt or grieuance of others: by which meanes he, although none of the beſt ſouldiers, was yet by F many degrees growne vp to be the greateſt man in the Court, and Solymans ſonne in law: him ſhe probably thought to wiſh the ſucceſſion of the Empire to one of her owne ſons, his wiues full brethren, rather than to Muſtapha her halfe brother. Beſide that, ſhe was not ignorant how that Ruſtan as one carefull of the Emperors profit (the readieſt way to preferment) had abridged the penſions and fees of the officers and ſeruitors in court: which he perceiuing to pleaſe the the Emperour, proceeded so far therein, that he attempted to haue cut off, if it had been possible, some part of Mustapha his princely allowance: for which doing, she knew how odious he was to all the Courtiers (whereof he made small reckoning) but especially Mustapha, in somuch that it was thought he would not forget so notorious an iniurie, if euer he should obtaine the Empire. Hereupon she brake with Rustan vpon the matter, whom she found readie ynough of himselfe to do what in him lay to further her mischieuous desire.

To begin this intended tragedie, she vpon the sudden became very deuout, and being by the fauour of Solyman growne exceeding rich, pretended as if it had been vpon a deuout zeale for the health of her soule, after the manner of their Turkish superstition, to build an Abbey, with an Hospitall and a Church: which so godly a purpose she imparted to the Muphti or chiefe Mahometan Priest, demanding of him, if such workes of charitie were acceptable vnto God, and auaileable for her soules health. Whereunto the Muphti answered that those workes were no doubt meritorious in the sight of God, but nothing at all meritorious for her soules health, being a bondwoman; yet very profitable for the soule of the great Emperour Solyman, vnto whom as vnto her Lord, both she and all she had appertained. With which answer of the great Priest she seemed to be exceedingly troubled, and thereupon became wonderfull pensiue and melancholie, her cheerefull countenance was replete with sadnesse, and her faire eyes flowed with teares, her mirth was mourning, and her ioy heauinesse. Which thing Solyman perceiuing, and sorie to see his loue vpon conceit so to languish, sent her word to be of good cheere, and to comfort her selfe; promising in short time to take such a course as should ease her of all her griefes: which he forthwith did, solemnly manumising her from her bond estate. So great a fauour obtained, Roxolana with great cheerefulnesse began those meritorious workes by her before intended, as if she had thought of nothing but heauen, whereas indeed her thoughts were in the depth of hel. When she had thus a good while busied her selfe in pauing the way to heauen, as was supposed; Solyman not able longer to forbeare the companie of her, in whom his soule liued, after his wonted manner sent for her by one of his Eunuchs, who should haue brought her to his bed chamber. To whom shee with her eyes cast vp to heauen, demurely answered, That her life and whatsoeuer els she had was at her dread Soueraignes command, but againe to yeeld her bodie vnto his appetite she might not in any case do, without the great offence of the high God, and manifest breach of his sacred Lawes, which permitted her not now voluntarily to yeeld him that, being free, which he before without offence might command of his bondwoman: and because she would not seeme to vse this as an excuse, she referred her selfe in all things to the graue iudgement of the learned and reuerend Muphti, with whom she had before at full conferred. This she did, presuming of the soueraigntie she had ouer that great Monarch, whome she right well knew she had so fast bound in the pleasing fetters of his affection towards her, as that she was sure ynough of him without a keeper. Solyman rauished with her loue, and well the more for her deniall, sent for the Muphti, requiring his iudgement in the matter: who before instructed in all points, agreed with that Roxolana had said, aggrauating the heinousnesse of the fact, if hee should proceed to enforce her as his slaue, who being now free, he might not without great offence touch vnmarried. Whereupon Solyman more and more burning in his desires, became a fresh suter to her for marriage, whom he had so often before commanded: which his suite easily obtained, (as the marke she had all this while aimed at) he with all speed to the great admiration of all men, and contrarie to the manner of the Mahometan Emperours, solemnly married her, appointing for her yearely dowrie fiue thousand Sultanyns. But here before we proceed any farther, stay a while, and take the view of that faire face whereon this great Monarch so much doted, as it is by the skilfull workemans hand most liuely expressed.

Roxolana plaieth the confusion of Mustapha.

This woman of late a slaue, but now become the greateſt Empreſſe of the East, flowing in all worldly felicitie, attended vpon with all the pleasures her heart could desire, wanted nothing she could wish, but how to finde means that the Turkish empire might after the death of Solyman be brought to some one of her owne sons. This was it that had (as is before said) long troubled her aspiring mind; and in the midst of all her blisse, suffered her yet to take no rest. Noble Mustapha, Solymans eldest son, and heire apparant of the Empire, although far absent, was yet still before her eyes present; his credit, his valour, his vertues, his perfections were all bars to her desires: he was the only cloud that kept the sunne from shining on her; if he by any any means might be taken away, then wanted nothing that she desired. Which to bring to passe, the wicked woman laboured cunningly by little and little to breed in Solymans head no small suspition of Mustapha, That he being a yong man of a hauty spirit, desirous of Soueraignetie, generally beloued, and swelling with the immoderat fauor of the men of war, which were all at his deuotion, left nothing else to be expected from him, but when he should (as did his grandsier Selymus) lay hand vpon the Empire, and worke his aged fathers destruction. This mischieuous plot by her deuised, was not a little furthred by Rustan the great Bassa, by whom passed all great matters: who nothing omitted, that could be slily deuised for the disgrace or confusion of the yong Prince. For he as a great secret, craftily told all them that were sent gouernors into Siria, that Mustapha was secretly suspected by his father, of aspiring to the empire, and therefore charged them particularly, carefully to obserue all his actions, with the manner of his life and gouernment, and by their letters diligently to aduertise him of whatsoeuer they should see or heare; bearing them in hand, that the more suspitiously or cruelly they should write of him, the more gratious and acceptable it would be vnto the great Tartan. Wherfore he by these men oftentimes certified of the princely disposition, courage, wisdom, valor and bountie of Mustapha, wherby he had woon all mens hearts, doubted that he would at length be preferred to the Empire: yet durst he not for all that aduenture to temper with Solyman about that detestable conspiracie against the innocent Prince, but still deliuering the letters to the malicious woman, left the rest by her vngratious head to be wrought. And she still as occasion best serued her purpose, ceased not with pleasing allurements and flatterie (wherin she was most excellent) to infect Solymans mind, that whensoeuer he should chance to haue any speech of Mustapha, she might take the fitter occasion to bring forth those Letters. Neither was she in her drift deceiued, but hauing found a fit opportunitie, with tears trickling down her cheeks (which to serue their turnes subtill women seldome want) she told the Emperor in what danger he stood: recounting amongst other things, how Selymus his father had by such means depriued Baiazet his grandfather, both of his life & Empire together: & therefore most instantly besought him, as if it had altogether proceeded of a carefull loue, by that example warned to looke to himselfe. But these light arguments of suspition seemed as they were indeed, vnto Solyman scarce probable; so that she little preuailed thereby. Which thing she well perceiuing, and inwardly grieued thereat, conuerted her cruell minde to other mischieuous deuices, and sought by all meanes how to poison the yong Prince: neither wanted there wicked men, as it were vowed to all kinde of mischiefe and villanie, readie to haue performed what she desired, had not Gods prouidence withstood so horrible a practise. For

whereas certaine rich apparell was by her sent vnto him in his fathers name, he fearing the worst, would not touch it before he had caused it to be worn by one of his seruants: by which curious warinesse (as it was thought) he for that time preuented the treason of his wicked stepdame, and made her malicious practise manifest to the world. Yet rested shee not so, but was still plotting new deuices, tending all to one purpose: for being growne to that height of honour and power as neuer was woman in the Othoman court, and by the means of Trongilla a Iew (as it was thought) hauing bewitched the minde of the Turkish Emperor, she still grew more and more in fauor, and obtained that her sons might by turnes be still present in Court: of purpose, that by their daily presence and continual flattery, they should more & more procure their fathers loue; and if by chance Mustapha should come thither, she might haue the better means to dispatch him: if not, to expect some other fit time, when she might by some one or other meane take him away. But Mustapha neuer comming (for why, the Emperors sons vse not without their fathers leaue to go out of the prouinces assigned vnto them, or to come to Constantinople, but after the death of their father to receiue the Empire, attended vpon with a number of soldiers) she easily deuised another practise, that her sons should wait vpon their father, not in the city only, but in the Prouinces also; so that Tzibanger, syrnamed Crouchbacke, alwaies followed his father in the campe. Certain yeres thus spent, and she still hammering her mischieuous deuices, at length fortune fauoring her wicked desire, got from the Bassa which had the gouernment of Mustapha and the prouince of Amasia (for as we haue said, euery one of the Kings sons hath with him one Bassa, which as it were his lieutenant in administration of justice and martiall affaires) certain suspicious letters, wherein was contained, that there was a speech of a marriage to be made between Mustapha and the Persian Kings daughter; which thing he thought good to giue knowledge of to the Counsell, that if any harme should ensue thereof, he might be out of all suspition. These letters being brought to Rustan, he thought he had now as good as halfe brought to passe the long desired ruin of Mustapha: so making no stay, he opened the matter to Roxolana, & afterwards both together went to the court, and declared all the matter to the Emperor: in doing wherof, they forced both their vngratious wits to fill his head, yet doubtfull, with suspicion, and to possesse his minde with the feare of his owne most dutifull son: saying, That he as a proud and ambitious young man, rauished with the desire of so glorious an empire, sought against the laws both of God & nature, to take his father out of the way, that so he might with more speed satisfie his aspiring mind. And to giue the more credit to this their most false suggestion, they warned him of the alliance by him purposed with the Persian king the antient enemy of the Othoman Emperors: wishing him to beware lest Mustapha supported by the strength of Persia, and the fauor of the Sanzacks and Ianizaries, whose loue he had by bountie purchased, should in short time when he feared least, together depriue him both of his life and empire. With these and such like accusations they so preuailed with the aged man, whom they neuer suffered to rest in quier, that he at length resolued to worke his safetie (as he supposed) by the death of his owne sonne; in this sort:

In the yeare 1552 he caused proclamation to be made almost in all the prouinces of his Empire, That forasmuch as the Persians without resistance with a great army inuaded Syria, burning and destroying the countrey before them, he to represse that their outragious insolence, was inforced to send thither Rustan Bassa with an army: which according to his appointment was in short time raised. Now when all things were in readinesse, as if it had beene for such a war as was pretended, he commanded Rustan, with as much secrecie and as little tumult as was possible, to lay hands vpon Mustapha, and to bring him bound to Constantinople: which if he could not conueniently effect, then by any other means to take him out of the way.

Solyman sends Rustan Bassa with an army to take Mustapha.

With this wicked and cruell charge Rustan with a strong armie marched towards Syria. Mustapha vnderstanding of his comming, without delay with 7000 of the best horsemen in all Turkie made towards Syria also: whereof Rustan hearing, and perceiuing that he could not (as he desired) conueniently execute the cruell command of the vnnaturall father, forthwith turned his backe, and treading the same steps he came, returned with his armie to Constantinople with such speed, that he endured not to behold the verie dust raised by Mustapha's horsmen, much lesse his presence: giuing it out, That he certainly vnderstood that the prouince was in quiet, (as indeed it was) and that he thereupon returned. But vnto Solyman he told another tale in secret, which he maliciously had deuised, That he by most apparant signes and manifest presumptions had perceiued the whole armie so inclined towards Mustapha, that if he should haue attempted any thing against him by plaine force, he should haue been vtterly forsaken, and had therefore in so dangerous a case left the matter as it was to his graue further direction. This tale suspiciously told, raised in the wicked and vnnaturall father (nothing degenerating from the naturall crueltie of his ancestors) new and great suspicions, whereof to disburden his disquicted mind, he conceiued with himselfe a most horrible deuice. Wherfore the yere following, which was the yeare 1553, he raised a great armie; giuing it out, That the Persians had with greater power than before inuaded Syria, and that therefore he for the loue of his Countrie, and defence of his empire, was determined to go thither with his army, and in person himselfe to represse the attempts of his enemies. Wherfore the army being assembled, & all things necessary orderly prouided, he commanded to set forward, and in few daies after followed himselfe: who comming at length into Syria, presently by trusty messengers commanded Mustapha to come vnto him at Aleppo, for there he lay incamped. And yet for all these shadowes, the matter was not so closely by Solyman conueied (although he was exceeding carefull thereof) but that his mortall and deadly hatred against his son was perceiued by the Bassa's & other great men about him: insomuch that Achmat Bassa by a secret and trustie messenger gaue him warning thereof, that so he might in time the better prouide for the safegard of his life. Neither could Mustapha himselfe but maruell, that his aged father without any apparant reason should come so far with so great an army: yet trusting to his owne innocencie, though wonderfully troubled and perplexed in mind, he resolued (although it were with the extreme danger of his life) to obey and yeeld to his fathers command: for he thought it more commendable and honorable to incurre the danger of death, than liuing to fall into the foule suspition of disloyaltie. In so great a peplexitie of mind, after he had with himselfe mu[illegible]courſed too and fro, what courſe he were beſt to take, at length he boldly and reſolute[illegible]ed the doctor whom (as we haue before ſaid) he had alwaies with him in his court, Whether the Empire of the world, or a bleſſed life were of man more to be deſired? to whom the doctor frankly anſwered, That the empire of the world, to him that would enter into the due conſideration thereof, brought with it no felicitie, more than a vaine ſhew and vtter apparance of good, nothing being more fraile or vncertaine than worldly honor, bringing with it feare, vexation of mind, tribulation, ſuſpition, murder, wrong, wickedneſſe, ſpoile, ruin, and captiuitie, with infinit miſchiefes of like nature, not to be deſired of him that would attaine to true felicitie, by which means the bleſſed life was to be loſt and not gained: But they vnto whome God had giuen the grace rightly to conſi[illegible]and weigh the fragilitie and ſhortneſſe of this our eſtate (which the common ſort deeme[illegible]to be the only life) and to ſtriue againſt the vanities of this world, and to embrace and follow an vpright kind of life, had vndoubtedly a place aſſigned for them in heauen, and prepared by the great God, where they ſhould at length enioy life and bliſſe eternal. This anſwer of the great doctor wonderfully ſatisfied the troubled mind of the yong Prince, foreſeeing as it were the approch of his owne end: and ſo ſtaying not any longer diſcourſe, forthwith ſet forward towards his father, and making great haſt, came at length to his fathers campe, and not far off pitched his tents in the open field. But this his ſo haſtie coming the more increaſed the ſuſpition in the mind of his wicked father: neither ſpared Ruſtan in the meane time with his craftie and ſubtile deuices to augment the ſame: for by a ſigne giuen he cauſed the Ianizaries and chiefe men in the armie to go as if it had bin for honors ſake to meet Muſtapha; which they all without delay preſently did at his command, and ſo all together ſet forward. In the meane time he the moſt craftie varlet, with troubled countenance (for he could notably diſſemble) as a man halfe diſmaied came in haſte into Solymans pauilion, and falſly told him, That the Ianizaries and almoſt all the beſt ſoldiers of the army were of themſelues without leaue gon to meet Muſtapha, and that he feared what would enſue thereof. Which news ſo troubled the old tyrant, that he became pale for feare, and going out of his tent, and finding them gon, eaſily beleeued all to be true that the falſe Baſſa had told him. Neither wanted Muſtapha ſtrange warning of his end ſo neere at hand, for the third day before his ſetting forwards toward his father, falling aſleepe in the euening, he thought he ſaw his Prophet Mahomet in bright apparell to take him by the hand and lead him into a moſt pleaſant place, beautified with moſt glorious and ſtately palaces, and moſt delicat and pleaſant gardens; and pointing to euery thing with his finger, to ſay thus vnto him, Here reſt they for euer, which in this world haue led an vpright and godly life, following vertue, and deteſting vice: and after that turning his face to the other ſide, to haue ſhewed him two great and ſwift riuers, whereof the one boiled with water blacker than pitch, and in them appeared (as he thought) numbers of men wallowing and tumbling, ſome vp, ſome down, crying horribly for mercie: And there (ſaid he) are puniſhed all ſuch as in this fraile life haue bin the malicious workers of iniquity: the chief of whom (as he ſaid) were Emperors, kings, princes, and other great men of the world. Muſtapha awaking, and troubled with this melancholie dreame, called vnto him his doctor: and hauing told him all the matter, asked him what the ſame might ſignifie? who ſtanding a great while in a muſe (for the Mahometans are exceeding ſuperſtitious, attributing much to dreams) full of ſorrow and griefe at length anſwered, That this viſion (for ſo it pleaſed him to terme it) was vndoubtedly to be feared, as preſaging vnto him the extreame perill of his life, and therefore requeſted him to haue great care both of his life and honor. But Muſtapha as he was of a notable ſpirit and courage, regarding nothing that anſwer, ſtoutly replied, What, ſhall I ſuffer my ſelfe to be terrified and ouercome with childiſh & vain feares? why rather haſte I not courageouſly & reſolutely to my father? and ſo much the more boldly, becauſe I know aſſuredly I haue alwaies (as reaſon was) reuerenced his Maieſtie, that againſt his will I neuer turned mine eyes or foot againſt his moſt roiall ſeat, much leſſe affected his empire, except the moſt high God had called him to a better life, neither then without the generall good liking & choiſe of the whole army, that ſo I might at length without murder, without bloud, without tyrannie, wel & iuſtly raigne, and in loue & peace inuiolate liue with my brethren: for I haue ſet down with my ſelfe, and choſen, if it be my fathers pleaſure ſo, rather to die in his obedience, than raigning many yeares, to be reputed of all men, eſpecially my competitors, a rebell or traitor.

Muſtapha commeth to his fathers campe.

The exceeding treacherie of Ruſtan againſt Muſtapha.

The melancholy dreame of Muſtapha in comming to his father.

Hauing thus ſaid, he came vnto his fathers campe, & pitching his tents (as we haue before ſaid) ſuted himſelfe all in white, in token of his innocencie, and writing certaine letters (which the Turks when they are about to go to any place of danger, vſe to write, and alwaies to carry with them, for they are wonderfull fooliſh in their ſuperſtition) and putting them in his boſome, attended vpon with a few of his moſt truſtie followers, came with great reuerence towards the tent of his father, fully reſoluing to haue kiſſed his hand, as their vſuall manner is. But when he was come to the entrance of the tent, remembring that he had yet his dagger girt to him, hee entred not vntill he had put it off; becauſe he would not come into his fathers ſight with any weapon, if happily ſo he might cleere himſelfe of his fathers needleſſe ſuſpition. So when he was come into the more inward roomes of the tent, he was with ſuch honour as belonged to his ſtate cheerfully receiued by his fathers Eunuchs. But ſeeing nothing elſe prouided but one ſeat whereon to ſit himſelfe alone, hee perplexed in mind, ſtood ſtill a while muſing; at length asked where the Emperor his father was? Whereunto they anſwered, That he ſhould by and by ſee him: and with that caſting his eye aſide, he ſaw ſeuen Muts (theſe are ſtrong men bereft of their ſpeech, whom the Turkiſh tyrants haue alwaies in readineſſe, the more ſecretly to execute their bloudie butcherie) comming from the other ſide of the tent towards him: at whoſe ſight ſtrucken with a ſudden terrour, ſaid no more, but Lo my death; and with that, ariſing, was about to haue fled: but in vaine, for he was caught hold on by the eunuch and Muts, and by force drawn to the place appointed for his death: where without further ſtay, the Muts caſt a bowſtring about his necke, he poore wretch ſtill ſtriuing, and requeſting that he might ſpeake but two words to his father before he died. All which the murtherer (for no addition is ſufficient ſignificantly to expreſſe his vnnaturall villanie) both heard and ſaw by a trauers from the other ſide of the tent: but was ſo far from being moued with compaſſion, that thinking it long till he were diſpatched, with a moſt terrible and cruell voice he rated the villains enured to bloud; ſaying, Will you neuer diſpatch that I bid you? will you neuer make an end of this traitor, for whom I haue not reſted one night theſe ten yeares in quiet? Which horrible commanding ſpeeches, yet thundering in their eares, thoſe butcherly Muts threw the poore innocent Prince vpon the ground, and with the helpe of the Eunuches forcibly drawing the knotted bow ſtring both wayes, by the commandement of a moſt wicked father, ſtrangled him. With like barbarous crueltie, hee ſhortly after cauſed Mahomet his nephew (Muſtapha his ſonne) to be ſtrangled alſo.

Muſtapha commeth to his fathers tent.

Muſtapha moſt cruelly ſtrangled in his fathers ſight.

Mahomet Muſtaphaes ſonne ſtrangled alſo.

This vnnatural & ſtrange murther committed, he preſently commanded the Baſſa of Amaſia Muſtaphaes Lieutenant to be apprehended, and his head in his owne preſence to be ſtrucke off. Which done, he ſent for Tzihanger the Crooked, yet ignorant of all that was happened; and in ſporting wiſe, as if he had don a thing worth commendations, bid him go meet his brother Muſtapha: which thing Tzihanger with a merrie and cheerefull countenance haſted to doe, as one glad of his brothers comming. But as ſoone as he came vnto the place where he ſaw his brother lying dead vpon the ground ſtrangled, it is not to be ſpoken how he was in mind tormented. Hee was ſcarcely come to the place where this deteſtable murther was committed, when his father ſent vnto him certain of his ſeruants to offer vnto him al Muſtaphaes treaſure, horſes, ſeruants, jewels, tents, and withall, the gouernment of the Prouince of Amaſia: but Tzihanger filled with extreame heauineſſe for the vnmercifull death of his welbeloued brother, ſpake vnto them in this ſort. A wicked and vngodly Cain, traitor (I may not ſay father) take thou now the treaſures, the horſes, the ſeruants, the iewels, and the Prouince of Muſtapha. How came it into thy wicked, cruell, and ſauage breaſt, ſo vngratiouſly and contrarie to all humanitie, I will not ſay the reuerence of thine owne bloud, to kill thy worthie, warlike, and noble ſonne, the mirrour of courteſie, and Prince of greateſt hope, the like of whome, the Othoman Familie neuer yet had, nor neuer ſhall? I will therefore my ſelfe prouide that thou, nor none for thee ſhall euer hereafter in ſuch ſort ſhamefully triumph ouer a poore crooked wretch. And hauing thus much ſaid, ſtab'd himſelfe with his owne dagger into the bodie, whereof hee in ſhort time died: Which ſo ſoone as it came to the old Tygres eares, it is hard to ſay how much hee grieued. His dead bodie was by his fathers commandement carried from Aleppo in Syria, to Conſtantinople, and afterwards honourably buried on the other ſide of the hauen at Pera. For all this bloudie tragedie, his couetous minde was not ſo troubled, but that hee could forthwith commaund all Muſtaphaes treaſures and riches to be brought to his tent: which his ſouldiers in hope to haue the

A bloudie tumult betwixt the souldiers of Solyman and Mustapha.

At length, the noise of this stir was heard by the rest of the kings souldiers, who seeing the tumult to increase more and more, ran in to helpe their fellowes; so that in short time there began a hot skirmish and cruell fight on both sides, insomuch that two thousand were slaine, and mo wounded: neither had the broile so ended, had not Achomat Bassa a graue captaine, and for his long experience of no small authority amongst the souldiers, kept backe the Ianizaries, and H courteous persuasions, in this manner appeased their rage. What say my brethren (said hee) will you now (degenerating from your antient loyaltie, for which you haue beene for so many ages commended) impugne the command of the great Sultan our dread soueraigne? Truely I cannot sufficiently marueil what thing should mooue you, whom I haue hitherto prooued to haue beene most worthie and valiant soldiers, in this ciuill conflict to draw those weapons against your fellowes and brethren, which you haue most fortunately vsed against the enemies of the Othoman Kings: except you meane thereby to make your selues a ioyfull spectacle vnto your enemies, who grieuing to see themselues ouercome by your victorious weapons, may yet reioyce among themselues to see you turne the same one vpon another. Wherefore my sonnes, for your antient honours sake, be carefull that you doe not by this your insolencie lose the repu- I tation of your wisedome, loyaltie, and valour; for which you haue hitherto beene aboue all others commended: reserue these your weapons which you haue now too too much vsed among your fellowes, against your enemies, of whom you may get more praise and honour. This speech of the old Bassa, so mollified the stout souldiers, that they freely permitted all that was in Mustaphaes tents to be carried to Solymans: but so soone as the death of Mustapha was blowne into the eares of the Ianizaries and the rest of the armie in Solymans campe, another tumult rise among them worse than the first. They were quickly all vp in armes againe, and with a great noise confused with teares and lamentation, as they were in rage and furie, brake violently into Solymans pauilion with their drawne swords: which strucke the tyrant into such a feare, that destitute of all counsell in himselfe, he was about with the extreame perill of his life to haue fled: but being holden K by his friends, and making a vertue of necessitie, vpon the sudden aduentured to do that which at better leisure hee would scarcely haue thought vpon: for going forth out of his tent, but with a pale and wan countenance, he spake vnto the enraged souldiers thus: *What broile is this?

what sturre? what so great insolencie? what meane your inflamed, fierce and angrie lookes? know you not your Soueraigne? and him that hath power to command you? Haue you so resolued to staine the antient and inuincible honour of your selues and your ancestours, with the bloud of your Lord and Em-perour?* Whilest he was yet thus speaking, the souldiers boldly answered, That they denied not, but that he was the man whom they many yeares before had chosen for their Emperour: but in that they had by their owne valour got for him a large and mightie Empire, and in like manner preserued it; that was therefore of them done, that hee should for the same gouerne them vertuously and iustly, and not to lay his boudy hands without discretion vpon euery iust L man, and most wickedly embrue himselfe with innocent bloud: and that they came thither armed, they did it (as they said) moued with iust cause to reuenge the vnworthy death of guilt-lesse Mustapha; and that for that matter, he had no iust cause to be angrie with them. Wherfore they required, that they might publickly cleere themselues of the treason whereof they were accused by Mustaphaes enemies, and that the accuser might be brought forth to iustifie his accusation: protesting, that they would neuer lay downe their weapons, vntill the accuser made his appearance in iudgement, and commenced his accusation iudicially, vpon paine to endure the like punishment if he failed in proofe. Whilest these things were in doing, the hainousnesse of the late committed fact caused euery man to shed teares, so that Solyman himselfe seemed to be sorie for the murther so lately by himselfe committed: wherefore he promised vnto M the souldiers whatsoeuer they required, and did what he could to appease their angrie minds.
For all that, they in the meane time, lest he should craftily slip away and deceiue them of that he had promised, and of the expectation of such things as they had required, with a marueillous care and diligence al l kept watch and ward.

Solyman

A Solyman to appease this fury of the Ianizaries, depriued Rustan Bassa of all his honours, and tooke from him his seale whereof he had the keeping, and deliuered it to Achomates Bassa. But Rustan worthily stricken with feare and horrour, seeing himselfe now in no safetie in his own tents, fled secretly to Achomates, asking his counsell what were best for him to doe, and what course to take in so doubtful and dangerous a case? To whom the Bassa answered, that it were best for him to vse the great Emperors aduise, and to do what he commanded. Which answer well satisfied Rustan: and so he which of late gaue other men accesse vnto the Emperor at his pleasure, was now glad by his old acquaintance and friends to preferre this poore suite, To know his pleasure what he would haue him to do: from whom he receiued this answer, That he should incontinently without further delay get him out of his sight, and out of the campe:
B which the Bassa said he could not conueniently do, being by his displeasure and the souldiers rage disfurnished of all things necessarie for his departure. Whereunto Solyman sent him answere againe, That he could giue him neither longer time nor delay, and that it were best for him without more adoe to be gone for feare of further harme. Whereupon Rustan, guiltie in conscience of most horrible villanie & treacherie, accompanied but with eight of his most faithfull friends in stead of his late world of followers; posted in hast to Constantinople, and there (not without danger of his head) with Roxolana and other the complices and contriuers of the treason against Mustapha, in great feare expected the euent of his fortune.

Rustan disgraced by Solyman, flyeth to Constantinople.

This yong prince Mustapha thus shamefully murthered by his own father, was for his rare
C vertues generally beloued of the Turks: but of the souldiers most for his martiall disposition, and readines for the effusion of Christian bloud. The opinion they had conceiued of him was such, and their loue so great, that they neuer thought there was any in the Othoman family, of whom they expected so much for the enlarging of their empire: insomuch, that euer since, when in their priuate or publicke actions they faile of any great hope, they vse this prouerbe euen at this day taken from him, Gietti Sultan Mustapha, Sultan Mustapha is dead: as who should say, our hope is all lost, Achomates Bassa the great champion of the Turks, a man of exceeding courage, not ignorant of the smal assurance of the great honors of that state, at such time as he receiued the seale from Solyman, boldly told him, That as he did then frankly bestow it vpon him, so he would at one time or other to his no lesse disgrace take it from him: to whom Solyman solemnly promised with an oath, not to displace him so long as he liued. For all that, hee
D had not long enioyed that honor, but that Solyman falling in dislike with him, & willing againe to promote Rustan Bassa to that great honour, greater than which there was none in the Turks court, which by reason of his oath hee could not doe so long as Achomates liued: To saue his oath, and to preferre his son in law (whom he had indeed displaced only no please the tumultuous Ianizaries) resolued to haue Achomates put to death. Of which his purpose Achomates altogether ignorant, and one morning after his wonted manner comming into the Diuano in al his honour, vpon the sudden receiued word from Solyman, that he must presently die, & forthwith was the hangman readie to haue strangled him, as was giuen him in charge: whom the stout Bassa thrust from him with his hand, with countenance and cheere in shew no more trou-
E bled than if the matter had nothing concerned him. And looking a good while round about him, espied at last an honest man whom he had before many times pleasured, whom hee most earnestly requested for all the kindnesse shewed vnto him, to do him that last fauour as to strangle him with his owne hand, which should be vnto him the greatest good turne that he could possibly deuise, detesting nothing more than to die with the hand of the executioner. Which thing, when he after much intreatie had vndertaken to performe, Achomates willed him, that he should not at one twitch strangle him outright, but letting the bow string slacke again, giue him leaue once to breath, & then to dispatch him: which his request was by his friend accordingly performed, and he in that sort strangled: wherein it seemeth, that he was desirous, first to tast of death, and not to die all at once. Immediatly after whose death, Rustan Bassa was again
F restored to his place of chiefe Visier, and had the great seale deliuered vnto him: which honor he enioyed about six yeares after, and so at last died of the dropsie. This was the end of these two great Bassaes Achomates and Rustan, who in that time swaied that great Empire, vnder Solyman, and of whom we haue so much spoken. It is reported, that Solyman hauing appointed Achomates to die, should say, It is better for his great heart once to die, than to die a thousand times, in seeing his honour taken from him and bestowed vpon another.

1554 The Turks gallies by the solicitation of the French before brought d[illegible] the Tuscan sea, did much harme vpon the coasts of Calabria and Sicilia in this yeare [illegible], as they had the yeare before, and so did diuers yeares after. At which time also Pandulph[illegible] Pontarenus the Venetian Admirall scouring alongst the seas, carefully looking to the frontiers of the Venetian estate, chanced to meet with the Bassa of Callipolis, who in the yere before had rifled certaine Venetian Merchants; in reuenge of which iniury he set vpon him, and after a great spoile made both of the Turks and their gallies, he ransacked Dirrachium then one of the Turks port townes in Dalmatia.

1555 The next yeare 1555, the same Bassa recouered his strength, but not daring to be too busie with the Venetians, surprised the Islands of Blumbis and Elba, subiect to the Duke of Florence, and withall sent le[illegible] to Solyman, to persuade him to take vp armes against the Venetians, as they which had [illegible]en the league.

1556 At the same time, Haly the Bassa of Buda by policie surprised the strong castle of [illegible]za in Hungarie: and was in good hope by the like fineneſſe to haue taken the towne and [illegible]le of Zigeth, a place of great importance: but failing of his purpose, he came the next yere 1556, with a great armie, and the thirteenth day of Iune incamped before the towne, wherein was Gouernor Marcus Horwath a valiant captaine, with a garrison of notable souldiers. Shortly after he began a most terrible batterie: during which time the Christians sallying out diuers times, slew many of his men; who for all that vsed such diligence, that the twentith of Iune they woon the vttermost wall, and after fiue hot assaults were in hope at the sixt to haue woon the castle also: but the Christians perceiuing the danger, resolutely sallied out, and hauing slaine eight hundred of them, draue the rest againe from the wall. Yet the Turks gaue it not so ouer, but with a great number of carts labored to haue filled vp the marrish and ditches about the towne: which their attempt was by the industrie of the defendants also defeated. The Bassa perceiuing how hardly the towne would be woon by force, attempted to haue persuaded them to haue yeelded it vp by composition: but failing therein of his purpose, began againe the twelfth of Iuly to assault the citie, which assault he maintained fiue dayes together without intermission, still sending in fresh men in stead of them that were wearied or slaine: yet was the citie for all that by the valour of the Christians notably defended. So when he had in vaine proued the vttermost of his forces, he raised his siege the one and twentieth day of Iuly and departed: but within six dayes after, he returned from the city Quinque Ecclesiæ, and assaulted the citie afresh; but was at length glad to giue ouer the siege and be gone, when he had lost of his best souldiers aboue two thousand, and of the defendants slaine but a hundred and twentie. After his departure there was ten thousand great shot found, wherewith he had battered the towne and the castle, which was for this time thus worthily defended. The Turks in the meane time after their wonted manner ceased not to do what harme they could in the Tuscane sea, and had againe miserably spoiled the Island of Corsica: for withstanding of whom the Bishop of Rome exacted of his people a great subsidie, and finely stript the Iews of their money, and seised vpon their rich merchants goods in his territorie. At whose earnest suit Solyman in their behalfe writ vnto the Bishop as followeth:

Solymans Letters to the Pope in behalfe of the Iewes merchants.

Most excellent and most mightie Lord of the Professors of the Messias Iesu, and Lord of Rome, the Almightie keepe thee. At such time as thou shalt receiue our Seale, thou shalt vnderstand by our Letters, that certaine Hebrewes haue come vnto vs, complaining that they are oppressed of thee with too grieuous exactions, when they come to traffique at Ancona: This burthen I request thee to take from them, and to restore againe vnto them their goods, that thereby they may be able to pay to vs our Tribute: which if thou (as I hope thou wilt) shalt doe, thou shalt feele our fauour. Farewell. From Constantinople the last of the blessed moneth Rambeluch*, in the yeare of our great Prophet* Mahomet, nine hundred threescore and foure.

* The ninth of March, anno 1556.

Haly Bassa beſieged Zigeth againe.

Haly Bassa grieued with the late repulse he had receiued at Zigeth, came againe the next

A yeare, and besieged it, at which time king Ferdinand sent Nicholaus Polwiler and the county Serinus with a power raised in Sueuia and Austria, to recouer Baboza, a castle betwixt Zigeth and Stiria, before surprised by the Turkes: of whose comming the Bassa hauing intelligence, rise with his armie and departed from Zigeth, which he had for certaine moneths hardly besieged, and not far from Baboza met with Polwiler and Serinus; who ioyning battell with him, after a hard and sharpe fight ouerthrew him and put him to flight. This victory with the coming downe of young Ferdinand, king Ferdinands sonne, Archduke of Austria with new supplies, so terrified the Turkes in that part of Hungarie along the riuer Dranus, that they for feare forsooke Baboza, Sammartin, San-Laurence, and diuers other smal castles which they had before taken, and fled to Quinque Ecclesiæ.

Haly Bassa ouerthrowne.

B The Gouernour of Zigeth encouraged herewith, sallying out with his garrison, slew many of the Turkes in their flight towards Quinque Ecclesiæ, and meeting by chance with a troupe of horsemen which were bringing the Turkes pay, ouerthrew them, tooke the money, and so with an exceeding rich prey returned to his castle. At which time also Adam the Gouernour of Rab, otherwise called Iauarinum, hauing burnt the suburbes of Alba Regalis, and driuen away many thousands of cattell, at a towne called Sian ouerthrew fiue hundred Turkes, and as many fugitiue Christians, and so with a great prey and little or no losse at all of his men returned.

Henry the French king at the same time in warres with Philip king of Spaine, and troubled with the losse of his armie ouerthrowne not farre from S. Quintins (at which time the duke

Henry the French king solliciteth Solyman to inuade the king of Spaine his territories.

C Montmorencie Constable of France and Generall of the armie, with his sonne and diuers other of the nobilitie of France were taken prisoners) by his Embassadour Michael Condignas solicited Solyman to haue by sea inuaded Naples and Sicilia, so to haue withdrawne the Spanish forces out of France, to defend their owne frontiers. Which thing Solyman, offended with the insolencie of the Embassadour, refused to doe: yet neuertheless commanded his aduenturers all alongst the coast of Affricke, to infest those seas, and to doe what harme they could vpon the coast of Italie and Sicilia; which they so diligently performed, that the Viceroy of Sicilia was faine for defence of those countries to lie in readinesse with his gallies in the ports of Caieta and Naples.

The Guise, Lord Grand Prior in France, Admirall of Malta, taketh certaine of the Turkes gallies.

In the meane time the Guise, Lord Grand Prior of the Knights of S. Iohns in France (and D brother of Francis the duke of Guise, Generall of the French Kings armie in Italie, who vpon the ouerthrow receiued at S. Quintins, called out of Italie, shortly after tooke Calais) Admirall of the gallies of Malta, went out toward the East with foure gallies well appointed, to lie in wait for the Turkes, and by fortune met with two great ships laded with the Turkes merchandise, which he tooke, and by and by after, light vpon foure of the Turkes gallies, with whome he had a great fight: yet at length hauing sunke one of them and burnt another, he tooke the other two. After which victorie returning towards Malta to haue repaired his gallies and cured his wounded men, he was met with foure other great gallies of the Turkes: who desirous to reuenge the losse of their fellowes, set vpon him, and he seeing now no remedie, but that he must needs fight couragiously, encountered them. But forasmuch as he had in the two fights

E before lost some of his men, and 72 of the knights in the gallies lay sore wounded, he, by the counsell of the captaines retired towards Malta: but by the way one of his gallies was taken by the Turkes, with 52 knights of the Order: yet with the rest and the prizes before taken, he recouered the Island of Malta, where hee staied that Winter; and the next Spring sailed into France to be partaker of those troubles, which beginning shortly after, haue but of late taken end.

The immoderat fortune of the great Sultan Solyman, was not in any thing more contrarie to his desire, than in the proofe of those his children, of whom the world held the greatest expectation: Mustapha his eldest son, the mirrour of courtesie, and rare hope of the whole Turkish nation, the suspitious tyrant had most vnnaturally caused to be murthered in his own presence,

F to the griefe of all his subiects in generall, as is before declared: poore Tzihanger was dead for sorow: and Mahometes his eldest sonne by his best beloued the faire Roxolana, was departed this life also. So that now remained vnto him onely Selymus, the vnworthie heire of so great an empire, and Baiazet his youngest brother, the liuely image of his father, both men growne; and the sonnes of the same Roxolana: but so far differing the one from the other both in feature of bodie and disposition of mind, as if they had not bin of the same kinde and line. Selymus the elder brother most like vnto his mother, was in the secret determinatio[n] of the aged Emperor his father appointed heire of that most mightie empire. Baiazet much resembling his father, was on the other side strongly supported by the care and entire loue of his mother: which whether it proceeded of a secret commiseration of his inuitable destiny, or that hee had by loyaltie or other means so woon her fauor, is not knowne; but euery man saw, that if it had lien in her power, she would vndoubtedly haue preferred him before his elder brother Selymus, & haue placed him in the empire: but she must needs giue way to her old husbands will, firmly and irremouably set downe, that the Destinies so permitting, none should raigne after him but his eldest son Selymus. Of which his purpose and resolution Baiazet being not ignorant, began most circumspectly to look about him, if he could by any means frustrat that forcible necessitie, and exchange his certaine destruction with an empire: in which his deep and dangerous cogitations he was not a little comforted by the fauor & loue of Roxolana his mother, & of Rustan the great Bassa his brother in law; who together had in any other matter bin able [to] ouerruled the aged Emperor. Whereupon he resolutely set downe himselfe, rather to end his daies by making proofe of his good or bad fortune, than vpon the death of his father (which by course of nature could not now be far off) to be as a sacrifice basely butchered by some vile hangman of his brothers. Baiazet so resolued, and now already fallen out with his brother Selymus, tooke occasion vpon the generall discontentment of the people & others, for the vnworthy death of Mustapha their late ioy, to begin those stirs which hee had before with himselfe plotted, & so to make a head, whereunto he might afterward ioine the body also: for why, that worthy Mustapha had left behind him so great desire of himself, that now it wearied many to liue after him, they had so placed al the hope of their good fortune in him, vnto whom nothing was more desired than to reuenge the wrong don vnto him, or els to run the same hard fortune with him: other some guilty of the immoderat affection they had born vnto him yet liuing, & fearing to be called to giue an account thereof, thought any state better and more assured than that wherein they presently stood, & therefore sought all occasions of new stirs, and how to set all on a hurly burly: onely a captaine was wanting, Mustapha could not be again reuiued, yet might he be strongly supposed to liue. This deuice pleased Baiazet, as best fitting his purpose, being not ignorant of this disposition of the people. Wherefore by certaine of his most faithfull and trustie followers he found out a certaine obscure fellow of a notable audacitie, which should take vpon him the name & person of Mustapha, whose stature also & countenance and proportion of bodie differed not much from Mustapha himselfe: hee, as if hee had by chance escaped, first began to shew himselfe in that part of Thracia, which is aboue Constantinople, & lieth toward Danubius, not far from the countries of Moldauia & Valachia, & was for that cause both fittest for rebellion, & also best stored with horsemen, who of all others most honored Mustapha. Hither he comes as if it had bin from a long iourney, slenderly accompanied, and as if he had bin desirous at the first not to haue bin known; his followers being demanded (as it chanced) who it was, did rather fearefully giue them that asked occasion to gheese, than plainly to tell them, that it was Mustapha: neither did he himselfe much denie it: whereby the people became more and more desirous to know him. Which beginning thus laied, he afterward began to reioice of his fortunat comming thither, & to giue God thanks for his safe arriuall there amongst his friends: he tels them, That at such time as he was sent for by his father, hee durst not come into his sight, or commit himselfe vnto him in his furie, but by the counsell of his friends to haue with great promises persuaded one that was maruellous like vnto himselfe to go in his stead; by whose danger he might make proofe of his fathers minde towards him: who before he was admitted to the speech of his father, was without hearing miserably strangled, and so cast out before his pauilion: at which time there was many (as he said) which perceiued the deceit, but the greater part remained in errour, deceiued with the lineaments and countenance of the miserable dead man, who was much altered with the terrible paines of death, and supposing it to haue been him indeed that was slaine. Which thing as soone as hee vnderstood, he thought it not good longer to stay, but presently to flie and to prouide for his owne safetie: and so flying with a few of his owne folowers, thereby the more secretly and safely to escape; and hauing passed aboue Pontus by the people of Bosphorus, was now come thither, where hee was in good hope to finde much helpe and comfort

The crafty dealing of the supposed Mustapha to deceiue the people.

A counterfeit Mustapha set vp to make a head of rebellion.

fort in the fidelitie of his friends, whom he requested not now to forsake him, or to make lesse account of him disgraced by the malice of his stepmother, than they had before in time of his prosperitie. For that he was minded to reuenge the iniurie done vnto him, and by force of armes to defend himselfe: for what els he now lefte being by no other meanes preserued, but by the death of another man: that he had sufficiently proued how his father stood affected towards him, and that he now liued by his mistaking, not by his kindnes. The cause of all which his troubles was his stepdame, who (as he said) with her inchantments led the silly old man (now almost doating for age, and mad for loue) whither she would at her pleasure, and by her agent Rustan Bassa forced him forward headlong into all kinde of mischiefe: but that God be thanked he wanted not his friends, by whose help he would finde a way out of these miseries, & take reuenge of his enemies: for why, he had as yet courragious hearts, & the Ianizaries with the greater part of his fathers family on his side, & that great multitudes of people would flock vnto him vpon brute of his name: so that they which did now mourn for him as dead (in number many) would by heaps run to help him being aliue: so that they there present would only curteously receiue him as a guest, & protect him now distressed, til such time as his welwillers & friends might repaire vnto him. And this at last he gaue out not in secret, but openly to all men whersoeuer he came. The same things did they also report, whom he made the people to beleeue to haue been the companions of his flight: which was also confirmed by diuers of good account & authority, whom Baiazet had before dealt withall to that purpose. So that a great number of men altogether vnknown to Baiazet, were by that means seduced: for this matter was so cunningly wrought, that many of them that had known Mustapha aliue, & seen him laid dead before his fathers pauilion, yet listed not greatly to beleeue that which they knew, but easily suffred themselues to be persuaded that this was the true Mustapha. But the companions and followers of Mustapha (in whose mindes the liuely countenance and remembrance of him was thorowly ingrauen) nothing could deceiue: yet blinded partly with feare, partly with griefe & desire of reuenge, & wishing rather to aduenture any thing, than longer to liue without Mustapha, were the first men that came to offer their seruice to this counterfeit Mustapha: & would not suffer other men to doubt but that this was the very Mustapha, which it was falsly reported to haue bin slain. As for the deceiuer himselfe, he either kept with him, or entertained them that came, some with faire promises, some with curteous speeches, & many also with mony & rewards, which he made them beleeue he had reserued of the relicks of his better fortune: for Baiazet had before notably prouided, that nothing should in this behalfe be wanting vnto him for the countenancing of his credit. So within the space of a few daies such a multitude of men was resorted vnto him, as might almost haue made a whole army. When Solyman vpon the sudden was aduertised by the fearefull messengers & letters of the Sanzacks therabouts, what a danger was like to ensue by the concourse of so great a multitude of people to this counterfeit Mustapha: he presently suspecting (as the truth was) that this was not done without the priuity of one of his sons, thought it not a thing to be neglected, & therefore by his letters reproued the Sanzacks therby, that they had suffred the matter to run so far, & had not in the beginning as their duty was suppressed the fame; grieuously threatning them, if they did not with all speed send vnto him in bonds that counterfeit companion with the rest of his complices. Which that it might be the easilier by them performed, he promised to send one of the chief Bassa's, namely Partau Bassa (who had maried the widow of Mahometes the eldest son of Roxolana, of whom we haue before remembred) & with him a strong power of the souldiers of the court: but if they would haue themselues excused, that they should of themselues dispatch the matter before the comming of that aid. This Partau led after him certain squadrons of soldiers, not so many in number, as notable for their fidelity: for Solyman had caused the most faithful of his colonels, captains, & corporals, to be culled out; wisely doubting lest his soldiers, either led with affection, or corrupted with reward, might take part with him against whom they were sent. For the common sort of the Ianizaries standing in suspence at the fame of Mustapha, & expectation of some great nouelty, fauored that broile, & wished all on a hurly burly: neither was the matter indeed without danger. The Sanzackes after they had receiued this strait charge from Solyman, considering how much it stood them vpon to make a speedie dispatch, began now to incourage one another to bestir themselues, to make all the speed possible, and with all their power on euery side to oppose themselues against the attempts of this new found Mustapha, laboring to stay such as were comming vnto him, and dispersse such as were already come, by shewing them the greatnes of the danger, & threatning them with all extremities. In the meane time Rustan Bassa came out with his army, & was not (as in like case it oftentimes falleth out in things more yet sufficiently confirmed) by celeritie prevented) the souldiers of the contrerie Mustapha seeing themselues beset on euery side, began to feare, and at first some few to slip away; but afterwards all, without regard of shame or of their promist, to forsake their captaine and flie euery man whither he thought best. The captain seeking likewise to haue made shift for himselfe, was with the chiefe of his counsellors and followers taken by the Sanzacks and deliuered to the Bassa, who with a strong guard sent them all in bonds to Constantinople: where Solyman by most exquisite torments drew from them all the secret deuices of his yong son Baiazet, and that he had purposed after such a head made by this supposed Mustapha, as he thought conuenient to haue vpon the sudden ioyned himselfe with a great power, and to as should best serue for his purpose, to haue gone directly to Constantinople, as he did against his brother Selymus. But whilst he goeth somwhat slowly about his businesse, his yonger counsels were by his fathers celeritie oppressed. Of which matter Solyman now throughly allured, caused the supposed Mustapha and his companions at midnight to be drowned in the sea, thinking it not good to haue these things commonly knowne, and to haue his domesticall wounds yet bleeding, laid open to the view of his neighbor Princes. Neuerthles hee mightily offended with Baiazet for so great an insolencie, hee ceased not to cast in his mind how to be reuenged vpon him; which his wife Roxolana, a woman of great wisdome, was not ignorant of. Who after a few days, at such time as the old mans fury was ouerpast, talking of purpose into talke with him about the matter, she laid together in her sons behalfe, and alledged the indiscreetnesse of youth, the necessity of the fact, and the example of his ancestors in like case, that it was so prouided for by nature, that euery man should be carefull of himselfe and his, and that all men did indifferently shun death, that young men were by euill counsell easily seduced and made to forget their dutie. That it were reason hee should forgiue him this first fault; which if he amended, then was it a great gain for the father to haue saued his son: but if he should again fall into a relapse, there would not want time to punish him for both faults: And that it so be he would not pardon him for his own sake; yet he would vouchsafe to pardon him for hers, entreating now for him for whom she had before groaned, and not to be cruell vpon him, one of the pledges of their loue, in whome rested the blood of them both: for in what wofull case should she be, if of those two sons (all that God had left her) the fathers seuerity should bereaue her of the one? Wherfore she requested him to moderat his anger, & to prefer his clemencie before his iust indignation: forasmuch as God himselfe of all power and might, did not alwaies deale with sinners in seueritie, but for most part in mercie; whereas otherwise all mankind would not suffice his wrath. And would mercie in any place be more fitting, than in the father towards his child? Shee promised further, that Baiazet should from thenceforth remain in most dutifull obedience towards his Maiesty; & vpon his so great clemencie, to conuert the feare wherin he now liued, into a world of dutie and deuotion. Honorable minds (she said) were retained with nothing more than with kindenesse and curtesie, that the remembrance of that his fatherly forgiuenesse should be a stay vnto him, for euer doing the like againe: at last, that she would promise for him, and take vpon her, that he should for euer afterwards satisfie his fatherly expectation in all kind of dutie & loyaltie. Which words mingled with teares and other womanly gestures, so wrought with Solyman, being otherwise too much in her power, that he resolued to forgiue the fault: yet so, that hee should come and submit himselfe, and receiue from him his charge. This carefull mother foreslowes no time, but by letters secretly aduertised Baiazet not to feare to come vnto his father at such time as he should be sent for: assuring him that there was no danger; for that his father was by her means appeased; and he againe brought into his fauor. With which good news Baiazet well comforted, resolued to go at such time as he was sent for: yet full of feare, and often times looking backe vnto his brother Mustapha, whose dreadfull example sufficiently warned him what a danger he aduentured himselfe vnto. Yet he came to the place appointed for the parley, which was in a common Inne at a place called Carestran a few miles from Constantinople: for such is the suspicious manner of the Turkish Tyrants of these times, not to suffer any of their sonnes that be men growne, to set their foot within the gates of Constantinople, people, as dangerous for soliciting the soldiers of the court, and so consequently for the altering of the State. Baiazet was no sooner lighted from his horse, but his fathers gard was presently readie to receiue him, commanding him to lay aside his sword and dagger: which thing though it be a vsuall matter in others that are admitted to the presence of the Turkish Emperour, yet might it then in the mind of his guiltie son raise a great feare. But his kind mother (who had before foreseene in what feare and perplexitie he would come) had conueied her selfe into a chamber fast by the entrance of the same house as Baiazet was to passe, where out at a little casement couered with a thin linnen cloath, shee called vnto him in passing by, in these few words, Corcoma oglan, corcoma; which is as much to say, Feare not my son, feare not: with which short speech Baiazet was not a little both comforted and encouraged. But as soone as he was come into his fathers presence, and had done his dutie, Solyman commanded him to sit downe by him: then began the grim sire grieuously to reproue him of rashnesse and want of discretion in taking vp armes, which he could not otherwise conceiue of but as taken vp against himselfe. And admit they were as he would haue it, and the best that he could make of it, taken vp against his elder brother, yet was it neuertheless a great presumption and most wicked fact. Neither was there any want in him, but that the whole state of the Mahometan religion (which at this day resteth vpon the Othoman Family) had by his domesticall discord bin sore shaken, and brought in perill of vtter ruine, to the great iniurie, reproch, and contempt of his Maiestie, a most detestable and horrible crime, which could not with condigne punishment be reuenged. Yet for all that, he had determined to pardon him, & to shew himselfe rather a kind father, than a seuere judge; so that he would from thenceforth leaue the care of future things to God: forasmuch as none of these things are done by our appointment, but that kingdomes and monarchies are bestowed as best pleaseth him: so that if it were his destinie to enioy the Empire after his death, he should be sure thereof as of a thing that would of it selfe come vnto him, and was not by any mans power to be kept from him, as that which was by God ordained for him: but if it were otherwise appointed by God, then were it a mad thing for him to labor in vain to striue against the will of God, and as it were to fight with God. Wherfore he should now as one well warned, cease to rage and storme, and not to molest his quiet brother, or trouble him his aged father: for that if he should againe fall and raise new stirs, it would assuredly fall vpon his owne head, neither would any place of mercie be found for his second offence, and that he should then find him not as now, his gentle father, but a most seuere and reuenging judge. Which when he had said, and Baiazet had therunto briefly answered as the time would permit, rather crauing pardon for his trespasse, than excusing that was not to be excused, and promising from thenceforth to liue most loyally at his command; Solyman according to the manner of that nation called for drinke, which he commanded to be giuen to Baiazet, who not daring to refuse it, although he had rather haue so done, dranke thereof what he thought good, doubting lest that should haue bin his last: of which feare his father forthwith deliuered him by drinking a good draught of the same cup. So Baiazet, though guiltie, hauing with better successe spoken with his father than had his brother Mustapha, returned againe to the former place of his charge.

Baiazet returneth to his charge.

This hapned in the yeare 1555, from which time Baiazet so long as Roxolana his mother liued, behaued himselfe with all dutifull & brother kindnes both towards his father & his brother; and that rather for to keepe her fauor, and not to cut off the hope which he had onely in her affection towards him, than for any confidence he had in his fathers kindnes, or for any loue he bare to his brother; the regard of her being the onely thing that kept his fierce nature in quiet. But she dead about two yeres after, he as a man bereft of all hope of long life, & discharged of all bonds of dutie, fell to his former course, & began more grieuously than before, to reuiue the old grudges betwixt him and his brother, sometime seeking by secret practises to haue him made away, and other somtimes by open force entring into his prouince, which was not far off, there euil intreated some of his brothers followers as he light vpon, for their masters sake, omitting nothing which he thought might tend to the disgrace of him whom of all other he wished dead. He had also certain of his fauorits at Constantinople, by whom he cunningly wrought by al means to gain the loue of the soldiers of the court, & doubted not as occasion serued to passe ouer thither himself, and there to lurke in secret with such as were of his faction, and priuie to his designements. Of all which things Solyman had knowledge, but especifor that he was far deceiued, if he perceiued not, that these preambles of Ba[illegible] wicked intentions, would at last turn vpon his head, who regarded neither God nor man, so that he might alone raigne: vnto whose vnruly desires his fathers welfare was no lesse a bar, than was his brothers, and therfore through his sides was his life shot at. which treason had (as he said) been of long time plotted, and now occasion sought to haue the same performed: wherfore he should take heed that he were not by such trecherie ouerwhelmed before he were aware therof: That for himselfe he could easily beare with the iniuries of his brother Baiazet, yet could not chuse but be moued with the greatnesse of his fathers dangers. By which meanes Solymans hatred against Baiazet was still [illegible]e and more increased, Wherfore he by letters put him in remem- H

But all this was to no purpose [illegible] Baiazet, fully set down to hazard whatsoeuer, rather than as a beast to haue his throat cut by his brother: which thing he as plainely saw would betide him in the raigne of Selymus, as if it had bin euen then in execution. Yet he answered to his fathers commands not impertinently, but his deeds agreed not with his sayings, neither did he alter any thing of his intended purpose. Which thing as soone as Solyman perceiued, he thought it best to take another course, and to Solyman remoueth his two sonnes farther asunder. remoue his sons both farther from himselfe, and also farther the one from the other. Where- I fore he gaue them to vnderstand, That it was his pleasure that both of them within a certaine prefixed time should depart out of their gouernments (Baiazet being then gouernor of Cutai, and Selymus of Magnesia) and that now Baiazet should remoue to Amasia, and Selymus to Iconium. Selymus was without imputation, and altogether in fauor with his father: yet because no occasion should be giuen Baiazet to fall into extremities if he should haue been remoued alone, Solyman to seeme indifferent, commanded them both to remoue: vnto which command it was adioined, that the farther they were off one from another, they should be so much the neerer in mind and brotherly loue: forasmuch as neerenesse of dwelling of the Great, did manie times hinder their good agreement, whilest by forwardnesse of officers many things are on both sides done to the grieuing of their masters: and that they should in any case doe as they K were commanded, and that he which staied longest should not be free from the suspition of contempt. Selymus made no long stay, as he that knew a great part of all this to be done for his

Now Selymus gon before certaine daies journies with such troups as his father had sent him beside his owne, for feare of Baiazet, L who yet staid loitring and trifling on the time, suddenly returning and fetching a compasse about, shewed himselfe at his brothers backe, marching towards Prusa in Bythinia, the antient seat of the Turkish kings; which he did not without the priuitie of his father, who liked not of the lingring of Baiazet: for what if he, hauing gained the good will of the Ianizaries, should haue gon either to Prusa, or directly to Constantinople? what a danger might haue growne therby to Selymus, yea vnto the whole state in general? In this common feare, Solyman thought it best for Selymus there to stay, from whence they might most conueniently help one another, if Baiazet should (as was feared) turne himselfe vpon either of them. Yet was not Selymus so strong as to aduenture to ioine battell with his brother, whom he knew readie to put all to the hazard of one day. But when Baiazet (contrary to his expectation) saw Selymus behind him, and that he had got nothing by his long delay, but that his brother should be the vndoubted M heire of the empire if his father should die, which was then by reason of his sickly constitution of bodie daily more and more feared: he writ vnto his [illegible]ther, accusing his brother, That he could not more manifestly in any thing declare how mal[illegible]ously he was affected towards him, than by taking that indirect course, to no other purpose but to aspire vnto the Empire, and to haue

[illegible]aued a short cut ouer to Constantinople, if he should haue any news of his fathers death, which he still gaped after: which his longing, if his fathers longer life should delay, then by the secret ministers of his treason to dispatch him, and by the murdering of him to possesse himselfe of the empire: and yet neuertheless, this man as a most dutifull and obedient sonne, to be of him much made of, and as it were put in his bosome. Wheras he on the contrary part meaning wel, into whose conceit neuer any such thought came, but was euer at command, was not had in any regard, but cast off and contemned, whose greatest request was but to shun an vnfortunat ominous prouince. After that, he conuerted his stile to prayers, requesting againe of his father, to gratifie him with some other prouince, if it were but that from which his brother was depar-
B ted, or with any other whatsoeuer, so that it were more luckie than that of Amasia: for answer whereof he said he would stay where he was, to the end that finding fauour in his request, hee should not haue need further to retyre: but if he should not obtaine his request, that then he was readie to go whithersoeuer his father should command. It was not altogither for nought that Baiazet found fault with Amasia; being the manner of the Turks, of the smallest things of all to diuine vpon the greatest. But Solyman vnderstood the matter otherwise; who not ignorant of his sons teares, knew right well, that he in them sought for nothing els but a more commodious place for him to raise new stirs in, than was Amasia, so far distant from Constantinople. So Baiazet by many delaies did what he could to frustrat his fathers appointment, ceasing not in the meane time to augment his strength with new soldiers, to prouide armor, mony, and whatsoeuer els seruing for defence of himselfe, and the impugning of his brother. Which So-
C lyman tooke in no other part, than as intended against his owne person: yet would he seeme as not to haue any such vnderstanding of the matter: for why, the warie old sire would not by taking knowledge thereof, driue headlong his son, who was alreadie running too fast of himselfe. Besides that, he was not ignorant that the eyes of all nations were bent vpon this discord of his two sons; and therefore he desired by all means, that these grudges might be with as little stir as was possible, appeased. Wherfore he answered Baiazet curteously, That concerning his gouernment of Amasia, he could not alter it, as resolutely set downe as well for his brother as himselfe, and that therefore they should do well to go both to their appointed places, as he had before commanded. As for the rest, they should be of good comfort, for that hee would take such order, as that neither of them should haue iust cause to complaine. Partan Bassa the Solyman to bee sure that his two sons should goe to their appointed Prouinces, sendeth Partan and Mehemet, two of the Vizier Bassa's, to see the same brought thither.
D fourth of the great Bassa's of the court was appointed to go with this message to Baiazet, and Mehemet third of the same great Bassa's with like charge to Selymus, because the matter should seeme to be done with all indifferencie: and both of these great men commanded not to depart from them they were sent vnto, before they were both come vnto the places of their gouernment whereunto they were assigned. Which Solyman wisely did, to keepe them both within the compasse of dutie by the presence of such two graue counsellors. Which thing Selymus tooke in good part, but Baiazet not so: who hauing resolued with himselfe to set all on a hurly burly, thought nothing more vnfit for his designes, than to haue one of his fathers greatest counsellors still at his elbow as Censor of all his speeches and doings: wherfore hauing curteously entertained him, and rewarded him according to his abilitie, he dismissed him (though E vnwilling to depart) making this excuse, That he would vse him as his patron and defender Baiazet sendeth Partan Bassa backe againe to his father. with his father, forasmuch as he had no other in court to defend his cause, promising not to be vnto him an vnworthie or vnthankfull client: and to carry word backe againe vnto his father, That he would aboue all things haue care of his command, if he might so do for his brother Selymus, whose iniuries and trecheries he had much adoe to brooke. Partan the great Bassa so sent away, assured Solyman what the very mind and purpose of his yonger son was. And albeit that Baiazet to make it seeme as if something had been done by that embassage, made shew as if he would haue presently gone towards Amasia: yet Solyman neuertheless fearing the worst, Solyman makes preparation against Baiazet, and sendeth aid to Selymus.

swords? was it not against the Emperors son, and happily the heire of the [illegible]ire? Wherfore this war might (as they said) well enough be let alone, as altogither vnnecessa[illegible], and not they to be inforced to imbrue their hands one in anothers bloud, & to pollute themselues with such impietie: as for that which Baiazet did, was to be holden excused, as proceeding from necessitie. Which speeches of the Ianizaries being brought to Solymans eares, he forthwith declared them to the Muphti (who in all matters of doubt they flee vnto as vnto a most sacred Oracle) demanding of him, how he was to be intreated, who of himselfe presumed whiles he yet liued, to leuie soldiers, raise an armie, ransacke townes, and trouble the state of the whole Empire? and what also he deemed of them that were his followers and tooke part with him? and last of all, of them also that refused to beare armes against him, and said that he had in so doing nothing offended? Whereunto the Muphti answered, That both the man and his part-takers were all worthy of death, & that such as refused to take vp arms against him, were as prophane and irreligious men, to be accounted intestable. Which the great priests answer was published vnto the people, and by the chiefe Chiaus sent to Baiazet, to see if he might be therewithmoued. Within a few days after, there came to Constantinople one of the Chiaus (whom Baiazet had intercepted, being sent from Solyman to Selymus) by whom Baiazet gaue his father to vnderstand, That he was in all dutie his, and that he had not taken vp armes against him, neither refused to be vnto him in all things obedient; but that he had only to do with his brother, and with him to fight for his life, by whose sword he must die, or els he by his, for that a mischief was to be by one of them performed: which quarrel he was resolued to trie whiles he yet liued, and that therefore he should do best not to meddle in the quarrell, or giue aid to either. But if so be he would needs (as the report was) passe ouer the sea to aid Selymus, he should not thinke easily to get him into his hands, for that he knew right well, if the worst came, how to escape and saue himselfe; and would before he could get ouer into Asia, make such spoile with fire and sword, as neuer had Tamerlane or other the cruellest enemy of the Turks that euer was. Which message did not a little trouble Solyman. And withall it was reported, That the towne of Axuar, where one of Selymus his sons ruled as Sanzacke, was alreadie taken by Baiazet and shamefully sacked. But Selymus hearing that his brother was gon toward Amasia, and now on his way as far as Ancyra, being out of all suspition of danger which he feared vpon the way so long as his brother was yet lingring in those quarters, hasted now towards Iconium, which was with a strong garison kept for him: for amongst other cares wherwith Solyman was vexed, it was not the least, That Baiazet intercepting Iconium, should get into Syria, and from thence into Ægypt, an open countrey, and not yet thorowly established vnder the Turkish gouernement, neither forgetfull of the old gouernment of the Mamalukes, and therefore desirous of change: from whence it would haue been an hard matter to haue driuen Baiazet, especially the Arabians being alwaies readie and at hand at euery light stir, where any hope of prey was: out of which prouince also in case of extremitie he might easily transport himselfe into any of the Christian kingdomes. Solyman therefore tooke great care, that this passage, which might seem the last refuge of Baiazets deuices, might be stopped vp; and concerning the same, had giuen commandement vnto most of his commanders in Asia, to be alwaies in readines to aid Selymus whensoeuer he should call. With them Selymus lay incamped vnder the walls of Iconium, attending euery stirring of Baiazet, resoluing there to expect further aid from his father, and not by vntimely fight to commit his safetie to the hazard of one doubtfull battell. But Baiazet on the other side not vnmindfull what a matter he had taken in hand, slept not thereupon, but first entertained a valiant sort of horsemen which the Turks call Chiurts, and are supposed to be of that people which were somtimes called Gordij, men for their knowne valour famous. He yet lay in the plain and open fields by Ancyra, of the commodities of which city (which were indeed great) he made great vse: In the castle thereof he bestowed his concubines & children; of the rich merchants he tooke vp mony to be repaid with the vse vpon the good successe of the war; and from thence he tooke whatsoeuer was needfull for the arming and furnishing of his men. Besides his own family, which was very great, and those Chiurts which we spoke of, many repaired vnto him which had bin in former time beholden to his mother, his sister, and Rustan the great Bassa; many also of the reliques of the valiant Mustapha and Achomates the great Bassa, valiant men and expert souldiers, who desired to reuenge the vnworthie death of their Lords and Masters, euen with their owne. Neither was there wanting an exceeding Baiazet taketh at Ancyra, and there raiseth his Power.

A rablement of such as wearie of their present state, desired some new innouation & change. The commiseration also of the state of the vnfortunat Baiazet, easily drew many to take part with him, whose whole trust was in his valor: they fauored the yong prince, liuely resembling his father: when as in Selymus appeared no likenesse of himselfe, but the expresse lineaments of his mothers face and bodie, a woman whilest she liued generally hated of all the people: hee went heauily as ouercharged with his greasie paunch, blub cheeked, and exceeding red faced; so that the souldiers in sport would say, he was fed with greene mault: he was altogether giuen to his ease, and spent his time in drunkennesse & sleep, neither was he courteous of speech nor willing to deserue well of any man; for he would not (as he said) offend his father by being popular, so was he only of his father beloued, & of all other men hated: of all kind of men B he most misliked of them that set all their hope in a bountifull & couragious prince. The same soldiers were also wont to call Baiazet, Softie (that is to say) a man giuen to quietnesse & study: but after they saw him take vp arms, & for the safegard of himselfe and his children ready to aduenture any thing, they began to admire him as a man of valor & courage: and to aske among themselues, Why his father should reiect him of such worth, the expresse image of himselfe, and preferre before him that gorbellied sluggard, in whom no sparke of his fathers valour was to be seen? This his entring into armes was no fault, being thereunto by necessitie enforced, for, had not Selymus their grandfather don the like? wherof no better example could be found; whom the force of necessity constrained not only to take vp armes against his brother, but also to hasten the death of his father; and by so doing, purchased vnto himselfe and his posterity C the empire: which so gotten, if Solyman did not vniustly possesse, why might not his son vse the same course? why should he so rigorously reuenge that in his son, that was so lawful in the grandfather? Although there was (as they said) great difference betweene that Selymus & this Baiazet; for that this man intended no harme against his father, but wished him long to liue; neither yet against his brother, if he might by his leaue but liue, if he would but once cease to do him wrong: that it was alwaies accounted lawfull to repell force by force, & to shun present death, if the Destinies would so permit. By such affections and motiues, Baiazet his power increased daily: which being now growne almost to the greatnesse of a full armie, he thought it not best to vse longer delay, but to march forthwith against his brother to fight with him D one battell for his life, state, and empire: accounting it some commendation (although in vain) to haue attempted so great an enterprise. His purpose was (as Solyman feared) to get into Siria, which if he could bring to passe, he then doubted not of the rest. Selymus strengthned with his fathers power, lay waiting for his comming before Iconium, wel appointed of all warlike prouision: his army was excceeding strong, and in it many notable commanders, martiall men of great experience, whom his father had ioined vnto him; who all lay couered with their great ordnance planted in places most conuenient. But Baiazet nothing terrified therewith, as soone as he came within sight of his brothers army, exhorted his souldiers in few words to play the men, for that now was come the time they wished for, and place for them to shew their valour in: wherefore they should shew themselues couragious and valiant, and he would make them E all rich and fortunate: he told them, that their fortune was now in their owne hands, to frame it euery man as hee would himselfe; so that if any of them were wearie of their present state, there was the field wherein they might exchange it with better and therein lay downe the miseries of their former liues: that of him they should if they ouercame, expect riches, promotion, honours, and whatsoeuer else, the rewards of valiant men: that with the victorie of one battell, all their desires should be satisfied, were they neuer so great: which victorie was by the valor which rested in them to be gotten, and his brothers army, the heartlesse followers of a heartlesse captain, ouerthrowne, for as his fathers souldiers that were with his brother, they were in bodie present, but in mind altogether on his side: that it was onely Selymus that withstood his welfare and their felicity, whom they should therefore valiantly seeke for in field as F their common enemie; and not to be a fraid of his multitude, forasmuch as victorie was to be gained, not by number, but by valour: and the most mightie God of heauen and earth was still present, not with the most, but with the bee: Besides that, he willed them to remember with what a cruell enemie they were to fight, who thirsted after nothing more than their bloud: And to conclude, he willed them all, not to looke vpon his words, but his deeds; and said, If as you shall see me fighting for your profit, you shal likewise fight for mine honor, I dare then assure sure you of the victory. Which said, hee with great courage charged the e[illegible] and fighting himselfe long time amongst the formost, and there performing all the parts of a valiant souldier, and worthie captaine, was for his notable valour no lesse commended of his enemies, than of his owne souldiers. The battell was bloudy and terrible, and many fell on both sides. But after that they with wonderfull obstinacie had a great while fought with doubtfull victorie, so that fortie thousand Turks lay there dead vpon the ground; at length the victory began to encline to that side whereon stood the greater strength, the iuster cause and better counsell. Many of the enemies being slaine, and many of his owne people also lost, Baiazet was enforced to retire; which he did so leisurely, and without shew of any feare, that he seemed to the beholders, he had welneere as well gained as lost the field: neither durst Selymus pursue him, but stood still fast in the same place, neuer more glad of any thing, than to see his brothers backe. But Baiazet after he had in contempt of his fathers command thus run his owne course, and satisfied his owne desire, though disappointed of his purpose, and not able to performe the iourney by him intended into Syria, turned now his course, and began in good earnest to go to Solyman speedily aduertised of the euent of this battell, forthwith passed ouer into Asia: for as the great Bassaes his counsellors thought it not conuenient for him to go ouer the strait before the victory; so after it was certainly knowne, they thought it not good longer to stay, lest the ouerthrow of Baiazet might giue occasion to such as secretly fauored his quarrel, to shew themselues, and so to raise greater troubles. Besides that, the fame of his passage ouer, would (as they said) much auaile both to the discouragement of Baiazet, and the terrifying of his friends: and therefore it was by them thought good, hastily to pursue him, now ouerthrown, and not to suffer him to gather courage by the example of his grandfather Selymus, Solymans father; who had bin more terribly vanquished than when he stood in his whole strength, and might seeme by that meanes to haue especially preuailed, for that he was at first vnfortunatly ouerthrowne. Neither were these things without reason foreseene; for it is almost incredible, what admiration and loue this battell (although vnfortunat) did get to Baiazet; men wondred that he durst with so small a power, and as it were but a handfull of men, encounter with his brother far better appointed, and also supported by his fathers strength: not fearing either the disaduantage of the place, or the furie of the great artillerie, and to haue behaued himselfe in the battell not like a young souldier, but like an old and expert commander. Selymus might at his pleasure boast of himselfe as they said (to his father) for the victory; but Baiazet was the man that deserued to haue ouercome: and that Selymus might to any thing ascribe the victorie, rather than to his owne valour.

These and such like speeches, as they made Baiazet gratious amongst the people generally; so doubled they his fathers cares, and increased his hatred, to wish him the rather dead. For why, he was resolutely set downe, not to leaue any other heire of his empire than Selymus his eldest son, alwaies loiall & obedient vnto him: whereas the other hee abhorred as stubborne and rebellious, gaping after the empire whilest he yet liued: of whom he was therfore so much the more to stand in dread, by how much he was reputed to be of more valor, & for the aid he had now so openly giuen to Selymus. For these causes he passed ouer the strait into Asia, with purpose not to goe farre from the sea coast, but as it were a far off with his fauorable aspect to countenance Selymus his proceedings: doubting by comming too neere with his armie, to endanger himselfe by the sudden reuolt of the Ianizaries, which he aboue all things feared.

Angerius Busbequius Epist. 3. legationis Turcicæ.

I my selfe (saith the author of this historie) saw him departing out of Constantinople the first of Iune in the yere 1559, when as within a few daies after, I my selfe was also sent for thither: for the Bassaes thought it not amisse to haue me in the campe, and to vse me courteously as their friend, for which cause I was assigned to lodge in an Inne in a village neere to the campe, where I lay very well. The Turks lay in the fields round about: but lying there three months I had good leisure and opportunitie to see the manner of their campe, and in part to know the order of their martiall discipline. So I attiring my selfe in such apparell as the Christians commonly vse in those places, went vp and downe with one or two companions at my pleasure vnknown. First I saw the souldiers of all sorts most orderly placed, and that, which he would scarcely beleeue that knoweth the maner of our war, there was in euery place great silence, & as a man may say, dumbe quietnesse, no brawling, no insolencie, no not so much as a word or laughter passing in sport or drunkennesse. Besides that wonderfull cleanlinesse, no dunghils, no excrements that might offend either the eyes or nose, for all such things the Turks doe either bury or carry them far out of sight. They themselues so oft as they are inforced to discharge the burthen of nature, dig an hole with a spade and bury it, so is all their camp without filth. There was not to be seene any drinking or feasting, no dicing (the great shame of our wars) the losse of mony or time at cards or dice, the Turks know not. I met only with a rough Hungarian and his companions, a souldier, who heaule himselfe, to the Lute rather houled than sung a doleful dittie, containing the last words of a fellow of his dying of his wounds vpon the greene banke of Danubius, wherein he requesteth the riuer, because it ran to the place where he was borne, to carrie newes to his friends and countrymen, that he died an honorable death, and not vnreuenged, for the increase of his religion, and honor of his country: whereunto his fellowes sighing, bare a foot, O happie and thrice happie wight, would Fortune with thee change we might. For the Turks are of opinion, That no mens soules go more speedily to heaueh, than of such valiant men as die in battell, for whose welfare their maidens daily make prayers and vowes. I would also needs go through their butcherie, where their beasts were killed, to see what flesh was to be sold; where I saw but foure, or at most fiue weathers hanging ready dressed, and that was the butcherie for the Ianizaries, which I deemed to be in that camp not fewer than foure thousand. I maruelled that so little flesh should suffice so many men: but I was answered, That few of them did eat flesh, for that most part of them had their victuals transported from Constantinople. Then I demanding what it was, they shewed me a Ianizarie sitting by, who in an earthen dish had killed a turnep, an onion, a head of garlike, a parsenep, and a cucumber, all sauced with salt and vineger, or more truly to say, with hunger; whereon he fed as sauorly, as if they had bin feasants or partridges: his drinke was the common drinke of all liuing creatures, euen faire water. By which frugall kind of diet, they prouide both for the health of their bodies, and the sparing of their purse: and that I maruelled the more at, it was the time that their great fast, or to speake after our fashion, their Lent was at hand: at which time with vs Christians, euen in well ordered cities, much more in camps, all rings with playing, dancing, singing, crying, quaffing, carousing; and in briefe, with madding and phrensie. So that it is not vainely reported, That a Turke sent about that time embassadour into Germanie, comming home, reported, That the Christians on certaine daies did riot, and became mad, vntill they, besprinckled with a certain kind of ashes in the church, came to themselues again, and so recouered; and that it was a wonderful thing to see, how much they were changed by the efficacie of that remedy, that they seemed not to be the same men: meaning indeed the disordered maners of the Christians at Shrouetide, and the ceremonies vsed on Ashwednesday: Which thing they to whom it was told, so much the more maruelled at, for that the Turks haue many medicines which cause madnesse, but few or none which presently easeth the same. And they vpon those daies that goe before their great fasts, change nothing of their woonted manner of life to the worse: but rather contrariewise prepare themselues to abstinence, by taking somewhat from their vsuall fare, the better to indure the sudden change of their fast: which they so precisely obserue, that vpon their fasting dayes they will not so much as taste a cup of water, or wash their mouthes with water all the day long, before the stars appeare in the skie: which maketh their fasts, especially in Summer when the daies be long & hot, to be vnto them very tedious.

Whiles I thus lay in the campe, there came vnto me one Albertus a learned man with certaine Presents from the Emperor to Solyman, which were, certaine gilt plate; & a most curious clock, which was caried vpon an Eliphant like a castle; & some crowns to be dispersed among the Bassaes: which Solyman would needs haue presented vnto him in the campe in the sight of the whole armie, to make it the better knowne what friendship was betweene him and the Emperour, and that he needed not to feare any danger from the Christian Princes.

Presents sent from the emperor Ferdinand to Solyman.

But to returne againe to Baiazet, from whom we haue a while digressed: he after the battell at Iconium had retired himselfe to Amasia, the place of his gouernment, as though he would haue now there quietly liued, if his father would so giue him leaue. He had now satisfied his youthfull desires & griefe, and seemed willing from thenceforth to satisfie his fathers better expectation: and therfore ceased not by letters & fit men to prooue his fathers mind. Neither did Solyman shew himselfe strange from such a reconciliation: at first he easily gaue the messengers audience, read his sons letters, & courteously returned answer; so that it was commonly reported reported in the camp, that the father and the son would agree, and that the o[illegible]n would par- G don the youthfull pranke alreadie past, so that he would from thenceforth [illegible]ame dutifull.

Solyman dissembleth with Baiazet. But al this was by the counsel of the Bassaes, nothing but deep dissimulation in the craftie old sire, vntill he had shut vp Baiazet, and so got him aliue into his hand: for it was feared, lest he despairing of pardon, should with such a power breake into the borders of Persia (now the only place left for his refuge) as might preuent the watchfull diligence of his lieutenants vpon those frontiers; whom Solyman charged by continuall letters so to stop all the passages into Persia, as that there should not be any crany for Baiazet to flie out by. In the mean time, if any came within his reach that were suspected to haue taken part with Baiazet, or fauored his proceedings, those he caused to be tortured & secretly made away, and among them some whom Baiazet had of purpose sent to excuse themselues. For Solyman fearing lest Tamas the Persian H king (more mindfull of h[illegible]d quarrells than of the late inforced peace) should hardly with much adoe suffer his sonne to be got out of his hands if he should flie thither, and [illegible]ine raise a long and dangerous war; did therefore what he possibly might to oppresse him [illegible]re he should come thither. Which his purpose although it was coueted with al secrecie, yet was it not hidden from some of Baiazet his friends, by whom he was oftentimes warned not to trust his father, but to beware of treason, and in any case speedily to prouide for his owne safety. But Solyman thinking he had now so prouided as that he could by no means escape, and happily the more to deceiue his son, appointed to returne with his army to Constantinople the day after their Easter day. But Baiazet, vpon the very feast-day hauing performed the soon his vnfortunat iourney towards Persia; knowing right well, that he went to the antient enemie of the Othoman Family, but yet fully resolued to make proofe of any mans mercie, rather than to fall into the hands of his angrie father. Now were they all set forward, except such weake soules as were not thought able to indure the labour of so long a iourney, among whom was left Solyman, Baiazet his yongest sonne, but then newly borne; which guiltlesse babe, with his mother, Baiazet thought better to leaue vnto the mercie of his grandfather, than to take him with him, a poore companion of his wofull and miserable flight: whom Solyman as yet vncertain of his fathers fortune, commanded to be nursed at Prusa. Baiazet so gone from Amasia, vsed such celeritie in his trauell, that almost in euery place he preuented the fame of his comming, & light vpon many that were appointed to haue staid his passage, before they were K Baiazet deceiueth the Bassa of Sebastia. ready or aware of his comming. The Bassa of Sebastia he thus deceiued: There was two waies, whereof the one of them being intercepted, would greatly hinder his iourney, and that the Bassa had already taken: wherefore he sent certain, as if they had bin fugitiues, to tell the Bassa that he was alreadie gone the other way. Which the Bassa beleeuing, left the place he had before taken, and rising with all his power to pursue him the other way, whereby it was told him he was gone, left that way free and open for him to passe by.

The Bassa of Erzirum deceiued by Baiazet. The Bassa of Erzirum he deceiued also by another not much vnlike shift: from whom when he was not farre distant, and knowing that in passing through his countrey, he was to endure great danger, he set vpon him with a wile, sending vnto him certain of his followers with commendations: who afterwards lamentably complaining of the yong princes calamity, to moue L the Bassa to pitty, at last requested that he would giue him leaue to shoo his horses in his territorie; telling him, that he came vnprouided of all things, & therefore desirous in that fruitfull country to refresh his horses a day or two, and to new shoo them. Whereunto the Bassa courteously answered, That he would not let him to take whatsoeuer he needed. But whether it was for the compassion that he had vpon the state of Baiazet, or for the secret loue he bare him, or that he thought by that means the easilier to entrap him, is doubtful; & happily preuented by Baiazets quick speed, had not as yet sufficient time to draw together his souldiers. He sent also vnto Baiazet certain small Presents, seeming to be glad of his welfare & comming: who neuertheless kept on his way, resting no part of the day, and but a little of the night. The Bassa of Erzirum vnderstanding that Baiazet came still on, made what hast hee could also, and ioyned M his power to the rest of the Bassaes which followed after: for many Bassaes and Sanzackes hearing that Baiazet was fled from Amasia, pursued fast after him, being charged by Solyman vpon pain of their heads to bring him back either aliue or dead: but all in vaine, by reason of his speedy departure, & for that he made more hast to flie, than they did to follow. Yet it [illegible] no man

A man deerer than this Bassa of Erzirum, of whom we haue now spoken, whom Solyman for this cause displaced: and Selymus afterwards slew, with two of his sonnes, young stplings whom he had before in despight shamefully abused against nature. Yea Selymus himselfe and Mahomet the great Bassa, with the Berglerbeg of Grecia, followed also at [illegible]Baiazet, thought were a far off. This his departure grieued Solyman aboue measure, assuring himselfe as the truth was) Solyman much grieued with the flight of his sonne.
that he was fled into Persia: wherewith he was so much moued, that he could scarcely contain
B himselfe, but would needs haue gone with all his power in all hast against the Persian, to haue terrified him at hand from relieuing his rebellious son. But these his raging fits his graue counsellors moderated, by declaring vnto him what danger hee should aduenture himselfe vnto, by reason of the doubtfull faith of his best souldiers. And what if Baiazet (as he was a desperat and sudden man) should in the meane time turne about aboue Pontus and the fens of Moetis, and so fetching a compasse come to Constantinople, and proclaiming a generall libertie in his absence; possesse himselfe of the empire. By which wholsome persuasion Solyman staid his so hastiea iourney: but Baiazet all the way as he went, writ vpon the the gates and doores, That he would giue double pay to all such as should follow him: which caused Solymans captaines to haue their owne souldiers in distrust, and the more for that they might oftentimes heare amongst them, speeches of great good will and loue towards Baiazet.

After long flying, hee was at length come to the Riuer Araxis, which separated the Turkes The eager pursuit of the Bassaes and Sanzackes.
kingdome from the Persian; which hauing passed ouer, and yet not so in safetie, he left cer-C taine of his followers vpon the banke of the riuer to keep the Sanzacks (who still eagerly pursued him) from passing ouer: whom the Sanzacks easily repulsed, & so passing the riuer, entred a great way into the Persian kingdome, vntill such time as that they were met withall by certain of the nobilitie of Persia with great troupes of horsemen; who demanding of them what they meant, and what they sought for in another mans kingdome, were answered by the Turkes, That they pursued their kings fugitiue sonne. To whom the Persians replied, That they did not well, contrarie to the league with their Lord and Master, to come in armes beyond the bounds of their owne kingdome; and that there was a strong league betweene king Tamas and Solyman, which it behoued them to regard: as for Baiazet, their king would consider what was conuenient for him to do, and not in that point forget himselfe: in the meantime they should D do well to get them out of that countrey wherein they had nothing to doe. Whereupon the Turks forthwith left this pursuit and retired.

But by and by came messengers from the Persian King to Baiazet to salute him, and to demand the cause of his comming, and also to see what strength he brought with him; which as some account was about 20000. To whom Baiazet declared, That he by his brothers iniuries and fathers hard dealing, driuen out of his countrey, was fled vnto the sacred maiestie of the Persian king, as his most assured refuge, who, as he wel hoped, in compassion of mans instabilitie, would not reie& him so distressed, & otherwise destitute of all helpe. Whereunto the Persian replied, That he had done very vnwisely to come vnto him that was in league and amity with his father; wherof one condition was, That they should account the enemies of the one, the enemies of the other; and the friends of the one, the friends of the other. Which law to E breake, he accounted a thing vtterly vnlawful: neuertheless seeing the matter was so falne out, Baiazet wel entertained by the Persian king.
he was welcome as vnto his friend, who in his behalfe would leaue nothing vnattempted to reconcile him to his father, which he despaired not to bring to passe. So Baiazet meeteth with the Persian king, but in an euil houre, although at their first meeting there was great welcome, friendly countenance, cheerfull lookes, mutuall kindnesse, often conference, and great feasting one of another; things whereby the secret thoughts of hollow hearts are best concealed: there was also a motion made of a straighter bond of alliance, & one of the Persian kings daughters promised to Orchanes one of Baiazets sons; and he put in hope that the Persian king would neuer rest in quiet, vntill Solyman had made him Gouernour either of Mesopotamia, Babylon, or Erzirum (which Gouernments were by the Persians greatly extolled) and that he might there F liue without feare of his brother, farre from him and his father also; where if any thing should fall out otherwise than well, he might haue his brother the Persian king a sure refuge to retire vnto, and so safe from all danger. Which speeches were happily giuen out, of purpose to auert Baiazet his thought from the feeling of the present danger; who seemed vnto himselfe so assured of the loue and friendship of Tamas the Persian King, that at such time as hee sent his embassadors to Constantinople, for a reconciliation to be made betwe[en] Solyman & him (as was commonly supposed) he willed the same embassador to tell his fa[ther] that he had lost a father at Constantinople, and found another in Persia. But whether the Persian dealt sincerely in this behalfe for Baiazet by his embassadors, which were many, may well be doubted. Like it is, that there was more fained shew of double diligence, than of true meaning there in, and the rather to feele the mind of Solyman, than to do any good to the poore distressed prince: & the rather, for that in the meane time all things were seriously plotted that might tend to his destruction. Which were no sooner growne to their full ripenesse, but there was of purpose a motion made, That such a multitude as followed this young Prince lay so close together, that there was not in one place victuall sufficient for them, and that it was therefore more conuenient to haue them billited in the countrie thereabouts; which would be more commodious, as well for the better victualling of them, as for diuers other purposes also. Truth was, that Tamas the Persian king, far vnlike his noble father Ismael, stood in doubt lest he brought vp a serpent in his bosome. Yet there were many which thought, that it was not the Persians mind at first to haue destroied Baiazet, but to haue bin thereunto enforced by the practise of some of his familiars and followers; who not regarding the courtesie of the Persian king, nor the lawes of hospitalitie, persuaded Baiazet to thrust him out of his kingdome: whereof there was many euident tokens. And among other things it was told king Tamas, that one of Baiazets chiefe captains should say, What meane we? why stay we to kill this hereticall king, and to possesse his kingdome? for we shall no doubt by his trecherie all come to destruction. And that vpon such occasion the king was constrained to condiscend to a deuise more necessarie than honourable. Baiazet had no great power, but most of them were valiant men, and souldiers of great experience, ready to aduenture vpon any thing: of whom the Persian not without cause stood in some feare. He knew his kingdome to be neither antient nor yet well assured, as gotten by his father by the counterfeit shew of a reformed religion: and who could assure him, but hat amongst so many nations ouer whom he lorded, but that there were many wearie of the present state, and so desirous of nouelties? vnto whom nothing could chance more fitting than the comming of Baiazet, a noble and valiant young gentleman; and that more was, desperatly set: that as yet he himselfe might of right rather seeme in the power of his guest, than he in his: and that therefore he was to alter the matter, and not longer to entertain him as his guest, but to coupe him vp as a most dangerous wild-beast. Which to do, the easiest way was to disperse his power, and so to take him vnawares; for that he could not without much bloudshed be openly taken in the midst of his strength, especially by the dainty Persian, of long time not vsed to war, and as yet not come together, against Baiazets souldiers, men of great actiuitie and experience. So was the matter cunningly imparted vnto him for the dispersing of his forces, and all the commodities to ensue thereof alledged: which Baiazet might not well gainsay, although many of his wise followers (men of great reach) did shrewdly suspect the sequell. But what could he refuse, vpon whom necessitie lay so heauie? where no other hope was left? where he liued as it pleased another man; and that again too, where once to doubt of the fidelitie of his hoast, might be imputed to him for the greatest trecherie? So these most valiant souldiers, the poore princes faithful followers, neuer again to see one another, are dispersed into diuers countrey villages, and bestowed where the Persians thought good. Not many daies after, at a time pickt out for the purpose, they in number few, & dispersed in a strange country, were inclosed by many and slaine: their horses, armor, apparell, and whatsoeuer els, became a prey vnto the murtherers. At the same instant was Baiazet and his sonnes cast in bonds also; and that to his greater griefe as many report, taken as he was sitting merrily at dinner at the kings table. The Persian king seemed to haue foreseene much in this his hard dealing with Baiazet: as if that he, being a valiant and couragious young prince, and much better soldier than his brother, should haue succeeded his father in his empire, much trouble and perill might haue grown thereby, both to himselfe and his kingdome: and that it stood far better with the safetie of his estate, that Selymus (a man wholly giuen to voluptuousnesse and ease) should raigne ouer the Turks; in whose time he might as it were promise vnto himselfe all peace and securitie: and therfore it was thought that he would neuer let Baiazet goe aliue out of his hand, but rather make him away in prison, as if he had there died for melancholy and griefe. Well he was assured, that after he had slaine his followers, and imprisoned himselfe and his sonnes, hee would neuer be friends friends with him that had so notably wronged him. Baiazet thus shamefully imprisoned, messengers ran continually too and fro betwixt the two old Princes Solyman and Tamas. Amongst the rest, the Persian King sent a solemne Embassadour vnto the Turke with Presents, namely curious tents, costly carpets, an Alcaron containing the mysteries of their superstition, and certaine strange beasts. The cause of his comming was pretended to be for a reconciliation to be made betweene Solyman and his Sonne; which Embassador was honourably entertained and feasted by the great Bassa's. Now was poore Baiazet in small hope of life, his cruell father still craiuing to haue him deliuered into his hands to be slaine: and the Persian yet denying to deliuer him, and seeming to defend him, but not (as was thought) altogether faithfully. Solyman left no meanes vnattempted to haue wrung him from the Persian; sometimes he spake him faire, putting him in mind of his league, wherein it was agreed, That they should both haue the same friends and the same enemies: otherwhile he terrified him with great words, and denouncing of war, except he would deliuer him his sonne: he furnished with strong garrisons all the frontiers of his dominion towards Persia; he filled all Mesopotamia and the bankes of the riuer Euphrates with soldiers, especially with them of his owne guard, and such as hee had before vsed in the battell against Baiazet; ouer whom commanded Mehemet Bassa the third of the Visier Bassa's, and Selymus the Beglerbeg of Græce (for Selymus was soone wearie of the field, and so betime returned home:) he also incited the Georgian people to take vp armes against the Persians: who wisely answered, That they had not such confidence in their owne strength, as to prouoke king Tamas; but let Solyman himselfe come with his armie, and when they saw him present in the field, then they knew what they had to do, & that he should then well see that they wanted neither discretion nor valour. And because he would leaue nothing vnproued, he made shew as if he would in person himselfe haue gon to Aleppo in Syria, and so haue on that side inuaded the Persian: neither was the Persian king altogether out of feare, hauing to his cost many times prooued what Solyman was able to doe. But the vnwillingnesse of the souldiers, and their mindes altogether estranged from that warre, easily staied the raging Turke: they detested that warre, and forsooke their ensignes, a great number of whom (especially horsemen) without leaue of their Captaines returned to Constantinople: and beeing commanded againe to the campe, went indeed, but with such countenance and cheere as well declared how they were affected, & what they would do if occasion serued for them to reuolt.

For which cause, after that Solyman perceiued that Baiazet could not aliue be got from the Persian (excusing himselfe by feare of reuenge by him whom he had so grieuously offended, if he should by any meanes escape) he thought it best to follow that which was next, and to haue him there slaine; which he was in good hope to compasse, and the rather, for that the Persian had but lately written vnto him, That he could not but much maruell to see him deale so slenderly in a matter of so great importance: That he on his part had sent him diuers embassadors; & that he on the other side had sent him nothing but common messengers with papers, which caused him to thinke that he made no great account of the matter: wherefore he should doe well to send vnto him men of account and place, with whom he might confer and conclude also according to the weightinesse and exigence of the cause: besides that, he was (as he said) not a little in his debt, for that Baiazet and his followers had beene vnto him no small charge before he could get him into his power: all which it were good reason he should haue consideration of. Whereby Solyman perceiued, that mony was the thing the Persian king sought after; and therefore rather than he would in an vnfit time of his life intangle himselfe in a dangerous and vnnecessarie war, he determined by the counsell of his Bassa's, rather with money than with the sword to fight with the Persian king. Herupon was Hassan Aga (one of the chiefe gentlemen of his chamber) appointed embassador into Persia, with whom was ioined the Bassa of Maras, a man both for his age and place, reuerend: who departing with a large commission almost in the depth of Winter, with great speed and wonderfull toile by those long and difficult waies, arriued at last at Casbin the seat of the Persian king, hauing by the way lost diuers of their seruants and followers. Being come to the Court, the first thing they desired was to see Baiazet, whome they found shut vp in a close prison, pale and wan as a man forlorne, with his haire and beard so long and ouergrowne, as that he was not to be knowne before he was new trimmed; which done, then appeared the liuely resemblance of his wonted countenance and fauor, so that Hassan verily knew him to be him: for he had beene brought vp with him of a childe childe in the Court, and for this cause especially had Solyman sent him thither to be assured that it was he. At length after long discourse and conference betweene the King and the Embassadors, it was agree vpon, that the King should receiue from Solyman full recompence of all the charges he had been at, and of the harmes by him sustained since the comming of Baiazet into Persia, with such further reward as so great a good turne deserued: which things performed, that then it should be in Solymans power to haue Baiazet made away. With this news Hassan posteth to his master at Constantinople, who forthwith caused the promised reward, together with such charges as the Persian King demanded, to be made readie, and with a safe conuoy to be sent vnto the borders of Persia, where they were of the Persians receiued. Presently after returneth Hassan the appointed executioner of the vnfortunat Baiazet: for so Solyman had straitly charged him to strangle him with his owne hands. Which thing this new made hangman accordingly performed, and with a bow-string strangled the vnfortunate Prince; who is reported to haue requested of the executioner, that he might but see his children before he died, and take of them his last farewell: which poore request could not be granted, but he forthwith commanded to die. This was the wofull end of the vnluckie attempts of Baiazet, a Prince of far more worth than was Selymus his brother, who in seeking to shun the death he feared, hasted the same before his time. Such as was the fathers end, was also the end of his foure sons, Omer, Amurat, Selym, and Muhamet: of whom the three eldest were strangled at Casbin with their father, whose dead bodies together with his, were solemnly brought to Sebastia and there buried. The yongest but new borne left at Amasia, and sent by his grandfather to Prusa (as is before said) to be there nursed, was now vpon the death of his father commanded by his said grand father to be strangled also. The Eunuch sent by Solyman to haue done the deed, and loth to do it himselfe, tooke with him one of the Porters of the Court, a desperate and otherwise a hard hearted Ruffian, a man thought fit to haue performed any villanie: he comming into the chamber where the childe lay, and fitting the bow-string to the childes necke to haue strangled him, the innocent babe smiled vpon him, and lifting it self vp as well as it could, with open armes offered to haue embraced the villaine about the necke and kissed him. Which guiltlesse simplicitie so wounded the stonie hearted man, that he was not able to performe the intended butchery of the poore simple child, but fell downe in a swoune and there lay for dead. The Eunuch standing without the doore maruelling at his long stay, goes in, and finding the ruffian lying along vpon the ground, with cruell hand performed that the other could not finde in his heart to do, and so strangled the guiltlesse childe as had bin giuen him in charge. Whereby it euidently appeared, that it was not the mercie or compassion of Solyman that so long caused the guiltlesse infant to be spared, but rather the opinion generally receiued amongst the Turks, who measuring all things by the good or bad successe, refer all things that fall out well, vnto God as the author thereof, be they neuer so vngraciously begun: and therfore so long as it was yet vncertain what successe the attempts of Baiazet would haue, Solyman spared the infant, lest vpon his fathers good hap he might seem to haue striuen against the will of God. But now that his father was dead, and his quarrell by the euill successe therof condemned as it were by the sentence of the Almighty, he thought it not good longer to suffer him to liue, lest of an euill Bird might come an euill Chicke. I had sometime (saith the reporter of this Historie) great reasoning with my Chiaus about this matter: for falling into talke with him of Baiazet, he began bitterly to inueigh against him for taking vp armes against his brother. Wherunto (saith this Author) I replied, That in mine opinion he was worthie both to be pitried and pardoned, for as much as he was of necessitie inforced either to take vp arms, or else shortly after to yeeld himselfe to the slaughter. But he still exclaiming against him, I said vnto him, You blame poore Baiazet of great wickednesse for bearing armes against his brother: but Selymus Solymans father you blame not, who vpon like occasion tooke vp armes both against his father and his brethren; yet he therein did nothing amisse, nor in your iudgement blame worthie. And rightly, (saith the Chiaus) for the euent of the matter sheweth sufficiently, that that which he did was done by the appointment of God, and that he was from Heauen predestinated thereunto: whereas in Baiazet the euent sheweth the cleane contrarie. So that which falleth out well, be it by neuer so wicked means compassed or brought to passe, they take it as done according to the will of God; but if it fall out otherwise, they iudge it as a thing condemned by God himselfe; depending wholly vpon the good or bad euent of things, things, and therefore iudging them to be well done, or otherwise.

This yeare 1558, Charles the fift that noble Emperor (of whome we haue in the course of this Historie so often spoken) who wearie of the world, had two yeares before deliuered all his hereditarie kingdomes and principalities to his sonne Philip, did now the 24 of Februarie, on which day he was borne, by his Embassadours solemnly sent for that purpose, resigne that Empire with all the honors and titles thereof vnto his brother king Ferdinand, requesting the Princes Electors to confirme the same vnto him, which they did the thirteenth of March next following. So liuing as a priuat gentleman in that solitarie life whereunto he had to the wonder of the world certaine yeares before retyred himselfe from all worldly affaires, the 21 day of September following died of a feauer, when he had liued 58 yeares, and thereof raigned 39: a man no doubt to be worthily accounted amongst the greatest Christian Emperors that liued before him. About which time also died his two sisters, Mary the Queene of Hungarie, and Elenor the French Queene, both Ladies of great honour.

The Knights of Malta, who of long had beene suters to the great Bishop and the King of Spaine, for the recouerie of Tripolis in Barbarie, about nine yeares before taken from them by the Turkes; at which time they also surprised the Island of Zerbi vpon the coast of Barbarie betwixt Tripolis and Tunes, from whence they much troubled the Christians trauelling by those seas: had now at length so much preuailed, that the King commanded a great fleet to be now forthwith made readie in September in the yeare 1559, to meet together in Sicilia, and from thence to go directly against the enemie by Malta. Vnto which fleet, the great Bishop, the Duke of Florence, and the Knights of Malta, with many other valiant men out of diuers parts of Christendome, joined their forces also; so that at length there was a hundred gallies and ships met together vnder the conduct of Andreas Gonzaga the Generall. But whilst this fleet from diuers places was long in comming thither, the Duke of Medina Cœli came before with part of the fleet to Malta, and in the hauen of Marza Moxet expected the comming of the rest, who about the end of the yeare came thither. But whilest they were wintered expecting the Spring, many of the souldiers fell sicke and died. At length the time of the yeare fit for their setting forward being come, the Captaines consulted among themselues, Whether they should first set vpon Tripolis, or the Iland of Zerbi, otherwise called Mening. The Knights of Malta being of opinion, that it were better first to besiege Tripolis, and that with all speed, before Dragut should come thither to furnish it with souldiers and prouision. Others thought it better first to inuade the Island of Zerbi, where the armie might be relieued with plentie of all things necessarie, and from whence they might at all times of danger in safetie retyre; and from thence afterwards as time should serue, to go to Tripolis. Which vnfortunate counsell was by the greater part agreed vpon. Wherefore in Februarie the yere following they departed from Malta, and sailed directly to Zerbi. In the meane time Dragut the most famous pyrat of that time amongst the Turks, and gouernor of Tripolis, was come thither with eight hundred of the Turks Ianizaries, and had notably strengthned the citie with men, victual, and new fortifications; and presently sent messengers to Solyman at Constantinople, to certifie him of the arriual of the Christian fleet in Affrick. But the Christians comming to the Island of Zerbi, were at the first landing incountred by the Moores, whom they repulsed, and so at pleasure landed. This Island is not far from the maine, here and there ful of bogs and marishes, other riuer hath it none, and in the middest is somewhat hilly. It was inhabited with about 30000 men, which dwelt in low cottages, simply apparelled: yet is the Island reasonable fertile, yeelding dates, oliues, barley, mill, and such like. When the Christians were there landed, they sent for Caraunus a poore King amongst the Moores (from whome Dragut had before taken that Island) to vse his counsell for their better proceeding in that war. In the meane time they agreed with 8000 men to besiege the strongest castle in the Island: in going whereunto, the Spaniards went foremost, the Germans next, and last of all the Italians. By the way as they went they light vpon 10000 Moores which lay in ambush in a wood, to haue vpon the sudden set vpon them vnawares; but being discouered, and 700 of them slain in skirmish by the Spaniards, the rest fled. So comming to the castle they planted their batterie, and laid hard siege vnto it. The Captaine of the castle finding himselfe too weake long to hold out, fled secretly with his Turks, leauing the castle for the Moores to defend; who vpon condition that they might in safetie depart, yeelded the Castle to the Spaniards: for keeeping whereof, which time Solyman himselfe was come downe into a gallerie neere vnto the hauens mouth, adioining vnto his garden, the better to see the comming in of the fleet, and the Christian captaines set there to shew vpon the poupe of the Admirall gallie, namely, Don Aluarus de Sandes, Don Sanchius de Leyua, Don Billingerus de Requesenes, all of late great commanders: as for the Christian gallies all disarmed and vnrigged, so to seem the more contemptible in comparison of the Turks, they were towed at the taile of the Turks gallies. They which then saw Solymans countenance, perceiued not in him any signe at all of any insolent ioy. I my selfe (saith * Busbequius, then the Emperour Ferdinands embassadour there) saw him two daies after going to the church with the same countenance he had alwaies, with the same seueritie and grauitie, as if this victorie had nothing concerned him, nor any thing chanced strange or vnexpected: so capable was the great heart of that old sire, of any fortune, were it neuer so great; and his mind so setled, as to receiue so great applause & reioycing without mouing. Within a few daies after, the Christian captiues (for almost starued with hunger) were brought to the court: many of whom could scarce stand vpon their legs. some others for weaknes fell down and died, and othersome died outright: they were all scornefully led in triumph, with their armes reuersed and scornfully put vpon them: the Turks in the meane time insulting round about them, promising vnto themselues the empire of the whole world: and vainly asking, What enemie they were to feare, now that the Spaniard was ouercome. Aluarus Sandes, as chiefe of al the prisoners, being brought into the Diuano before the Visier Bassaes, and demanded by Rustan Bassa, What his master meant, being not able to defend his own, to inuade other mens? answered, That it beseemed not him to iudge theron; and himselfe to haue done but his dutie, with such faithfulnes as was meet to put in execution what he was commanded by his lord, although he had no good fortune therein. After that, he besought the Bassaes vpon his knee, to speake for him vnto Solyman, for that he had at home a poore wife, with certain small children, for whom he requested him to spare him. Whereunto Rustan Bassa (contrary to his manner) courteously answered, his soueraigne to be of a mild and gentle nature, and that he was in good hope his pardon might be of him obtained: so was he commanded away vnto Caradines his castle, towards the blacke sea. But he was not gone far, but that he was called backe againe; for that the great Chamberlain, a man in great credit with Solyman, had not as yet seen him: for which cause he was sent for backe again; wherewith he was not a little troubled, fearing lest the Bassaes hauing changed their minds, would haue put him to death. The rest of the captiues of the better sort were committed to the castle of Pera, and amongst them, Don Sanchius de Leyua, with his two base sonnes, and also Don Billingerus Requesenes: which two great men, with Don Aluarus de Sandes, were neuertheless afterwards with much ado and almost beyond all hope, at the request of the Emperour, and by the dexteritie of his embassador, by Solyman set at libertie, although he had before denied them vnto Saluiat the French kings embassador, wo had bin an earnest intercessor for them. Yet before they were deliuered out of prison, the Muphtior Turks great priest was asked his opinion, Whether it were lawfull, for a greater number of Turks to exchange a few Christian captiues (for the embassadour beside the rewards he had promised vnto the Bassaes, to further the matter, had also vndertaken, that fortie common prisoners of the Turks should be set at libertie for them) whereunto the Muphti answered, That the Doctors of their law were of diuers opinions concerning that question, some saying that it was lawfull, and some not; howbeit as then it was by him resolued vpon vnto the more fauorable part, and the exchange allowed.

There were among the prisoners taken at Zerbi, besides these noblemen of whom we haue before spoken, two other noble gentlemen right honorably borne, Don Iohn of Cardona Don Billinger his son in law, and Don Gasto the duke of Medina his sonne, to whom yet but a youth his father neuertheless had giuen an honorable place in the armie. Of these two Don Iohn had wisely taken order for a great summe of money to be left in the Island of Chio, by the way as the Turks fleet went to Constantinople, from whence he afterwards in safetie got into Spain. But Gasto was by Piall Bassa (vpon hope of a great ransome) purposely hid out of the way, which had like to haue wrought his destruction: for Solyman hauing gotten an inckling thereof by the instigation of Rustan, laboured for nothing more than to haue Gasto found out, so to haue a more iust occasion for the putting of Piall to death: being taken tardie in so manifest a fault. But all that labour was spent in vaine, Gasto being by death taken away, but whether by the the plague (as some reported) or by Piall his means (as it were more like) lest the truth should be found out, is vncertaine. But certaine it was, that being with great care sought for by the Duke his fathers seruants, he could neuer be heard of more: So that it was thought Piall for the safegard of his owne life, not to haue spared Gasto his prisoners life. Who neuertheless for a long time liued in great feare, and not daring to come to Constantinople, tooke occasion with a few gallies to wander about amongst the Islands of Ægeum, as if he had there some-thing to do: but indeed so shunning the sight of his angrie lord, for feare he should haue been compelled in bonds to haue answered the matter. Vntill at length he appeased at the request of Suleiman Bassa (the Eunuch and Solymans great Chamberlaine) and of Selymus, Solymans son, granted him his pardon in these words well worth the marking, out of the mouth of an Infidell Prince: Well haue hee from me pardon and forgiueneſſe for ſo great an offence: but let God the moſt iuſt reuenger of all villanies take of him due puniſhment after this. So fully he seemed to be persuaded that no euill deed ought to remaine without punishment, either in this life or in the life to come.

Piall in disgrace with Solyman, shunneth to come to Constantinople.

There was in this expedition a Colonell of the Turks well acquainted with Busbequius the Emperours Embassadour, then lying at Constantinople: into whose hands (in that discomfiture of the Christians) by chance was come the Imperiall ensigne of the gallies of Naples; wherein within the compasse of an Eagle, were contained the armes of all the Prouinces belonging to the kingdome of Spaine. Which faire ensigne the embassadour vnderstanding him to purpose to giue for a Present vnto Solyman, thought good to preuent the matter, and to get it from him: which he easily obtained, by sending him two sutes of silke (such as the Turkes make reckoning of) for it: so prouiding that one of the Imperiall ensignes of Charles the fift, should not to the eternall remembrance of that ouerthrow, remaine still with the enemies of the Christian Religion. This so miserable a calamitie receiued by the Christians at Zerbi, made that Island, before little or nothing spoken of, to be euer since famous.

One of the imperiall ensignes of Charles the fift redeemed frō the Turke.

About this time to end this vnfortunat yeare withall, the 25 day of Nouember died Andreas Auria (that second Neptune) being nintie foure yeares old: a man in his time of great fame, and of the greatest Princes of that age had in no small reputation, but especially of Charles the fift, in whose seruice he did much for the benefit of the Christian common weale, being for most part imployed in his greatest warres against the Turks and Moores. Yet amongst all the notable things done to his immortall glorie, the kindnesse by him shewed vnto his natiue countrey was greatest; which oppressed by the French, he set at libertie: and when he might haue taken vpon him the sole gouernment thereof (as had diuers others before him) moderating his desires, and respecting the onely good thereof, appeased the great dissention that had of long raigned therein; and established such a forme of gouernment, confirmed with so good and wholesome lawes and orders (no mans libertie infringed) as that it hath euer since to his eternall praise, in great wealth, state, and liberty, thereby flourished. Vnto whose remembrance (for that we haue before of him much spoken in the course of this Historie) I thought it not amisse to ioyne the liuely counterfeit of his reuerend aged countenance, by nature framed answerable vnto his noble vertues.

hostilitie or friendship with King Iohns sonne, forasmuch as belongeth to his hereditarie countries whether they bee in the hither part of Hungarie, or on the further side of Teisse: All which for all that, by law of armes belong vnto vs. And the same King Iohns sonne in time of this eight yeares league shall bee also bound in such sort to performe vnto vs his obedience, as that from henceforth it shall not be lawfull for him to vse any warre or hostilitie against you, neither to trouble your subiects with fire or sword, nor to surprise your Cities, Castles, or Townes; or by violence to take away or exact of your people or subiects, their sheepe, their cattell, their goods, money or reuenewes. Wee also our selues shall haue no right, nor take occasion to driue away your people, to burne your countries, or carrie away any captiues: but rather in this eight yeares space religiously keepe peace and concord with you. And vnder these conditions of peace shall also be comprehended Michaell Balaschus, Nicholas Bathor, with all their goods and territories, and diuers other such like, which shall bee subiect vnto you and King Iohns sonne. To be briefe, if happily any of yours or King Iohns sonnes subiects shall haue now before in time of warre thrust one another out of his goods, lands, or possessions, whereof new quarrels or discord may arise; wee will and decree, that all such controuersies, quarrels, and claims shall bee deferred vntill this definite time of the league expired. Beside, if by chance any dissention shall hereafter arise betwixt vs about our iurisdiction, which can by no meanes be composed and ordered; we will that yours shall in the mean time remaine as yours, and ours as ours; all contention and enmitie set apart: also many townes scituate heere and there by Danubius and Tatta, shall be suffered to vse the same law which they did in former time; so that the souldiers which are yet in garrison in the castle of Tatta, shall haue no right to infest or vexe those townes scituate neere vnto Danubius. Furthermore, if after this peace concluded, any of your noblemen or gentlemen shall fortune to haue any of our noblemen by revolt or other occasion whatsouer, captiues, they shall dismisse them and set them at libertie, to returne vnto their friends freely without hurt or ransome; that so the concord and peace begun betwixt vs, may bee the more firmely kept, and our subiects liue in more securitie. All and euery one of these things we grant and promise to bee of vs from henceforth vntill the end of the aforesaid eight yeares, without all fraud or guile religiously obserued and kept: and for that purpose haue caused these our letters of this peace and confederation to be published from our royall pallace: and moreouer, haue not onely prouided, that the coppie of the same should together with our edict be proclaimed to all and euery the Generalls, Captaines, Lieutenants, of our armies both by sea and land, in all the parts of our empire, and to all our mercinarie souldiers, but haue also straightly commanded, that it shall bee firmely and sincerely kept. We will also, that this agreement of peace and amitie shall comprehend and concerne our two chiefe Gouernours or Vayuods of Vallachia and Moldauia, so that none of your people of Hungarie, Crabatia, Sclauonia, or other your countries or Islands whatsoeuer, shall in any sort bee molested or grieued by our subiects. And if it shall fortune that some shall on your part out of their Castles set vpon our subiects, or by force take away their goods, the same men shal in any case be bound to make thereof restitution. Also if any shall flie from vs, and carry away with them the money or goods of their masters whome they serued, or if the like shall be done by any of yours flying to vs, then the same goods on both parts are to be of right demanded and recouered againe, and the fugitiues to the example of others to be corrected and punished: forasmuch as fugitiues goods of right appertaine vnto their Lords and masters. Furthermore it shall bee lawfull for your Captaines and Commanders to fortifie or build Castles, Cities, or Townes, in the borders of Hungarie, and to put into the same victuall, armour, and such like; but so, that they doe none of these things out of their owne limits. And during the time of this league, it shall not be lawfull to take or carrie away any of your subiects prisoners either in Hungarie or in other place of your iurisdiction: which for all that, if it shall by any chance happen, that then such captiues without delay be suffered) safely to returne home againe. Furthermore, whatsoeuer Christian shal haue any businesse to doe in our magnificent court or any part of our dominions, as are Embassadours, officers, seruants and such others: vnto all these we not onely grant and permit, that they may come and goe about their businesse, and so againe depart from our court or prouinces, but also haue willed and commanded, them to bee well and courteously entreated by our subiects, and furthered with the interpretation of our language. And if it shall fortune any contention or discord to arise betwixt our subiects on either side, about the bounds and limits of Lands, or other such like causes: such controuersies we wil to be decided and determined by discreet and indifferent men on both parts, and the authours of such discord and variance, to be punished as suspected persons and breakers of the league. Wee also prohibite those skirmishes or combats, which were woont to be sometimes on both sides made vpon the borders. And desire, that the forme of this league and peace, and euery article thereof, may bee publiquely
